PREFATORY NOTE

VOLUME XVI

The extracts from oral evidence contained in this volume cover the more important portions of the evidence given, in the presence of the Press, by non-officials* in the following Provinces : Bombay, Punjab, North-West Frontier Province, Delhi, United Provinces, and Bihar and Orissa. Volume XVII contains that given in the Provinces of Assam, Bengal, Burma, Madras, and the Central Provinces.

In nearly every case the witnesses had previously submitted written memoranda; these documents formed the basis of their examination, and are printed at the beginning of their oral evidence.

A few of the written memoranda on which oral evidence was not taken, are also included in this volume.

As explained in the preface to Volume I of the Commission's Report, all evidence was taken by a Joint Conference consisting of the Statutory Commission, the Indian Central Committee and, in all the Governors' Provinces except the Central Provinces, a Provincial Committee. A list of the members of these Committees is given on page iv.

References in the evidence to pages of the various written memoranda have been altered to correspond with the paging in the present volume.

The Commission have suggested that the full text of the evidence given in the presence of the Press, including portions omitted from the present volume as being of less importance, and also copies of non-official memoranda not printed in these volumes, should be made available for inspection in London and India, and it is understood that this will be done.

* Including officials, speaking for Service associations in their personal capacity, and not representing views of Government.

BOMBAY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Memorandum on the Meston Settlement.

The Committee of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce desire to avail themselves of the invitation issued by the Statutory Commission and to submit a memorandum on the subject of 6 (c) of the Appendix to the invitation to submit memoranda. In pursuance of the last paragraph of that invitation it is necessary to preface their remarks with a brief statement of the nature, extent and membership of the Chamber. The Bombay Chamber was founded in 1836 and one of its principal objects is to promote the trade, commerce and manufactures of India, and in particular the trade, commerce and manufactures of the Bombay Presidency. At the present time it consists of 161 Chamber Members, six Associate Members and one Honorary Member and includes the leading European commercial firms in Bombay, some of the more important Indian firms and a few Japanese concerns. Besides mercantile firms its membership includes banking, insurance and railway interests.

2. The Meston Settlement is the economic counterpart of the Government of India Act. The Meston Committee itself recognised that it was reached from political and not primarily from financial motives and that it originated in the desire to secure a greater measure of devolution in the Provinces and in the endeavour to draw for this purpose a defensible line of financial partition between local Governments and the Government of India. The Meston Committee allotted Customs, Income-tax and Excise on salt, cotton goods and petroleum to the Imperial Government, leaving Land Revenue and Irrigation, Excises on liquor and drugs and General Stamps to the Provinces. The separation between Central and Provincial finances, which might normally have been expected to benefit each party to the bargain occurred at a time when both the Central and Local administrations were suffering from a period of financial distress. Consequently the hope that the resources of the Provinces, increased as the result of the new financial settlement, would enable them to find money for large schemes of economic and social progress has not been realised and the working of the reforms has been seriously handicapped.

3. The position of Bombay has been particularly unfortunate and the Government of Bombay, supported by all classes and communities in the Presidency with a unanimity otherwise unknown, has not ceased since 1918 to protest vigorously against a system of finance which was first suggested in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, accepted by the Meston Committee and endorsed by the Joint Committee of the Houses of Lords and Commons.

4. The Bombay case against the Meston Settlement is based on two distinct grounds; firstly, that the distribution of surplus revenues assigned to the provinces of India over and above the Provincial revenue existing at the time of the Reforms was determined in a haphazard manner and bore no relation to the needs of the Provinces, to the total taxation derived from those Provinces and to the resources then available to those Provinces; and secondly, that this haphazard distribution was founded upon the application of federal principles of finance which have not been adopted in any other federal Government in the world. It has been urged by the Government of Bombay that the Settlement should be revised for the following reasons:—

(1) because it has broken down in practice as evidenced by the amendments which have had to be introduced in the Devolution Rules;

(2) because the premises on which the settlement was founded can be demonstrated to be erroneous;

(3) because the anticipations of the Meston Committee have been completely falsified by events.

5. The arguments against the Meston Settlement were succinctly summarised by Mr. Grantham in his speech at the Annual General Meeting of the Chamber in 1925 and it may be convenient to reproduce an extract here:—

"1. The settlement is an arbitrary division of revenue between the Central Government and the provinces, giving vastly increased spending powers to certain provinces, and as a settlement is inequitable.

"2. The contribution system devised was never intended to remedy any inequity in the original settlement, but only to ensure that the chief beneficiaries should help to balance the central budget over the transition period, that is to say, until such time as they could make full use of those increased spending powers, and the Central Government could do without the provincial contributions.

"3 The increased spending power of Bombay was based on totally incorrect data and Bombay's contribution is therefore obviously unfair.

"4. When making the settlement no consideration was given to the comparative taxation existent in each province nor to the comparative spending powers of each province, before the settlement.

"5. In making income-tax a central source of revenue we, an industrial province, were denied a share in the proceeds of our main form of industry, income-tax forming, as it does, a very heavy percentage of the total taxation of this Presidency.

"6. From the Bombay point of view the inequity lies not in the system of contribution and remission but in the original settlement, so that while the only real remedy is a redistribution of revenues—and until that is done we must protest against the reduction in any other province's contribution—we feel very strongly that if a respite is to be given to any other province, as has been done to Bengal, we have at least as good a claim, and in our opinion a better claim, to such a respite."

6. It will be necessary to develop briefly these main counts in Bombay's indictment of the Meston Settlement. The table below shows the additional revenue awarded to each Province, together with the percentage increase, while in the last column the contributions of the five major Provinces to Central revenues are shown:—

	Lakhs.		Over normal revenue. %	Contribution fixed at
Madras got increased revenue of ...	580*	=	66	350
U.P. got increased revenue of ...	400	=	51	240
Punjab got increased revenue of ...	290	=	50	175
Burmah got increased revenue of ...	250	=	41	...
Bengal got increased revenue of ...	104	=	14	63
Bombay got increased revenue of ...	92	=	9	56
C.P. got increased revenue of ...	52	=	15	...
Bihar and Orissa got increased revenue of	51	=	15	...
Assam got increased revenue of ...	42	=	27	...

7. It will be seen that out of an additional net increase of 18½ crores 15 crores were allotted to four provinces, viz., Madras, United Provinces, Punjab

* These figures and any others contained in this Memorandum and in the Appendix can be substantiated by a reference to Government publications.

x (328)2540 Wt P 818—907/529 750 7/30 E & S and Burmah and 3½ crores went to the remaining five provinces, which included Bengal and Bombay, so that while Madras, United Provinces and Punjab received windfalls of 66 per cent., 51 per cent. and 50 per cent., respectively, over and above their former revenues Bengal and Bombay received increases of 14 per cent. and 9 per cent. respectively.

8. In regard to the theoretical basis of the Meston Settlement, it is contended that the origin of all the subsequent trouble is to be found in the academic insistence by the framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report on the theory of complete separation of the resources of the Central and Provincial Governments. In no country in the world in the history of federal and provincial finance has it been found possible to achieve a clean cut between provincial and central revenues. Wherever complete separation has been aimed at as in India, it is found that subsidies or contributions are required.

9. Bombay's main grievance against the Meston Settlement, which has been loudly voiced from the beginning, is that under it the Government of India took over all the growing heads of revenue, more particularly income-tax, and gave the Presidency all the growing heads of expenditure. As Sir Basil Blackett has said, the kernel of the complaint of Bombay and Bengal is that their revenues are not sufficiently elastic. The Meston Committee rejected the claim of Bombay to a share of the income-tax on the ground that they "do not apprehend that the richer provinces, such as Bombay, will be seriously handicapped in the administration of their own finances"; and they appended "some figures which indicate that several of the provinces, and Bombay in particular, may look for reasonable elasticity which will in most cases be encouraged by judicious capital outlay." In these figures they compared the revenue under the proposed individual heads of the year 1912-13 with the year 1920-21 and found that in these eight years Bombay had increased—its Excise Revenue by 102 per cent.

its General Stamps by 119 ,, its Land Revenue by 32 ,, and all Provincial revenue by 52 ,, whereas the increase in other provinces varied from 11 to 35 per cent. It was thus on an assumed annual increase of 12½ per cent. in Excise, 15 per cent. in General Stamps, and 4 per cent. in Land Revenue that they based their conclusion, that Bombay in particular may "look for reasonable elasticity in their revenues apart from income-tax."

10. The four statements A, B, C and D contained in the Appendix to this Memorandum show the extent to which the actual realisations have fallen short of the anticipations of the Meston Committee. The figure up to the end of 1927-28 is Rs. 20.8 crores. Figures for 1926-27 can be taken as final, those for 1927-28 are the revised estimates, while those for 1928-29 are Budget figures. These figures and any others contained in this Memorandum and in the Appendix can be substantiated by a reference to Government publications.

The selection of two single years as the basis of important conclusions vitiated the whole argument. The datum line selected was a year of famine when the land revenue had fallen by a crore and a half. Hence the erroneous conclusion that land revenue would go on expanding at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. In the case of excise the period considered by the Committee included an important change of system from fixed fees to auctions which led to a sudden large increase of revenue which could not possibly be repeated. The Committee's expectations regarding stamps were equally erroneous as they were based upon the boom years following the war. As a result of their erroneous premises the Meston estimates of the expansion of the Bombay Provincial revenues were utterly wide of the mark.

11. The Meston Committee refer to the high scales of expenditure in Bombay. The statements marked E and F in the Appendix give the expenditure in Administrative Departments in the five major provinces for the last two years available. The figures for Bombay are high, but they do not compare unfavourably with those of Madras. It must be remembered that industrial expansion and the growth of a wealthy class involve the maintenance of expensive administrative services for education, medical relief, sanitation, police, housing, urban development, etc. Factory inspectors and a labour bureau have to be maintained in connection with industries which finance the Government of India and not the local Government. The wealthy classes which contribute handsomely to the Imperial Government and are its main prop in its Indian loan operations are, from the revenue point of view, untouchable classes for the Bombay Government. The needs of the local administration, which are clamant, have to be met from land revenue which is not merely inelastic, but liable to the vicissitudes of famine, from the profits of an unpopular trade in alcohol and from the receipts from stamps and a few minor heads where the prospects of expansion are trifling. It is not reasonable to expect the poor cultivators of the Presidency to contribute a large portion of the funds required for the education of the industrial artisan classes, for the medical relief of those classes and for the maintenance of law and order amongst the mixed populations of the large industrial cities.

12. Some indication of the amount of revenue contributed by the two industrial provinces to the Central revenues, compared with an agricultural province like Madras, is afforded by the collections of income-tax for the year 1925-26 (the latest account year for which figures are available):—

	Income tax and Super-tax receipts in 1925-26 (Lakhs of Rs.)	Rs. per head of population.
Bombay	350.5	1.8
Bengal	593.6	1.3
Madras	141.4	0.3

Again, as regards provincial taxation, Bombay taxes itself more highly than other provinces. Provincial taxation per head of population in 1925-26 was as follows:—

	Rs.
Burma	5.8

Despite the high rate of taxation for the past three years Bombay has been living on its accumulated balances and a deficit is anticipated for the current year. The financial position of this province, compared with that of the other major provinces, is shown in the statement marked G.

13. Devolution Rule 15 was introduced in order to alleviate some of the defects of the Meston Settlement by granting to the Provinces some share in the growth of revenue from taxation on incomes so far as that growth was attributable to an increase in the amount of income assessed. It took as a datum line the exceptional boom year of 1920-21 and has notoriously failed in its working. In the result Bombay has received no share in income tax since the year 1922-23, when it merely received Rs. 3 lakhs.

14. The Indian Taxation Enquiry Committee were specifically instructed that it was not within their province to revise the Meston Settlement and they therefore made no concrete proposals in that behalf, but they clearly realised that Devolution Rule 15 had conspicuously failed to alleviate the inequalities of the Settlement and their lucid examination of the subject deserves close study. The Taxation Enquiry Committee were instructed to indicate the theoretically correct distribution of taxes between Imperial and Provincial and to advise on the operation of Devolution Rule 15. In regard to the latter they found that it had failed in its object and had resulted in giving bonuses to individual provinces on a haphazard basis. They rejected the suggestion that the rule should be amended by adopting a different datum line because they considered that the whole system of dividing income tax on the basis of a datum line was unsound. They pointed out that income tax in the commercial provinces depends largely on the main industries, in Bombay on cotton, in Bengal on jute, in Assam on tea and in Bihar and Orissa on coal and minerals, that the periods of prosperity and depression of these do not necessarily synchronise, and that any datum line common to all provinces would consequently give disproportionate results as between the industrial provinces themselves.

15. The Taxation Enquiry Committee examined the possible methods of dividing income tax, and they reached the conclusion that the most satisfactory means of determining the share of the different provinces was to make over the proceeds of a basic rate on personal incomes graduated proportionately to the general rate, to which should be added a small proportion of the receipts from the corporation profits tax (if any).

16. In regard to the question of the theoretically correct distribution of taxes between central and provincial, the Committee recommended, apart from a transfer to the provinces of a share of the income tax, the transfer of non-judicial stamps and the excise duty on country-made foreign liquors, and possibly the revenue now derived from excise opium, to the Central Government. The Chamber's experience goes to confirm the wisdom of these recommendations. In 1926 the Chamber had occasion to refer to the present unsatisfactory system of taxing liquor which resulted in unhealthy competition between Central and Provincial Governments. They said then that the ideal solution of the difficulty would doubtless be to credit all duty on foreign liquor, whether country-made or imported, to the Central head, but that excise, being a transferred subject, they presumed it was outside the range of practical politics until the Reforms came up for revision when equilibrium could be established by the transfer to the Provinces of a compensating source of revenue. Another argument in favour of removing excise on liquors from the Provincial sphere is to be found in the fact that the Bombay Government have accepted total prohibition as the ultimate goal of their excise policy. The net loss, including the cost of extra preventive staff, which the achievement of this goal would involve has been estimated by an authoritative body at Rs. 6 crores, or nearly half Bombay's present annual revenue. Prohibition would seem to be impossible of realisation for some time and Government have recently issued a notification recognising that the path is beset with difficulties which for the present are insuperable and resigning themselves to a policy of cautious rationing. Apart from the financial aspect prohibition could hardly be made effective in one province alone if the others refused to come into line, and the present would therefore seem a favourable opportunity for transferring excise to the Central Government, who would be in a better position to direct the general lines of advance, as demanded by public opinion, towards a reduction of the liquor and drug traffic.

17. The Taxation Committee emphasised the desirability of re-transferring stamp duties to the Central Government; an instance of the inconvenience of the present system recently came to notice. The imposition of a tax on patent medicines was one of the recommendations of the Taxation Committee and, inspired doubtless by a laudable desire to assist stricken provincial revenues, the Government of India ruled that this should be levied as a provincial tax. The Government of Bombay appointed a Committee to examine the practicability of levying the tax and the ways and means of collecting it. The Committee's deliberations have not proceeded very far, but it is understood that they have served mainly to emphasise the difficulties in the way of imposing such taxation provincially since it is obvious that the tax will be largely evaded by smuggling unless it is an all-India one; and it is not improbable that what has proved in other countries a lucrative source of revenue will have to be abandoned because stamps are at present credited to the Provincial instead of the Central head.

18. The Financial Relations Committee expressed a doubt whether it would be possible permanently to exclude local Governments from some form of direct taxation upon the industrial and commercial earnings of their people. But they were obsessed by the bogeys of divided heads and doles which had wrought evil in the past and they were bent on a clean cut. The system they devised has broken down in practice. The Reforms Enquiry Committee reported that practically every Provincial Government had entered a protest against the Meston Settlement and had expressed the opinion that it should be revised as soon as a favourable opportunity occurred.

19. If the Provinces were given a reasonable share of income-tax, as a right not as a dole, they would be in a position to forgo the unsuitable sources of excise and stamps, their revenues would acquire the necessary resilience to enable them to devote themselves to the great nation-building schemes of which there is such urgent need and they would not be forced to resort to expedients for raising revenue such as the entertainments tax which belongs more properly to the Municipal sphere. At the same time the Municipalities, relieved of the encroachments of the Provincial Government, would not be driven to such noxious and uneconomic devices as non-refundable terminal tax.

20. As already stated, it was not within the Taxation Committee's functions to suggest a detailed revision of the settlement between the Government of India and the Provinces and they left the application of the principles suggested by them to some other body. Those principles appear to be conceived on sound lines; the success of the labours of the Statutory Commission will depend very largely on their ability to evolve therefrom a practical scheme of financial relations between the Central and Provincial Governments.

21. In conclusion, the Committee desire to emphasise most strongly that while the Meston Settlement gave Land Revenue to the Provinces, it took Income-tax from the Provinces, and yet treated the resulting surplus revenue in the agricultural provinces as if it were the provinces' own revenue. It is contended that Income-tax is the industrial counterpart of Land Revenue. In asking for a share in Income-tax receipts Bombay does not ask so much for immediate financial advantage as to be assured of a source of revenue which can be trusted to expand steadily in proportion to the constantly increasing cost of the administration.

22. The Committee would have liked to have summarised for each province the taxation imposed within each province and to have shown the proportion of the total taxation which goes to the Central Government and the proportion retained for Provincial purposes. The Committee would have liked to have done this because it is felt that the proportions as between different provinces would prove to be most uneven. But it is realised that this is a complicated matter and one which will be better undertaken by a tribunal unconnected with any particular province.

23. Income-tax may be taken as illustrative of the complication. The collections in a province do not represent only the tax on the income of the province in which it is collected but on income earned in other parts of India. Certain taxes may be considered on the border line, that is, it may be doubtful whether they should be classed as provincial taxation or not.

24. Now that the revenues of the Central Government are sufficient to meet the expenditure of the Central Government without requiring any contributions from the Provinces, the Committee consider it may be possible for financial experts so to adjust the Central Revenues as to enable industrial provinces to get a reasonable share of their Income-tax Revenue. If, however, the Central Revenues so adjusted prove insufficient the Committee are of opinion that the question of extending Probate Duties should be taken in hand as recommended by the Taxation Enquiry Committee (paras. 352 et seq.). The Chamber has repeatedly urged the desirability of introducing into India duties on inheritance and expressed approval of the recommendations of the Taxation Enquiry Committee in this behalf, with the proviso that the scale suggested might with advantage be steepened. The Committee considers that death duties should be centrally administered and should be a Central source of revenue. This is in accord with their recommendations in paras. 16 and 17 supra that General Stamps should be centralised. It is submitted that in the adoption of these suggestions lies a practical solution of the problem of compensating Central revenues for reduced receipts from Income-tax.

Dated, 18th October, 1928.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, AND OF THE CENTRAL AND BOMBAY PROVINCIAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. H. G. COCKE, President of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.

83. Chairman: Mr. Cocke, as President of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce you are here to support, I understand, the memorandum the Chamber has sent to the Statutory Commission?—Yes, Sir, that is so.

84. I do not propose that we should ask Mr. Cocke questions, but we will just ask him to state his views. I may only make this remark, Mr. Cocke, that we had a very interesting discussion to-day on this question, and we should be glad to have any supplementary remarks of your own. Kindly remember, as regards the general case of the Chamber of Commerce, that it is more or less arranged that we should take the main case at Calcutta. We should be glad if you would let us hear the points which are of special importance to this Presidency?—I will just go through the memorandum very briefly. I may say that it was prepared by a Sub-Committee of the Chamber and also adopted by the Committee of my Chamber.

85. Has this particular memorandum been published?—Yes, sir, about six weeks ago it was published. Of course, a large part of it, I presume, has already been discussed this morning.* We pointed out in para. 2 that the Meston Settlement is the economic counterpart of the Government of India Act, and in para. 3 that the position of Bombay has been particularly unfortunate, and in para. 4 (2) we state that the premises on which the settlement was founded were erroneous. I do not want to go into detail, because I know you were having the subject discussed all to-day.* But, briefly put, we feel that the Meston Settlement, judged in the light of to-day, has made really a very bad settlement. I do not suggest that some other committee could have done better at the time, but still the whole complaint, so far as Bombay is concerned, is that they took two very unfortunate years in basing their progressive figures for the past eight years. Taking eight years' expectation of total progress, they estimated the annual rate of progress. The first year they took was a famine year, and the last year they took was something of a boom year. It will be perfectly obvious to anybody, I think, that the conclusions reached, as events have turned out, could not be anything but unjust to the province. Had the boom continued, there might not have been the same objection to raise. But, as events have turned out, we maintain that Bombay has particularly suffered for reasons given in this memorandum, which, I hope, gentlemen here have read. I do not want to go into any more detail.

86. Speaking personally, I am very grateful to you because the memorandum you have submitted contains two or three things which I did not previously notice. For instance, there is this useful quotation —see para. 9:—

> "Bombay's main grievance against the Meston Settlement, which has been loudly voiced from the beginning, is that under it the Government of India took over all the growing heads of revenue, more particularly income tax, and gave the Presidency all the growing heads of expenditure.. As Sir Basil Blackett has said, the kernel of the complaint of Bombay and Bengal is that their revenues are not sufficiently elastic."

I am not expressing any opinion as to whether I agree with it or not, but it is a very useful quotation?—If you take an extreme case, sir, a province "A" with a very large land revenue and practically no income tax, and a province "B" with a very large income tax and practically no land revenue, it would be perfectly obvious that the settlement could not work. Unfortunately, predictions as regards progress have been falsified, and, it will be seen there has been no progressive source of revenue. As a matter of fact, from the figures of Land Revenue I have got here in Statement "A"—Actuals in col. 3—the first year showed 583 lakhs actuals, and for the last year, which was the eighth year, the actuals are only 593 lakhs. But the Meston Committee expected 805 lakhs in that eighth year.

88. I see you set out here in the first column the estimate that was made by the Meston Committee of what they hoped or expected would be the land revenue year by year right down to the present year. Then you set out in the second column what the actual revenue has turned out to be?—Yes.

89. I see that the excess of estimate over actuals is increasing, or, roughly speaking, is an increasing excess. Coming to 1928-29 you get an excess of 212 lakhs?—In the second part of paragraph 10 we have pointed out that the datum line selected was a year of famine, when the land revenue had fallen by a crore and a half. Therefore, obviously the Meston Committee based their annual progress of 20 lakhs a year on a basic factor which was very wide of the mark. That prophecy of 20 lakhs annual increase could not possibly be justified and events have proved it. That is really our great objection to the Meston Settlement in the light of events. I am not attacking the Meston Settlement at the time it was made. I simply say that these two years were carelessly taken, if I may say so, so far as Bombay was concerned.

90. They have not turned out to be a safe guide as to what would actually happen?—I think the Commission ought to appreciate the fact that they were making a very unfair or, say, a risky comparison, or a risky expectation, having regard to the two years selected, so far as land revenue was concerned.

91. I wish you would call attention to paragraph 12, which gives interesting figures shewing the provincial taxation per head of population?—Yes. Those figures are certainly interesting. They first of all show that the income tax and super tax per head of population in Bombay was Rs. 1.8, in Bengal Rs. 1.3, and in Madras Rs. 0.3. As a matter of fact, the individual in the Bombay Presidency pays practically no taxation to his local Government. Ninety-five per cent. probably of his tax is income or super tax, which goes to the Central Government. It is true that he is taxed for his entertainments, and, to some extent, for his liquor, but the tax which the ordinary individual pays is very small because I think there are no heads available where he is not a landowner. He pays very heavy income tax and super tax, but as regards other items, like entertainments and probate, at the present time he pays very little. In other words, the only tax which may be looked upon as a good provincial tax for the moment is income tax, but a very large proportion of that tax goes to the Central Government and very little is retained in the province.

92. I am afraid I have not followed your last remark. If you look at paragraph 12 you go on to set out what is the provincial tax per head of population. What it seems to show is that provincial taxation per head of the population in 1925-26 in Bombay was Rs. 6.1, in Bengal it was Rs. 1.9, in Madras it was Rs. 2.9, and in Burma it was Rs. 5.8. That is the contribution to provincial taxation made by the individual inhabitant on an average. I do not quite understand how, if Bombay is at the head of the list in that way, you can say that the man who lives in the Bombay Presidency contributes practically nothing to provincial taxation?—Land revenue is a very large factor there, and Excise. I was really only taxing the income-tax payee. The merchant or the professional man pays income tax and super tax to the Central Government, but he does not pay very much taxation to his own province.

93. If you mean the urban dweller I quite understand.—Really it is the land revenue which has been mainly handed over to the Central Government in the form of provincial contribution. That is what I wanted to emphasise. As regards provincial taxation per head of population, Bombay shows up very well. We saw in the early afternoon that the extent of the population makes much difference. For instance, the Madras population is double that of Bombay.

Then, sir, as regards income tax—paragraph 13—Devolution Rule 15 was brought into effect and the effect of that Rule on the income tax is shown in the Taxation Committee's Report in paragraph 529.

94. I shall try to save your time. I remember it perfectly well. It showed really that the attempt to give the provinces three pies in the rupee on any increase in assessments worked in the most utterly chance way, and that Bombay in particular, which hoped to get a good deal from it, as a matter of fact has not received anything at all for about four years. —Only for the first two years; 1922-23 was the last year. Therefore, the Meston Settlement having failed, if I may say so, from the point of view of Bombay, Devolution Rule 15 failed equally from the provincial point of view.

While on this question, Sir, as to a remedy, it has been pointed out that if Bombay wants another 50 lakhs it has to come from somewhere. Of course we have striven all along, I think the Bombay representatives in the Assembly and in the Council have striven all along, not definitely to get something more, but rather for a re-examination of the Settlement on the ground that it is unfair. It might be that Bombay might get less. I do not know. But I cannot see such a thing happening.

95. Certainly we are going to re-examine it, whether it is fair or unfair.—And, of course, it may be that three or four provinces may get something less, one or two something more. It is not a question of Bombay or Bengal. It is a question of Province A and Province B. An examination in particular may be undertaken by an independent committee. Your Commission, I understand, might have a special committee on this.

96. I quite agree. This important thing should be dealt with independently.—There are some difficult points to go into.

97. I do not think in paragraph 23 you quite take the same view as Mr. Wiles did. You take the income tax and say that the collection in a province does not represent only the tax on the income of the province in which it is collected, but on income earned in other parts of India. Speaking as a business man with great knowledge of this kind of thing—it is the business man and not the lawyer who knows—do you think that that is so?—Undoubtedly it is, particularly so in Bengal. For instance, I believe all the taxes deducted from interest on Government securities go to Bengal. That must be very large. All taxes deducted from interest on government securities go into the Bengal figures.

98. Does it?—I am informed so.

99. I am told that that particular instance is not correct.—I have got that demi-officially from the Government of India.

100. Mr. Rama Rau says it is not. That will be a most disturbing factor, of course. Never mind about that instance. You take that view. From my knowledge of English income tax it will be very difficult to persuade me that because a tax was collected inside the boundaries of a province, it is exactly the right amount to treat as properly attributable to the province. It may be very wise to adopt a rough-and-ready rule.—I cannot give the authority. If I may read the paragraph it simply says that the tax on interest on Government securities is deducted in Calcutta. It is obvious that the tax in this case cannot wholly be attributed to Bengal.

101. What are you reading from?—I am reading from a demi-official letter which I am afraid I cannot put in.

102. Do not please read from letters which you cannot put in. I am sure you will take it that Mr. Rama Rau has been looking into it.—Another instance is this. Take the exchange banks and the Imperial Bank of India. The Imperial Bank and all exchange banks are taxed in Calcutta. That would also go into Bengal's share, although those banks have branches all over India.

103. I have had fairly close contact with the working of income tax in England—I do not claim to know anything about the Indian income tax—but I am quite certain if it is on the English model, that there is a real distinction between the place where the tax is collected and the place to which it ought for this purpose to be attributed. It may, of course, cancel out in the end or it may be right to use a rough-and-ready rule. What is the suggestion which the Bombay Chamber wants to make?—It is this. First of all the Meston Settlement is unsound, as it has been proved. Secondly, cannot financial experts so adjust the existing revenues, provincial and central, in a more equitable way; in other words, if there is not enough to go round—for instance, if you take Rs. 30 lakhs from Province A and give to Province B and that is going to cripple Province A, Province A will require another 30 lakhs. If the suggestion was that all other heads of income proved extremely low at present, are there other heads which could undoubtedly be developed by the Central Government, particularly probate duties which the Bombay Chamber has emphasised several times? It is brought out clearly in the Taxation Committee's report.

* * * * * * * * * * *

109. Dr. B. R. Ambedkar: Please refer to para. 16. I think your Chamber is in favour of transferring Excise to the Central Government?—Yes; they consider that would benefit the local Government in carrying out the policy of prohibition or at least in reducing the consumption of liquor.

110. And also because it will do away with the unhealthy competition between the Central and the Provincial Governments?—Yes.

111. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You stated that, as regards provincial taxation, Bombay is taxed more highly than several other provinces, and you gave the provincial taxation per head of population in 1925-26 as being 6.1. What was the income per head?—I have not got the figures here.

112. In order to judge the comparative high rate of taxation, do you not think it is necessary to find the income per head of population?—That is a different question. The taxation per head is one matter, expenditure per head is another matter, and income per head is yet a different thing.

113. But does not taxation per head bear any relation to the income per head?—It undoubtedly would, I suppose.

114. In paragraph 16 you say that the Bombay Government have accepted total prohibition as the ultimate goal of their excise policy. How far do you think the reduction in excise income is due to their accepted goal of the Government?—I am afraid I could not answer that; I am not in touch with the administration of excise.

* * * * * * * * * * *

117. Sir Arthur Froom: The Bombay Chamber, you said, includes some European firms, some Indian firms and a few other concerns, and I think you informed the Chairman that this Memorandum has been published?—Yes, it has been published.

118. Would you tell us whether you received any adverse criticisms on the Memorandum?—No, none at all.

119. So I think we could take it that it has been received with unanimous approval throughout Bombay by all communities?—I think so, undoubtedly.

Statement of the Sardars' and Inamdars' Central Association, Bombay Presidency.

The Representative System as Applied to British India.

Basis of Franchise.

1. The basis of franchise consists in having an interest in the nation. The principal interests are:—

1. General interests, including agriculture.
2. Special interests, consisting of
   (a) Aristocracy and big land-holders;
   (b) University;
   (c) Commerce;
   (d) Labour, and

General Constituency.

2. So far as the general constituency is concerned, the present system based on the payment of a requisite amount of assessment is satisfactory. The basis of franchise in cities also is satisfactory. But this Association is strongly of opinion that the educated classes ought to have a vote in the general constituencies whether they pay any assessment or not, and we think that all persons who have passed the matriculation or entrance or any equivalent examination of any university should have votes for the local councils, while all graduates and all persons practising as pleaders on the authority of Sanads granted by the chartered High Courts as well as all registered medical practitioners should have votes for the Assembly. Except for these additions we think that no change is necessary, nor do we think that the franchise need be widened at present.

Special Interests.

3. Aristocracy or Sardars and Inamdars who are popularly styled as "landholders," or landed aristocracy.

The landed aristocracy of the Bombay Presidency is an important part of polity from times immemorial. It founded empires, led armies, and was principally responsible for the civil administration. It formerly wielded and still wields a great influence in society. It is in no way inferior to any other class in respect of education and culture, and has not been slow to move with the changing times. This class has the special advantage of coming into direct contact with the villages, for the development of which no class is better fitted. In paragraph 147 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report it is said:

"The natural and acknowledged leaders in country areas are the landed aristocracy. They generally represent ancient and well-born families and their estates are often the result of conquest or grants from some mediæval monarch. By position, influence and education they are fitted to take a leading part in public affairs. Some of them are beginning to do so, and our aim must be to call many more of them out into the political lists."

This quotation is given to bring to the notice of the Commission prominently that the framers of the Report intended to lay down as a matter of policy that this class should be given proper facilities to play their part in the new order of things.

4. The interests of this class are extensive. In the Bombay Presidency proper (exclusive of Sind) this class holds 2,076¼ villages as alienated, the total number of villages being 20,834¼. The net revenue of the alienated villages and lands is Rs. 1,07,13,995, the land revenue of the Government villages being Rs. 4,30,15,007. Thus it can be roughly said that Sardars and Inamdars hold one-tenth of the number of Government villages, and hold one-fourth of its land revenue.

5. The tenures, culture and political education of Sind being entirely distinct from that of the Presidency proper, our Association has restricted its activities to the aristocracy of the Presidency proper, and we are not going to offer any remarks about Sind and Sind landholders.

6. Having described the interests of our class and their extent, we proceed to trace the history of representation accorded to this class in the legislatures.

7. Since 1861, one person from our class was being nominated in the Bombay Legislative Council till the year 1892, when there was a change in the constitution of the legislatures. Elective principle came in, and one seat was reserved to be elected by the Deccan Sardars only for the Bombay Council. The order of Sardars of the Deccan is a creation of the Political Department of the Bombay Government, and the inclusion of any person in the list of Sardars depends exclusively on the sweet will of the Bombay Government. Thus the Inamdars, many of whom have interests much larger than those of many of the Sardars, remained unrepresented. The order of the Sardars of Guzerath was created about the year 1908 and the Morley-Minto Reforms provided one more seat for them in the local council, the Inamdars, who constitute the main bulk of the landed aristocracy, remaining unenfranchised. Reforms of 1909 went further and the landholders of the Bombay Presidency were given a seat in the Central legislature, which was alternately shared by the landholders of Sind and Sardars of Guzerath, and landholders of Sind and the Sardars of the Deccan, the Inamdars being without votes.

8. The Sardars and Inamdars pressed their claims for special and adequate representation when Rt. Hon. Mr. Montagu came to India in 1917, and waited upon him and His Excellency Lord Chelmsford in deputation. Our Association painfully notes that for no ostensible reason the Government of Bombay opposed the claims of Inamdars, and the Government of India saw no reason to interfere. Thereupon, our Association placed their case before the Joint Parliamentary Committee when it was formed, and being convinced of the justice of our cause, they reported that

"The special representation of the land-holders in the provinces should be reconsidered by the Government of India in consultation with the local governments."

As a result of this, such Inamdars as solely held a whole village as alienated were included in the list of the voters for the seat for Sardars without increasing the number of seats for the land-holders.

9. We strongly complain that in spite of the expansion of the Bombay Council in 1892, in 1909 and in 1920, the Deccan Sardars and Inamdars are just in the same place as they were in 1861, when the Councils came into existence with respect to the number of their seats in it. However, we note that the claim of Inamdars for special representation at last found recognition at the hands of the Government.

10. We are not satisfied with this recognition merely. We claim adequate representation. Our claim for the greater number of seats does not rest merely on the extent of our interests. We are the only cultured class that come into direct contact with the village, and shall be of great use to the development of the country if proper facilities are afforded to us. The Montagu-Chelmsford report says, "The natural and acknowledged leaders in the country areas are the landed aristocracy.", and they further observe in para 148 "No men are better qualified to advise with understanding and great natural shrewdness on the great mass of rural questions which will come before the provincial legislatures."

11. Our class has a large stake in the country, and by tradition we are endowed with a sense of responsibility and appreciate the difficulties of administration. The management of our estates brings us into contact with almost every department of the Government, and the presence of this class in adequate numbers will serve as a healthy check on hasty and ill-considered legislation.

12. We have persons of all castes, creeds and religions in our class, which, combined with our culture and social position, keeps us above narrow feelings of communalism. At a time when the evil of communalism is rampant, our presence in adequate numbers will serve as a check to it.

13. Wider powers have to be given to the legislatures to cope with the strong demand from the public for the same, and they should be so constituted as to progress on proper lines. We record it as our considered opinion that this can be best achieved by giving the special interests so much representation as would effectively influence the deliberations and decisions of the legislatures. We have confidence that representatives of the special interests detailed in the first paragraph will be persons of balanced views, and their voting will be guided by reason and responsibility. As the popular chamber will have real power and control over the purse, great care has to be taken of its constitution; we advocate the policy of effective representation of the special interests in it.

14. With due weight to these considerations, and without exaggerating our claim in any way, we modestly ask for twelve seats in the Bombay Council and three in the Assembly, and one in the Council of State if it is to be retained.

15. Having thus placed before the Commission our case for adequate representation in the legislatures, we proceed to bring to the notice of the Commission our views with respect to the franchise as well as to the distribution of the seats for the Sardars and Inamdars.

16. The franchise in this constituency is given to Sardars and sole holders of whole villages. An alienated village is a partible property in most cases, and a large number of villages is partitioned amongst the sharers according to the Hindu or Mahomedan law. Such sharers remain without representation according to the rules now in force. We advocate that the possession of a whole village should give to its "holder" or "holders" the right to vote. Where a village is held in shares, all sharers should nominate one person from amongst them to exercise the privilege of voting; and if they fail to do it, the holder of the largest share should be regarded as the voter. If one person holds more than one village, he should have the same number of votes as he would have had if he had held one village only. We further express that if an Inamdar derives an income of one thousand rupees or more from his shares in one or more villages, he should be included in this constituency. Similarly, persons holding alienated lands assessed at one thousand rupees or more should be regarded as voters.

17. Having thus dealt with the franchise, we proceed to point out some anomalies existing at present with regard to the allotment of seats. There is at present one seat for the Sind Zamindars and two for the land-holders of Presidency proper in the local council. Out of the two seats for Presidency proper, one is allotted to Sardars of Guzerath and Inamdars of the Northern Division, and the other to the Sardars of the Deccan and the Inamdars of the Central and Southern Divisions.

18. Sind, Northern Division, Central Division, and the Southern Division make the four administrative divisions of the Bombay Presidency. Sind and Northern Division each has a separate seat allotted to the land-holders comprised in it, while Central and Southern Divisions together are given one seat for their land-holders. This is an injustice, and it will appear still more glaring when it is prominently brought to the notice of the Commission that the Central Division has 1,043 alienated villages, Southern Division has 717, while the Northern Division has only 268.

19. The land-holders of Northern Division have no claim for this preferential treatment, even on historical basis. The dazzling history of the Maratha Empire was built up by the land-holders of the Southern and Central Divisions, of which they are justly very proud.

20. In conclusion, we request that while distributing the seats that may be assigned to our class, due consideration should be given to what we have said in paragraphs 18 and 19 to the extensive interests that the Sardars and Inamdars have in the Central Division, and distribution be made equitably.

21. We urge for three seats for the Sardars and Inamdars of Presidency proper in the Assembly, and one in the Council of State if it is to be retained. The whole of the Presidency proper should be one constituency for the seats in the Assembly and the Council of State as at present. The existing system of sharing a seat with Sind alternately for three years causes a break in our representation in the Assembly where the destinies of India are moulded. Experience has shown us that break in continuity is highly detrimental to our interests. The tenures and political development of Sind are so distinct from that of the Presidency proper that the Sind Zamindars cannot represent or adequately guard our interests.

22. We were never satisfied with the meagre representation given to us in the legislatures. Our Central Association passed a resolution at its general meeting in 1920 protesting against it, and it was successively repeated at subsequent meetings. In the first provincial conference, held at Satara in 1926, and in the second conference in Poona in 1927, resolutions asking for adequate representation were passed. Our Central Association petitioned to His Excellency the Viceroy in 1925 to give us a full seat in the Assembly, and Sardar Mutalik, who was our representative in the Assembly in 1926, tabled a resolution for the same purpose. Our Central Association pressed our claims also before the Muddiman Committee.

23. University.—The importance of the educated classes in the legislatures cannot be exaggerated, and we strongly recommend that the number of seats for this constituency should be raised to six.

24. Commerce and Industry ought to have adequate representation. We think that commercial interests in the moffussil are not adequately represented and propose that two more seats should be created to be elected by the income-tax payers.

Another industry which requires representation consists of small factories that use power and which are studded all over the moffussil.

25. Europeans.—The representation of Europeans may be reconsidered.

26. Labour.—Two more seats should be created for labour which should be filled by elections by Electoral Colleges.

27. Depressed Classes.—The depressed classes labour under no political disability. Their problem is a social one; there is already an awakening in their favour. Let it be noted that the higher classes have taken up their cause. We think that the Government should not interfere in social or religious matters, which should be left to the society to evolve. We are opposed to any kind of communal representation, but, under the circumstances, to help the awakening amongst the depressed classes themselves, two seats in the local council may be given to them. Their representatives should be elected.

28. With respect to the representation of the above interests in the Assembly, we express that Commerce and Industry should have adequate representation, and the Assembly should further be augmented by two additional representatives from each province elected by the graduates.

Methods of Election.

29. The present method of elections is working satisfactorily, and requires no change. We, however, suggest a question of detail, and that is that elections of all constituencies should be held on one and the same day.

30. The class of Sardars and Inamdars is educated, and in case all elections are not held on the same day, this class may be allowed to vote by post as is done for the elections of the Council of State. A large number of the voters of our constituency have votes for the Council of State and voting by post will not be new to this constituency.

31. We are opposed to Communal Representation. It generates and strengthens a feeling in the candidates and their electors of their chief duty being the betterment and progress of their own community only. This feeling degenerates into seeking advantages for the community by any means fair or otherwise. This, in its turn, widens the gulf between the several communities and is the greatest obstacle to the creation and feeling of national unity. No nation can progress unless there is a goal which is common to all and to secure which all have to put together their best brains and energies. The result of communal representation is to the contrary. Communal representation strengthens communal feelings. It was not looked upon with favour by the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and the experience of the past eight years has more than fully justified what the Report has feared about it. We may say that it is the greatest evil from national point of view.

32. Consistently with our views, we do not favour separate representation to the Mahomedans. They labour under no political disability. It is highly undesirable to allow religion or castes to come into politics. The Mahomedans are not backward in education and are a rich and an enterprising community.

33. If the Commission, unfortunately, come to the conclusion to give separate representation to the Mahomedans, it should be by reservation of seats in joint electorate, and it should continue for the ensuing two elections only. The Mahomedans should have seats in proportion to their enfranchised population.

34. No special representation is necessary for the backward classes. They form the overwhelming majority of the population and of the voters in the general constituencies. The fact that they have captured a large number of seats in the council shows that they are not without organising capacity. The local boards and the municipalities are completely in their hands, and they can make out no case for special representation.

35. It appears that the Commission intends to investigate about representation in the local self-governing bodies. We completely disapprove of the creation of the new Mahomedan constituencies created by the Local Boards and the Municipal Acts overhauled in 1923 by the Minister in charge of local self-government.

36. At the same time we strongly protest against the deprivation of the special seats of the landholders in the local boards. The Inamdars had one seat in each of the districts and taluka local boards since the local boards came into existence. Their representatives always worked with distinction, and a large number of Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the boards were members elected by the Inamdars. A Committee of the Bombay Council appointed under the chairmanship of Mr. Lawrence (now Sir Henry Lawrence) reported in about 1920 recommending the increase of Inamdars' seats to two in each taluka and district board. In spite of the recommendation, the existing seats were completely taken away, and the highly undesirable principle of communal representation introduced for reasons best known to the worthy minister. The protests of our Association were disregarded in all quarters, and we request the Commission to consider our case in this respect.

37. At the same time, we urge for provision of four seats in each of the taluka and district local boards as well as in municipalities for the educated classes, by which we mean persons who have passed either the Matriculation or school-leaving examination of the Bombay or any recognised university.

The Growth of Parties.

The existing parties are one Congress party, two Liberals, three Mahomedans, four Non-Brahmins. There are many Independents.

38. Of these the first two are the only parties that have political principles for their basis. The Congress party is the largest, strongest, and with good organisation and discipline. They have a large following in the educated classes as well as in the country areas. It is a party which goes with the people, and appeals to the public at large.

39. The Liberals have amongst them some persons of outstanding merit who are a great asset to the party. They advocate caution in politics, but are radicals in social and religious matters. They care little to take the people with them. There is a great scope for bettering the organisation of this party.

40. The independents own allegiance to no party, and view each question on its own merit. They are growing in power and importance.

41. As their name shows, the Mahomedan and Non-Brahmin parties are based on communal lines, and formulated with a view to advance the interests of their respective communities by all possible means.

42. With these remarks we observe that parties such as they exist in England and other independent countries are not possible in the legislatures of provinces, or in the central legislature. Financial stringency and the angle of view of the reserved side of the Government makes the Ministers dependent for majority on the Government votes, and little difference exists in the eyes of the public or the members of the legislatures between the Ministers and the Executive Councillors. The Ministers have no funds with which they can initiate any policy, and if they have any policy it has to satisfy the reserved side, without the support of which the Ministers would be in minority in the council. There cannot be any parties in India as they are in England unless all the departments are transferred and complete control over the purse is given to the legislature. We agree with the remarks made in this respect by the Indian Executive Councillors and Ministers of the Bombay Government in their Report of the Working Reforms in 1923 and 1924.

Growth of Informed Public Opinion.

43. There is a large growth in informed public opinion. A large number of rural populace has begun to take interest in politics, and as a result in reading papers. It is often done on the village chowdie, where a large number of ardent listeners crowd round the reader. The villagers are approached by candidates at the time of council and local board elections, and thus a constant touch is kept with towns. At times an M.L.C. tours round and gives information about the burning questions of the time. People now know much more than what they did ten years ago, and we think that this progress will be kept up.

We may raise a word of caution against the campaign of hatred against forward classes that is at present carried on in certain communal papers. No feelings of hatred amongst several communities should be fostered, and we feel confident that, with the disappearance of communal representation, this will cease. It is not a wise policy on the part of the Executive Government to allow this campaign to proceed unchecked.

Nomination of Officials and Non-officials as Members of Elected Bodies.

45. We advocate that all elected bodies, including the provincial councils, should be clothed with full power, the Governor reserving to him the power of veto. If the elected bodies are to be responsible, it is against the basic principle to fill certain portions of it by nomination.

46. In provincial government, for which we advocate full autonomy, the Ministers may have Council Secretaries on the analogy of Parliamentary Secretaries, but persons from the permanent official staff should have no seats in the legislatures.

47. Such of the classes as ought to have representation in any elected body should have it by election, and nomination for this purpose should cease.

Provincial Governments.

Constitution:

48. There is an awakening on all hands and a large growth of informed public opinion. Wider powers have been given to local bodies, and there is a demand for increased powers for the councils from all quarters. We think that time is now ripe for the grant of full autonomy to the provinces. The experience of the working of the councils during the last eight years has proved the capacity of the councils to undertake the responsibility. The Report presented to the Government of India by the Government of Bombay and the Report of the Indian Councillors and Ministers will show that, but for some defects inherent in the constitution, the Ministers might have achieved what was expected of them by the Montagu-Chelmsford Report.

49. The provincial councils should be fully elective, no place being filled by nomination. The Cabinet should be formed on the British Cabinet system. The Governor should call upon the leader of the party having the largest following in the council to form his own Ministry. It will remain in power so long as it enjoys the confidence of the House.

50. The present system of appointing the Executive Councillors as well as Ministers is defective. Up to now almost all the Councillors have been selected from persons residing in Bombay, who have little first-hand knowledge or information about the conditions prevailing in the moffussil, far less the undercurrent prevailing there. Persons from moffussil should be freely chosen for these posts, and, as said by Montagu-Chelmsford Report in para. 148, with respect to the aristocracy and landed gentry, "No men are better qualified to advise with understanding and great natural shrewdness on the great mass of rural questions which will come before the provincial legislatures," we claim that persons from our class should have preference. We do not approve of the present practice of nominating Executive Councillors from the Ministers. This leads to the Ministers to covet the post of Executive Councillor, and serves as a check to their independence.

51. But, apart from giving us any kind of preference, we have reason to complain that the Bombay Government have shown us nothing else than disregard if not positive antipathy. Every Provincial Government have included at one time or other a member from our class in the Government, and Bombay is the only exception perhaps where the aristocracy is neglected in this respect.

52. The present method of appointing Ministers is a positive hindrance to the political development of the Presidency. The reserved side of the Executive Government, with whom real power rests, have to secure a working majority in the Councils, which is done by appointing Ministers from a party or group of members who would support the Government. In return, the Government have to be guided by the policy of these Ministers, which may not be to the best interests of the Presidency, though it is approved of by the majority of the Councils. This is an inherent defect of dyarchy, for which it must be condemned.

53. While advocating provincial autonomy, we make it clear that Provincial Councils should have no power or control over Inams, Saranjams and solemn engagements made and sanads given by the previous Governments. Where the sanads given to Inamdars provide that they shall not be subject to the increase of land tax or to any other tax, the Councils should have no power to impose any tax or increase the land tax on the Inamdars, either directly or indirectly. The Council should have no power to legislate regarding the Inams and Saranjams, unless any Bill affecting the class is moved by a member elected by the Inamdars, nor should the Council have the power to attack, abrogate, or curtail an Inam.

Working of Dyarchy.

54. Dyarchy has had a fair trial, and we agree that it is unworkable. In fact, there has not been dyarchy at all. We refer to paragraphs 5, 7, 8, 9, and 19 of the letter No. 3116 of the Bombay Government dated 2nd July, 1924, in reply to the letter No. F. 166 Pub. dated 8th April, 1924, and to paras. 3 and 4 of the dissenting minute by the Hon. Sir C. V. Metha, Hon. Sir Cawasji Jahangirji, and to the Minority Report of the Muddiman Committee. We see no reason to repeat the arguments contained in them to show that dyarchy is inherently unworkable. The financial position and arrangement which create difficulties may also be noted.

The Position of the Governor.

55. The Governor should be the head of the Executive Government, and should preside over the Cabinet meetings. He should have the power of veto. He should carry on the Government in case of a deadlock resulting in the Council not being able to form a Government, until the Government is formed. The Cabinet will consist of all the members of the Government, whether Ministers or Executive Councillors. The decision will always be by majority, but in case the Governor overrules the decision of the majority he should state his reasons, and the whole question should be open to be discussed by the Legislative Council. The control over the purse should rest with the Council, and there should be no power of certification. Precedent should be established of the Governor being always guided by majority. No Bill passed by the Council will become a law unless it is ratified by the Governor. The Governor-General will have the general power of superintendence and control over Provincial Governments. The Governor should be appointed by the King from amongst public men, and the present period of five years for the duration of his office is satisfactory. The Governor, before ratifying a Bill passed by the Council, should send it to the Governor-General with his recommendations, and should signify his ratification after the Governor-General has approved of the Bill. The Assembly also should have the power to discuss and negative controversial legislation passed by a Provincial Council, but the previous consent of the Assembly to the passage of a Bill is in no way necessary.

Position of Ministers in Relation to Governor and Members of the Executive Council.

56. As our Association urges that all departments should be transferred this question does not arise. However, if the Commission desires to recommend that some departments should be kept as reserved, we suggest that there should be no difference between a Minister and an Executive Councillor. There should not be separate Cabinet meetings of the Executive Councillors and the Ministers with the Governor. The Government should be looked upon and considered as a whole, and in the Cabinet meetings the Minister should be on a footing of complete equality with the Executive Councillor. All questions should be decided by majority, the Minister having a right to vote even on the reserved subjects, and vice versa.

57. The practice of allowing official secretaries and heads of the departments direct access to the Governor should be stopped. Being against the basic principles of administration, it is derogatory to the prestige and position of the Ministers.

Relationship of Ministers to each other and the Question of Joint Responsibility of the Ministers.

58. The Government cannot be looked at as Government of departments, but Government as a whole. Hence, all the Ministers should be jointly responsible.

Working of Particular Departments.

59. The chief Minister should distribute the portfolios to his Ministers, and questions of general policy should be discussed at the Cabinet meetings. If the Minister in charge of any department thinks any particular question of importance being worth the consideration of the whole Cabinet he may place it before the Cabinet.

Second Chambers.

60. Experience of the last eight years does not speak in favour of the second chambers. The Council of State is regarded as an impediment in the way of the Assembly, and the case with other second chambers if they come into existence in provinces will be similar. We suggest that the first chamber should be so constituted as to find place for persons with a sense of responsibility, which can be achieved by providing sufficient number of seats for the special interests. The real power will remain in the hands of the popular chamber, and the members of the second chamber will be put to unnecessary unpopularity. To prevent hasty legislation provision should be made in the constitution to enable the Governor to send back any Bill to the Council for reconsideration.

Redistribution of Provinces.

61. The principle of redistribution of provinces on linguistic basis is acceptable to us, provided the demand for it comes from the people themselves.

62. Sind should be made a separate province. But before doing it the interests of the Hindu minority in it should be properly safeguarded by providing for seats in the Sind Legislature in proportion of their number to the whole population of Sind, and arrangements should be made for the inclusion of Hindus in the Government. The Bombay Presidency has spent enormous sums on the development of Sind, and financial adjustments should be made between Sind and Bombay Presidency before Sind is made a separate province.

63. Karnatik may be turned into a separate province. Marathi portions of Belgaum and Bijapur districts should be retained in the Bombay Presidency.

64. The Marathi districts of the Central Provinces should be included in the Bombay Presidency if the residents of those districts express their willingness in this behalf.

Central Government.

65. Since the introduction of British Rule in India, the Western ideas of political development have progressed to such an extent that there is at present a strong demand for autonomy from all quarters which cannot be safely or reasonably resisted. It is asserted that the ultimate responsibility for the Government of India rests on the British Parliament. Even accepting that position, the British Parliament will have no better way of discharging it than by transferring it to the Indians themselves.

66. The present position of the Government of India in anomalous. The Secretary of State has to be consulted in all important matters in which the views of the Government of India may or may not prevail. In practice, as well as in theory, there is the control of the Secretary of State over the Government of India. The policy of the Secretary of State has to be supported before the Assembly in which the Government are often in minority in spite of their skilful manœuvring for votes. The Government of India have at times to justify a policy not agreeable to them, at the dictation of the White Hall. The position of the legislatures is irresponsible and critical. The Government is not responsible to the legislature and holds the position of an irremovable executive controlled by the Secretary of State, who is responsible to the British Parliament in which India has no representation. The position of the Government in the Assembly is embarrassing. There is every danger of a deadlock and little chance of smooth working. The attitude of the public is that of suspicion towards tht Government, which is charged with looking more to the interests outside India than those of the Indians themselves, and often at the cost of Indians. The Central Legislature does not look with favour on a Government which is not responsible to it either in theory or in practice. It is necessary to evolve a system of Government which will be responsible to the people, and avoid deadlocks resulting in discontent.

67. We think it necessary to remove the control of the Secretary of State over India. The responsibility of Parliament can be discharged by transferring the charge of Indian affairs to the Colonial Secretary, or by limiting the control of the Secretary of State, who should have the same powers over India and exercise them in the same way as the Colonial Secretary does towards the other self-governing parts of the British Empire. His control should not extend beyond the defence of India and foreign relations, the voice of the Government of India being supreme in all other matters. India should occupy the same place in British Empire as other self-governing dominions do, and should have the same relations with the Imperial Government as the other parts have. The name of the British minister who will have the charge of India should be changed, and a new name of the "Secretary for Indian Dominions" be given to him. India Office should be abolished. In short, we advocate full Self-Governing Dominion status for India.

68. To remove the control of the Secretary of State over the Government of India without substituting any other control would make the Government of India autocratic and irresponsible—a position which no one can like. The constitution of the Government of India should be changed, and the Government should be made responsible to the Indian Legislatures, which will be the Assembly and the Council of State.

Assembly.

69. The Assembly will be the popular chamber of legislature. We have already offered our observations with regard to franchise for it and think that no change is at present necessary in it. We advocate the policy of strengthening the representation of Special Interests in it and claim three seats for our class for the Bombay Presidency.

70. As already stated, we are not in favour of Communal representation, and in a responsible body like the Central Legislature especially, we look upon it with particular disfavour. However, if it is unfortunately decided to give it to the Mahomedans it should be in proportion to the enfranchised Mahomedan community, and by the method of joint electorate for three elections only.

71. Nominations of non-officials to the Assembly should cease.

72. All the Bills passed by the Provincial Legislatures should be placed on the table of the Assembly, which should have the power of raising a debate over it, and send them back to the Provincial Legislatures for reconsideration.

Council of State.

73. With all due deference to the House we may say that the House as at present constituted does not command respect which it ought to. It does not serve the purpose which is expected from a Second Chamber in any constitution. The reason, on one hand, is that the Assembly has not got that power which necessitates an active function of the Second Chamber. It has on a few occasions acted as a deterrent body on legislative and other measures which emanated from the Opposition Benches and which were stoutly opposed by the Government Benches. In matters where Government was indifferent the House has not been able to assert its voice or reflect the opinion of the upper classes.

74. The constitution of the House requires to be modified in some respects. In our view a franchise uniform for all provinces will not work. Under the present constitution members represent different interests in different provinces. In some provinces the landholders are in prominence, in others the commercial classes are returned, and in some leaders of public have found place. The constitution should be that there should be representation of all the classes who have stake in the country, as well as persons who are eminently fitted to exercise a sober judgment on any questions. The attempt ought to be to have the representation of all these interests in the Council of State.

75. With this end in view, we suggest that each province should elect three landholders, three graduates and three persons to represent the larger commercial interests. In Bombay Presidency the constituency to elect landholders for this House should consist of persons holding lands assessed at rupees one thousand or above, for the constituency of graduates the voters should be all graduates of ten years' standing of Bombay or any recognised university, while persons paying one thousand rupees or more as income tax should be the voters for the commercial constituency. We see no reason why past or present presidents and vice-presidents of city municipalities and district local boards should have votes for the Council of State.

76. The graduates, landholders and commercial constituencies as just specified should elect their own representatives, or there should be a joint electorate of these interests as specified, and they should jointly elect the landholders, graduates and persons to represent commercial interests.

77. On no account communal representation should find place for this House.

Ministry.

78. The Ministry for the " transferred " departments of the Central Government should be formed in the manner described above for the formation of the Ministry in provinces. The Ministry should be jointly responsible.

Governor-General.

79. The Governor-General of India should have the same powers as the Governors or the Governors-General of other self-governing dominions in the British Empire have.

Defence.

80. For the present, the defence of India must rest with the Governor-General. Since the introduction of the British Rule, the Government of India have made no arrangement for giving military education to Indians with a view to make India self-reliant for defence. We have no doubt that India will be able to defend herself within a short time if arrangements are made for giving higher military education to Indians, which should be done without delay.

81. As for defence, and army, we suggest the creation of a Defence Committee, to be elected from amongst the members of the Central Legislature, to advise the Government on military affairs. Let the Army Department be for a time reserved, but the creation of this committee will keep the executive Government in close touch with the Indian point of view, and the Indians with the Imperial point of view.

Foreign Relations.

82. This is a question of Imperial policy which has to remain in the hands of the Imperial Government. Except the Departments of Defence and Foreign Relations, all other departments should be transferred.

Statement on behalf of the Provincial Conference Committee of the Sardars and Inamdars of the Bombay Presidency.

1. We present this statement on behalf of the Provincial Conference Committee of the Sardars and Inamdars.

The first Provincial Conference was held at Satara under the auspices of the Inamdars' Central Association, Satara. It was due to an idea to widen the scope of the activities of the Associations for consideration of the problems regarding the class. The Associations are restricted to members and the Conference is open to all.

The second Conference was held at Poona, under the auspices of the Deccan Sardars' and Dumaldars' Sabha, Poona. At the Conference a Resolution was passed creating a constitution and the formation of an Executive Committee. The Committee includes representatives from all the Districts.

The Executive Committe is empowered to carry on the work on behalf of the Conference. The Executive Committee decided at its meeting to present a case and appointed a Sub-Committee. The Sub-Committee drafted the statement in accordance with the spirit of the Resolutions passed at the Conferences. The draft was discussed and finally approved by the Committee on the 29th July, 1928.

The Office bearers of the Executive Committee are:

Sardar V. N. Mutalik, B.A., Ex-member of the Bombay Legislative Council. (1921-23) and Ex-member of the Legislative Assembly (1924-26) and was elected by the Deccan Sardars and Inamdars in the 1st case, and by the Sardars and Inamdars of the Presidency in the 2nd and President of the Inamdars' Central Association, Satara, and of the 1st Conference.—Chairman.

Sardar K.C. Mehendale, B.A., President, Deccan Sardars' and Dumaldars' Sabha, Poona.—Vice-President.

Shrimant Sardar Shri Jagannath Maharaj Pandit, 1st Class Sardar of the Deccan, Hony. Secretary, Deccan Sardars' and Dumaldars' Sabha, Poona, —

Shrimant Nanasaheb Mutalik, B.A., LL.B., Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Inamdars' Central Association, Satara. Shrimant R. R. Jahagirdar of Bhuyar, Secretary of the Bijapur District Inamdars' Association, Shrimant Jayaramdas B. Desai, M.L.C., Secretary, Gujarath Inamdars' and Talukdars' Association.—Secretaries.

Most of the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the different Inamdars' Associations are members of the Executive body.

The statement is mainly restricted to the Resolutions passed at the last two Conferences.

The awakening in this class may be said to have begun since the passing of the Land Revenue Code, Act V. of 1879. In 1880, Deccan Sardars' and Dumaldars' Association was started at Poona. Such Associations were subsequently formed at Nasik, Bijapur and Dharwar. The Inamdar's Central Association was formed at Satara in 1915. Similar Associations were afterwards formed in the Ratnagiri, East Khandesh, Ahmednagar, and Sholapur Districts.

2. Most of these Associations joined in the deputation to the Right Honourable Mr. Montagu and His Excellency the Viceroy Lord Chelmsford in 1917. The Inamdars' Central Association submitted further memorandum to the Joint Parliamentary Committee as well as to the Franchise and Functions Committees. A statement was also submitted to the Muddiman Committee.

The Sardars, Talukdars, Inamdars and Vatandars form the Aristocracy of this Presidency. They rank in the social order just below the Ruling Princes. The members of this class are the descendants of the persons who founded empires, led armies, fought wars and carried on Civil Administration in former times. The estates, owned, are in many cases the result of conquests. The custom in many places was that part of the conquests was given to the person who succeeded in winning the war. Many of the families, now classed as Sardars and Inamdars, were at one time principalities or States enjoying territorial powers, under one Government or another. In some cases they were independent princes.

The families settled new areas and helped to develop the country and were the main supporters of learning, art and craft, which flourished under their paternal care. This class is described in the famous Montagu-Chelmsford Report in paras. 147 and 148.

As can be naturally expected, this class is literate and cultured, and imbued with the powers, capacity and art of Government and possessed the Political sense to serve the interests of the Nation.

3. The Executive Committee of the Provincial Conference of the Sardars and Inamdars of the Bombay Presidency (proper) painfully notes the fact that it considers it necessary to differ from the views of a large body of the general public of this Presidency in offering this statement, when the public opinion of the politically minded section is against giving any statement before the Commission. We, however, do maintain the right of the Indians to have the preponderating voice to settle the constitution of the country, even with the existence of the preamble to the Government of India Act.

4. The Executive Committe offers a suggestion that the views of the enlightened political leaders and sections of the country should receive full consideration at the hands of the Commission, even though they may not be before the Commission in due form. The views are expressed in the debates of the Legislatures, especially in the debates of the Legislative Assembly, on various occasions. The All-Parties Conference have prepared a Constitution, embodying the demands of the public, or that section of the public which commands respect. The decision to refrain from giving any evidence before this Commission by a very large body of the politically minded public, who are really entitled to present the case of the nation, has a deep meaning and significance. It is a matter of grave importance that the whole body of politicians of all schools, should concur in views when the destinies of the whole nation are in making. By our position, we stand between the people and Government, and in that capacity we earnestly request the Commission to give due consideration and weight to the views of the persons and bodies, whose views deserve the attention in the inquiry of this nature as this Commission is making. We also request the Commission to find out a way to receive the first-hand views of the leaders.

5. We do not propose to express detailed views on the Reforms, but we express our views in a general way. In case the Commission desires any details, the representatives of this Body will orally state the views. We propose to state our case for the representation on the Legislatures and on the powers of legislatures as affecting our interests.

6. We think, after mature consideration, that the time has come when a substantial advancement should be made in the Constitution of India. We stand for Self-Government for India within the British Empire. The Aristocracy and the Landed Gentry, whom we have the honour and privilege to represent, welcome the great national awakening, and are prepared to work hand in hand provided our individuality is maintained. We feel confident that self-governing India will be a great asset for the British Empire. We feel that there is a strong demand for a constitutional advancement. The experience gained during the last eight years of Reforms period warrants the advancement. We are of opinion that although the Reforms were not worked under very congenial conditions, they have proved the potential capacity of the people for representative Government. There is an increasing awakening amongst the people. They are showing keener interest in the working of the representative institution. We feel confident that the results of the working of the Reforms would have been far more satisfactory, had there been no communal feeling and intercommunal hatred exhibited in the fields of politics. We, as the aristocracy and the landed gentry, having great stake in the country, extremely regret the communal tension. We feel that it has great pernicious effect on the development of national sentiment.

7. We think that time has come for the grant of complete autonomy for the provinces. We, however, urge that full protection for vested interests is absolutely necessary. In pressing for provincial autonomy we want to make it clear that we urge strongly, with all the force at our command, that Legislature should not be invested with any control or power over the solemn engagements and promises already made by previous Governments and recognised and continued by the present British Government. The treaties or engagements with the Indian Princes, the Sanads of lands and villages given to Sardars, Inamdars and Vatandars must remain untouched. The rights and privileges of the holders should not be allowed to be interfered with. The Legislatures should have no power to levy directly or indirectly any tax on lands and incomes which Government have declared as free from any additional taxation. Restriction of power is absolutely necessary in such cases in the interest of the vested interests.

8. From the very beginning of the Reforms Inquiry this class is urging for the protection of vested interests in transferring power of Government to popular control. We quote a passage from the address presented to H.E. the Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford and the Right Hon. Mr. Montagu, the then Secretary of State, by our Associations.

"10. That these Associations humbly pray that Inamdars and Vatandars should be allowed to enjoy undisturbed all the rights and privileges that they have been enjoying in connection with their alienated holdings; and that, in the true spirit of the Proclamation of Her Imperial and Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria of Blessed Memory, no encroachments be made upon their rights."

9. Under British Government this class has suffered most from intentional indifference of Government, and is purposely pushed back. Before the British Government was established in this part the Inamdars and Vatandars were in full power in their villages and exercised a good deal of power, control and influence outside their villages. Besides the full rights over the land revenue they had the right to levy taxes like tolls, taxes on market places, to give licenses for sale and various other minor taxes in their villages. In some cases they had a right to levy custom duties. They exercised full criminal and civil powers, though in cases the powers were limited. They exercised control over the hereditary village officers and servants and the village servants had to work for the Inamdars. They had also full revenue powers.

10. In the early period of the British Government these powers were exercised by the Inamdars. The grip was tightened very gradually and the period that followed may be said to be the dark period for this class. One by one the powers were withdrawn, the protest of Inamdars proving to be unavailing. In spite of the promises for the maintenance of dignity, rights and privileges of Inamdars and Sardars, the general trend of policy of Government came to be the curtailment of their power and influence in their own villages and in the general public.

11. This class was promised posts in higher services in all departments. Preference was shown to the candidates from this class. The tide has turned now. We are never given preference, but even suitable candidates have not sufficient chance of getting in now. The promises given in former times have been thrown to the wind.

12. We are being reduced to nonentities. With growing awakening in the class we are forced to fight for every inch, but we have no advocate in Government or in services. We are gradually dispossessed of our control over the village officers. Every step taken in this connection is calculated to lower the dignity and undermine the influence which we hold in the country.

13. This class possesses a keen sense of duty for the welfare of the public and public duty and political advancement of the nation. Many of them have served with distinction on local Self-Government bodies and as honorary magistrates. We quote here what the famous Montagu-Chelmsford Report has said about this class. The Report has also laid down a policy to be followed with regard to this class in para. 148.

> "By position, influence and education they are fitted to take a leading part in public affairs. Some of them are beginning to do so, and our aim must be to call many more of them into public life. * * *"

These words hold good to-day, and we urge that this class should be offered opportunities and proper facilities to play their part in the new order of things. The policy has been laid down, but we regretfully note that it was not followed during this first period of Reforms, in this Presidency.

14. Extent of Interest.—The interests of this class are extensive in this Presidency. In the Presidency proper, exclusive of Sind, villages and lands assessed at Rs. 1,09,77,292 are alienated to this class. The land revenue of Bombay Government is, roughly, Rs. 4,30,00,000. There is scarcely any village in this Presidency which has not alienations of lands—2,077 villages out of the total number of 20,835, villages of the Presidency are wholly alienated. Roughly speaking this class holds one-tenth the number of villages and one-fourth the land revenue.

15. The alienations are distributed in the various revenue divisions of the Presidency in the following way:—

Division.	Number of alienated Villages.	Net Alienated Revenue.
Northern Division ...	266½	Rs. 25,49,800
Central ,, ...	1,048¾	,, 28,42,174
Southern ,, ...	717	,, 18,20,844
Bombay Suburban Division	48	,, 58,636

16. Our estates were originally tax-free. Still we contribute to the public Exchequer to the extent of about Rs. 37,00,000. This tax was imposed on us since the advent of the British rule, after some inquiries by Inam Commissions. Besides this tax called the Judi, we also contribute to all local taxes to the extent of Rs. 25,00,000, as well as other taxes.

17. In society this class wields a good deal of influence, even in spite of the democratic currents in the nation.

18. Representation in the Legislature.—By a convention established since 1861, when councils came into existence, a representative from this class was nominated to the Provincial Council till the year 1892. By the reforms of the year 1892, when the representation by-election came into existence, a seat was assigned to this class, and only the Sardars of the Deccan were enfranchised to send a representative to the Legislative Council. In 1908, under the Morley-Minto Reforms, three seats were given to this class, viz.: (1) Sardars of the Deccan, (2) Sardars of the Guzarath, an Order newly created in 1909, (3) Sind Zamindars. Under the reforms of 1908 one seat was assigned to this interest on the Imperial Council, which went by rotation to Sind Zamindars and Sardars of Gujarath and Sind Zamindars and Sardars of the Deccan. The Sardars of the Deccan had no chance to send representative to the Imperial Council under the Morley-Minto reforms.

19. In the Reforms of 1919 the representation of the "Landholders" was originally kept at the same strength and for the same constituencies, but the rotation was changed. The Sardars of the Deccan and Guzarath were formed into one constituency which shared the representation to the Assembly with Sind Zamindars by alternate turn. However, on representation to the Joint Parliamentary Committee the class of Inamdars was added to the Sardars of the Presidency, but the strength of the representation was kept at the original level. We represented to the Joint Parliamentary Committee about the increase in the number of our representation to the legislatures. The Joint Parliamentary Committee recommended reconsideration of the representation of the "Landholders," but the matter did not receive any further consideration.

20. Under the present Act three seats are allotted to the "Landholders" on the Provincial Council, out of which only two are for the Presidency proper, and one goes for the Sind.

21. On the Central Legislature, only one seat is allotted to the Landholders and is shared by the Sardars and Inamdars of the Presidency proper and the Zamindars of Sind. The Zamindars of Sind were given the first chance of sending one representative and in the history of the representative government in India we could send only one representative to the Legislative Assembly, although Sind Zamindars had four times to their lot. We note with regret that we are most unjustly treated in our representation to the Central Legislature. The whole class feels for this and looks upon it as an insult to the class.

22. On the Provincial Council the Deccan and the Karnatick Landholders, who formed the oldest constituency for sending a representative of the Landholders, has suffered by neglect and indifference. The largest number of Inamdars and Sardars is in the Central Division and the next largest number being taken by the Southern Division. Guzarath Sardars and Inamdars have the least number of all. Only one seat on the Legislative Council is given to the Sardars and Inamdars of the two largest divisions, while one seat is given to the Sardars and Inamdars of Guzarath, a division which has the least number of the voters and also the least number of Inam or alienated villages.

23. In other Presidencies five seats are given for the representation of the Landholders on the Provincial Councils, whereas the treatment accorded to this class in this Presidency is most unsatisfactory, as the seats allotted are only three.

24. The Landholders' Constituency is free from any idea of communal bias or feeling. Only the special interest is recognised in forming this constituency. The constituencies consist of all castes and communities and we are glad to note that there is never any jarring note due to communal feeling.

25. There is considerable growth of political education and a sense to serve the nation. Leading members of this class are not only taking keen interest in the welfare movement for the class, but many of them are serving the public cause and working for the benefit of the nation in various fields. This class has the advantage that it can afford more leisure to be devoted to politics. We are conscious that our best men are at present outshone. We admit we have made a late start in politics. We have every hope that, looking to the present progress, what is lost in time will be gained by our natural influence in the society and by the time that we shall be able to devote for the work. We feel confident that, given proper facilities and better opportunities, the aristocracy as a class will be able to wield a great healthy influence on the national political field.

26. We have our associations and provincial conferences. The deliberations are on a high level and compare favourably with the debates and deliberations in any other political body.

27. Our special advantage is that by our position as Inamdars we are able to understand and appreciate the difficulties of administration. We especially note that it is unfortunate that we are excluded from any share in the administration during the last half a century, and have been thus deprived of an opportunity to prove our capacity and ability.

28. There will be a great advantage to legislature by giving increased representation to this class. No class is better fitted to represent the rural areas than this class, as it is the only class with culture and education that comes directly in contact with the rural areas. Most of the representatives in the Legislatures come from the cities from a class that have no opportunities to know the rural areas by having direct touch with their grievances and wants, nor can they help the rural development as our class can, if opportunities are given to it. The framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report recognise this fact and say, in para. 148:—

> "No men are better qualified to advise with understanding and great natural shrewdness on the great mass of rural questions which will come before the Provincial Legislatures."

The Future Constitution and the Representation of this Class.

29. We are more in favour of a Single Chamber Legislature in the Provinces. It may be noted that our representatives at the first inquiry of Reforms urged for a Second Chamber in the Provinces. The experience gained in the Central Legislature leads us to believe that Second Chambers in the Provinces will not serve much useful purpose. The reserve powers of the Governors and of the Governor-General, with the power to return a measure for reconsideration, will serve a sufficient safeguard against hasty judgment or legislation. We have grave doubts whether the cost that will have to be incurred and the time and energy that the Executive Government will have to devote for the work in the Second Chamber will be justified by the results.

30. Our considered view is that Second Chambers should not be introduced in the Provinces, provided there is adequate representation of the classes on the legislatures. In this connection we propose formation of new non-communal general constituencies with a wide territorial area.

31. We have already expressed our view that full provincial autonomy should be given. We also propose that nominations should be done away with on all representative bodies. The officials should be allowed to explain and speak in the Legislative Council but they should have no right to vote. The Ministers should be helped by Council Secretaries.

32. On the Provincial Council we urge for a substantial increase in the representation of the "Landholders." In spite of the large expansion of the number of the members of the Provincial Council, the representation of this class, and particularly that of the Landholders, Sardars and Inamdars of the Deccan and Karnatic is kept at the antediluvian period of representation. We submit that twelve seats should be assigned to this class. The seats should be distributed by Revenue Divisions or on the linguistic basis or on the basis of different tenures. We have already given the table showing the alienated villages and the alienated land revenue in different divisions. The distribution should be on the voting strength and the extent of interest. We also propose two separate seats for the Watandars, and one for the Khots, who have a distinctly separate tenure.

33. The present constituency should be enlarged in case more seats are assigned to this special interest. The present qualification for a voter in this constituency is that a person must be either a Sardar of the Deccan or Guzarath or that he must be a sole holder of a whole alienated village. Before the present Reforms the qualification was the enlistment in the list of Sardars. We now propose one of the following qualifications for a voter in this constituency.

(1) Sardars of the Deccan or Guzarath.
(2) Sole holder of a whole alienated village.
(3) Holder of a share in an alienated village, the revenue of the share being assessed in the records of Government at not less than Rs. 500 annually.

(4) Holder of alienated land, assessed at Rs. 500.

(5) Holder of a Sharakati alienated village.

34. As we propose separate seats for Watandars, it naturally follows that the holder of watan lands should have no right to be a voter in this constituency. We advocate separate seats for Vatandars, because the tenures on which they hold the lands are different and they are governed by a separate act called the Vatan Act. They hold the lands on the condition of rendering some services, most of which are now commuted. The Vatandars whose services are not commuted have their special grievances, and also special privileges. In case Vatandars are not recognised as a separate interest for representation, they may be treated as ordinary Inamdars.

35. Khots also are a class by themselves. They are not included in the Inamdars. This class is often attacked in the Council, and finds no advocate in the House, and their case goes by default. The House is ill-informed on this question and judges questions only on the arguments of the prosecution.

36. We have every confidence that the demand for twelve seats distributed amongst all these interests will not be considered to be unreasonable.

37. We have already stated that there should be no Second Chamber in the Provinces. If, however, it is decided to establish a Second Chamber, our view is that there should be no communal bias in that chamber and the constituencies should be non-communal. The distribution of seats should be by divisions. The constituencies should be formed to return not less than four or five members. There should be no reservation for any community. The basis of franchise should be maintained at a high level and should be based both on education and property. But provision should also be made for representation of special interests.

38. We propose that Dyarchy should be introduced in the Central Government. We are of opinion that the system is defective and cannot work well. Still as a make-shift arrangement we propose that the system should be tried in the Central Government. There are a number of departments in the Central Government which can safely be entrusted to the control and management of the Ministers, appointed from the elected members of both the Houses.

Representation on the Central Legislature of this Class.

39. The "Landholders" were never satisfied by the most meagre and inadequate representation allotted to them on the Central and Provincial Legislatures. Ever since the scheme of Reforms was out some of our Associations have expressed strongly on the point and lodged protests. We have sent memorials to Government. Our representative on the Central Legislature sent a memorial to the Viceroy to make up the injustice by nomination to the Assembly. He also urged before the Muddiman Committee that no further step in the Reforms should be taken unless the Landholders of this presidency are given adequate representation in the Legislatures. A Resolution was tabled in the Assembly but could not be moved for want of time. This class feels very strongly for the want of representation on the Assembly for three years alternately. Our Provincial Conferences have passed resolutions requesting Government to arrange for our continuous representation on the Legislative Assembly. The inconvenience is felt alike by the constituency in Sind as well as in the Presidency proper.

40. Under the present arrangement, the "Landholders" of the whole of the Bombay Presidency have one seat only, which is shared alternately by the Sind Zamindars and the Sardars and Inamdars of the Presidency Proper. This leaves one of the Constituencies always without representation on the Central Legislature, where the destinies of the country are moulded. There is a continuous seat for the Landholders of every other province and they enjoy a continuous and unbroken representation. Sind for all purposes is practically a separate province and ought to have been treated as such for the representation of this class. There is absolutely no similarity between the Sind Zamindars and the Inamdars of the Presidency Proper. The tenures are different. The problems affecting are altogether different and even the social and political development of the two constituencies is altogether different. It is impossible that a representative of either constituency can represent the views of the other constituency. There are two or three other constituencies which have alternate representation on the Legislative Assembly. In their case the inconvenience is not felt so much as there is a great similarity of interest and views, In the case of the Landholders of this Presidency the case is different, and there is no other representative who can express the views. In fact, in the Central Legislature, our voice is completely shut up for three years. We emphatically urge that this is the greatest injustice done to us, and that this is a most anomalous position, which cannot be found anywhere in the history of representation to Legislatures. If Indian Legislature is to reflect the views of all classes, why this class should be excluded for alternate life of the Assembly passes our comprehension.

41. The system of alternate representation is a great hindrance to the political education of the constituency. It does not help to keep up interest in the general current of events. It deprives the constituencies of the highly valued privilege of a voice in the moulding of the destinies of the nation, and above all, it deprives us of the opportunity to serve the nation in the best possible way.

42. We urge and request earnestly that three seats should be given to this interest on the Legislative Assembly. The constituency should be one for the whole of the Presidency proper. We can state that even if all the major provinces are given representation for the Landholders on this scale, it will not materially affect the balance of parties in the Legislative Assembly. The Assembly will have the advantage of the views of a section which has the greatest stake in the country. It will also help the formation of a separate party, which will be able to create a healthy balance of parties.

Representation on Local Boards.

43. We are not quite sure if representation on the Local Board is within the scope of the inquiry of this Commission, and how far we will be justified in referring to it.

44. Before the Local Board Act of 1923 was enacted the Inamdars had one representative on every Local Board. That representative in most cases proved to be one of the leading members of the Board and was very useful to the Board. They occupied responsible posts on the Boards and rendered their duties creditably, and the fact was recognised on all hands.

45. A Committee appointed by the Government of Bombay in connection with the Boards, under the Chairmanship of Mr. Lawrence, now Sir Henry Lawrence, recommended that two seats should be given to the Inamdars instead of the one then existing. We were all surprised to find that in the new Bill, which is now passed into the Act, the provision for the representation of the Inamdars was dropped, and, instead of that, there came the obnoxious provision for representation for the Mahomedans, even though there was no demand for the same.

46. The local boards are really the pivot or the basis of self-governing institutions. It is the foundation and the training ground for the councils. The boards play a great part in influencing the elections. The local boards give an opportunity to come in direct contact with the villages and study first hand the grievances and the requirements of the people of the district. They give an opportunity to serve the people first hand and they can be the real places where to educate the electorates. To shut away the Inamdars from these bodies is doing them great injustice. It is going directly against the spirit of the framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. The aristocracy should have been given more representation on the boards, as recommended by the Committee. We feel sure that the Inamdars will be a great asset on the boards and will be able to serve the deliberations with great profit to the boards and to the general public.

Similarly, the demand on the part of the Inamdars to be the head of the Village Panchayats in their villages is most natural. No body will feel for the people in the village than the Inamdar of the village. He will always start with a paternal feeling for the people of his village. The people also have more trust in him than in the official head of the village. In fact, we claim that it is more for the benefit of the people, as well as for the development of the cordial relations of the people with the Inamdar, that it is necessary that the Inamdar should be the Surpanch of the Village Panchayat, if such a body is brought into existence in an alienated village. If it be objected that Inamdars are not residing in the villages, we are prepared to say that the statutary right to be the Surpanch should be restricted in the cases where the Inamdar is a resident of the village.

We earnestly request the Commission to make some recommendation on the point. The more the aristocracy and the gentry have opportunities to mix amongst the people the more it is beneficial to the whole community.

47. Services.—The position of all-India services has become peculiarly difficult and delicate under the new order. We have noted that the services have generally worked the reforms loyally and helped to make them a success. The Legislatures were treated with respect by the services.

48. We note in the first instance that there is a distinct deterioration in the efficiency of the services since the communal considerations crept in the recruitment of the Indians. We can fully understand and appreciate a recruitment on communal basis provided the qualifications are equal and up to the standard required, and the rights of the existing members of the services are not neglected or overlooked. The present way of recruitment on communal considerations has a pernicious effect on the services. Undue preference for promotion is shown, and mistakes, want of discipline and inefficiency are condoned only on communal consideration, even if they are not a passport for special promotion.

49. We urge that in future the recruitment of the all-India Services should be on condition that they have to serve under full provincial autonomy and transfer of any number of departments in the Government of India. We feel that the Public Services Commission is a sufficient guarantee to the services. Instituting of provincial public service commissions deserves consideration.

50. We urge strongly that suitable candidates from the landed aristocracy and gentry should be given a preference in the recruitment, provided candidates have required qualifications. The principle of preference has been introduced, and we claim a preference for a class which had a big share in the services and which is the most suitable class for higher services. In the past promising young men were appointed to highest posts in various departments on consideration of high birth. The reason for neglecting this class for recruitment in the services may be found in the fact that it is not a strong body in politics. We think that men with a stake in the country prove to be superior to any ordinary men in services. We have constantly pressed this point on Government. We do urge that this request should receive best consideration at the hands of the Commission. We think that the representation of this class in services is more important than the representation of the communities in the interest of the services and of the nation.

51. We claim representation from the highest to the lower services. In all other provinces except Bombay the aristrocracy is treated with much better consideration. We are up to now denied a chance of serving on the highest post in Government. We mean in the Executive Council. In other Presidencies the aristocracy has secured a seat on Government. In this Presidency the Government has yet to think and try to find out a suitable candidate from this class.

52. Communalism and its Effects on Representative Bodies and the Council.—We have said that recruitment based on communal considerations has led to the loss of efficiency, favouritism and discontent amongst the more efficient but less favoured class of officials. We further say that the result of the communal feeling is equally pernicious and unfortunate in local self-governing bodies and in the Legislative Councils. We are of opinion that there is a decided deterioration in the working of the local bodies, in spite of the greater interest shown by the public. Communal good is the only consideration and the sense of justice and fair play or the national good is always made to serve the second fiddle. All parties based on communal considerations cannot be expected to have the broad national outlook. It is wrong in principle to encourage this feeling or help the growth.

53. We advocate that the first necessary step is to do away with separate communal electorates and communal representation in services. If anything is demoralising in politics it is the communal consideration in services without the necessary qualifications. No new communal constituencies should be created and there should be joint electorates for the existing ones if they are to be continued with reservation of seats.

54. The necessary concomitance of any communal party is the hatred of other communities and particularly of the more advanced classes and communities. The cult of hatred is advocated openly in the Press and on the platform, and it is a pity that the conduct of authorities is always such as can be interpreted to help the growth directly or indirectly. The direct result of the reforms is a scramble of securing the votes in the Council, which has a sad aspect on the public life. This battle for securing votes has led further to emphasise and to cement the communal tension.

55. In conclusion, we submit to the Commission that:—

(1) The Commission should take into full consideration the views of the public leaders of the nation, even though the people do not offer the statement.

(2) The vested interests should be given full protection.

(3) There should be provincial autonomy and an Indian Federation, within the British Empire, with full Dominion status.

(4) Single Chamber Government will be more suitable.

(5) The Landed Aristocracy and Gentry should have adequate representation on the Councils, so that they should be in a position to influence the Councils.

(6) The communal representation should be done away with in the elections as well as in the services, as far as possible. If communal representation is to be retained the electorates should be joint and not separate.

(7) The Landholders should have representation on the Local Boards.

(8) The Inamdars should be Surpanch in the Village Panchayat if it is instituted in an alienated village.

(9) The Inamdars and Sardars should have fair representation in the services from the highest to the lower.

POONA.

Dated, 22nd October, 1928.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT RAJA NAWAB ALI KHAN), AND OF THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Sardars' and Inamdars' Central Association, Bombay Presidency.

1. Sardar V. N. Mutalik (President)—Spokesman.
2. Sardar N. G. Vinchurkar.
3. Sardar K. C. Mehendale.
4. Shri Nana Saheb Mutalik.
5. Shri P. A. Inamdar.
6. Shri Sarda Jagannath Maharaj Pundit.

1. Chairman: Sardar Mutalik, I understand this is a deputation from the Sardars and Inamdars of the Bombay Presidency?—Yes.

2. I think you are the President of the Central Association of Sardars and Inamdars?—Yes.

3. We have all seen the interesting memorandum which you have put forward, and we understand, I think, your general view, because you have stated it very clearly. * * * As things stand at present, what is the representation of Sardars and Inamdars in the Bombay Legislative Council?—Three.

4. There are three members elected by the Sardars and Inamdars?—Two elected by the Sardars and Inamdars of the Bombay Presidency proper and one by the Zamindars of Sind.

5. For our present purposes, we are treating the Presidency as having its present boundaries. I see you have one gentleman who represents the landowners of Gujarat?—Yes.

6. Another gentleman, whom we know very well (our colleague, Sardar Mujumdar), represents the landowners of the Deccan, and a third gentleman represents the landowners of Sind. That is the situation so far as the present representation in the Bombay Legislative Council is concerned?—Yes.

7. As regards the Legislative Assembly, you have some representation there, have you not?—We have one representative, representing alternately the Presidency proper and Sind.

8. * * * Is the present member from Sind or from the Presidency proper?—From Sind.

9. How is your representative in the Legislative Assembly appointed? Is he elected?—He is elected.

* * * * *

10. Mr. Cadogan: I understand that you base your claim for larger representation mainly on the consideration that you are the only cultured class that comes into contact with the village communities?—It is not the only class that comes in contact with the village people. We base our claim mainly on the fact that we form a steadying influence in the Presidency. We are not carried away by the whims and exigencies of election times, and we will be the proper persons to exercise a steadying influence on the Legislative Council.

11. Without going into details in regard to figures, you hold about one-tenth of the number of Government villages, and one-fourth of the land revenue?—Yes.

12. That is in the Presidency proper?—Yes.

13. On the subject about which the Chairman was speaking just now—representation on the Council—I understand you complained not only that you are inadequately represented, but of the distribution of seats in the Presidency?—That is another complaint we have, yes.

14. You complain that that distribution is wrong?—Yes.

15. I should like to get that clear. You have one seat for the Northern Division, exclusive of Sind?—Yes.

16. And you have only one seat for the Central and Southern Divisions combined?—Yes.

17. Would there be a larger number of villages in the Southern and Central Divisions combined than in the Northern Division?—Yes.

18. A very much larger number?—Very much larger.

19. What is your scheme for larger representation? How many seats do you suggest?—We have suggested twelve seats.

20. Twelve seats altogether? And how many for the Legislative Assembly?—For the Assembly we have suggested three.

21. Instead of only one, which you hold in rotation with Sind?—Yes.

22. With regard to the franchise, I understand you to say that at present only the holder of a whole village has a vote?—Yes.

23. Your suggestion is that where a village is held by a number of Zamindars they should meet together and select a representative voter. Is that your suggestion?—Yes.

24. How do you propose that should be done?—Either all the shareholders should select one representative to vote or the largest shareholder should be called on to vote.

25. Mr. Cadogan: My question was, how would the various holders select the representative voter?—They will select him from amongst themselves.

26. And if they cannot agree?—Then the largest shareholder will come in.

27. Are there Inamdars who hold only Inam land and not villages?—Yes, a number.

28. How do you suggest they should have the franchise?—We suggest that holders of alienated lands assessed at Rs. 500 and over should be enrolled as voters.

29. Would you be prepared to give your view as to the expediency of having a Second Chamber in the Presidency?—Our scheme does not favour the institution of second chambers.

30. Broadly speaking, you are against the principle?—Broadly speaking, we accept the principle that a second chamber would have a restraining influence, but in view of the difficulties arising from conditions in the Presidency and in the country at large, and of the time the executive government would have to devote to the work of the second chamber, we have suggested another course, which is, in effect, to have a combined chamber where the interests who would normally form a second chamber will be represented and exercise a restraining influence. If this is not possible we shall not object to a second chamber.

31. Chairman: I am not entirely clear on one point, namely, who are on the present list of voters and who choose the representative of the Sardars and Inamdars. Taking the Sardars first, who are on the voting list?—All persons listed as Sardars under the Political Department by the resolution of the Bombay Government.

32. So that the position of a Sardar, in case of doubt, is recognised and put down on the list by the authorities?—Yes, there cannot be any doubt.

33. As far as that is concerned, are you satisfied with that?—Yes.

34. That is all right?—Yes.

35. Besides the Sardars, there are the Inamdars?—Yes.

36. How is the list of Inamdars decided on?—The holders of villages are entered on the Government records.

37. And necessarily must be?—Yes.

38. In connection with revenue records?—Yes.

39. So there is no doubt as to who they are?—No uncertainty can exist.

40. Just one other question. How many voters are there in the total constituency?—Under the present arrangements, the total constituency, taking all the divisions together, is about 700.

41. You are excluding Sind?—Yes.

42. Excluding altogether the member who represents the Sind landowners, there are two others, one for Gujarat and the other for the Deccan?—There are two other constituencies, yes.

43. When you say 700 you are adding those two together?—Yes.

44. Are the numbers about the same in each?—No. The number of voters in the Deccan and Karnatak Divisions combined is about 560.

45. So that is the larger one?—Yes.

46. And the number in Gujarat?—Is about 140.

47. Are the holdings, on the average, larger in the Gujarat area?—The holdings of land are larger.

48. Major Attlee: Am I right in thinking that Inamdars do not pay any land revenue in respect of their Inam lands?—Originally we were not obliged to pay land revenue, but we pay a duty or tax of one-quarter of our land revenue to Government and we pay death duties also.

49. That is less than the ordinary landowner pays? You pay a quarter of what the ordinary landowner would pay?—We pay a quarter of our whole income.

50. That amounts to the same thing; if it was not Inam land it would pay four times as much as you pay?—Yes.

51. I think you pay no income tax in respect of agricultural income?—At present agricultural income is excluded from income tax.

52. On the basis that the people who want representation should pay taxation there would not seem to be very much claim from the point of view of the Inamdars. You do not pay much in the shape of taxation?—I think we are the most heavily taxed people.

53. How so?—Because the original grants of our estates were tax-free, without any land tax, but we have consented to pay one-quarter towards the public revenue. Besides that we are paying death duties, which come to 6½ per cent., and we pay local taxes also, as well as all other general taxes.

54. Setting aside the question of what happened originally, what grants were made and so on, and taking the Inamdar and comparing him with other owners of land, he gets off lightly?—He gets off lightly if you say he does not pay the assessment to the full extent.

55. Taking the landowners as a whole, you are claiming 12 seats for the Sardars and Inamdars?—Yes.

56. Do those Sardars and Inamdars work their land at all themselves?—Many of them do.

57. Do they look after their estates?—Yes.

58. What do they do for their tenants?—We do all we are empowered to do. In fact, one by one all the powers of doing good to our tenants are being taken away from us, and Government has assumed all the responsibility. The whole policy of the Government of Bombay has been to take away the power of the Inamdars to do good to their tenants and cut off any contact between the Inamdars and their tenants.

59. They remove from you all the burden of doing anything for your tenants?—Yes.

60. Why should you want special representation under those circumstances? What is your claim?—The interest we have in the Presidency proper as a restraining influence.

61. Restraining in respect of what?—The principle of having a second chamber is recognised in all legislatures, and that sort of influence could be exerted by these constituencies.

62. I suppose the members of your association are men of considerable local influence, leading opinion in their districts?—Yes.

63. Why should not they obtain election in the usual course, in a general electorate?—There is a prejudice against this class, as there always is against the big landowners; and that generally comes out at the time of elections.

64. Supposing you stood in a general constituency, you would be able to influence the general electorate and the population generally?—Not unless we accepted the party ticket for the time being; we will have no chance unless we accept the ticket, and in that case we, as Inamdars, will not be represented, for even in the Legislature we should have to work according to the ticket.

65. Has not it sometimes been found that people who ask for a special and privileged position are apt to find that that prejudices them in the eyes of the rest of the population, as you suggested just now?—I think that is the case. There is a sort of prejudice against the Inamdars. I think it exists in every country.

66. I quite agree with you; but you still think a representation, which could not, of course, be a majority representation——?—We do not claim a majority in the Council.

67. You still think that sort of representation is necessary to safeguard your interests?—Yes, we think it is necessary to safeguard our interests and to give us an opportunity to serve the country, too.

68. Take the local boards. I think you formerly had a claim to one Inamdar's seat on the district board?—Yes.

69. What is there to prevent you being elected to the district board now?—We shall have to stand in a general election if we want to be elected.

70. Well, and why not?—Some of us have stood.

71. We sometimes think that elections, whatever may be their defects, are rather educative to the people who stand as well as to the people who vote?—Yes.

72. If you stand apart in a separate electorate are you not hindering the general advance of the community in which you live by keeping separate from them?—I think experience has proved the contrary. The Inamdars chosen up to now have been the best men that could be had on local bodies, and they have also helped to educate the electorates.

73. Chairman: May I just ask this for my information. Is there at present, or has there ever been, on the Bombay Council a Sardar or Inamdar elected for a general constituency?—Two or three have got in on the communal or party ticket; that is all.

74. Colonel Lane-Fox: I did not quite understand what you meant when you said the Government had taken away from the landowners their chance of helping their tenants?—In some respects we are now practically merely the receivers of land revenue. We receive it (land revenue of the villages) through another agency, that of Government, so that direct contact between ourselves and our tenants is not obtained at the present moment.

75. I do not quite understand what opportunities the Government have taken away from you. I am a large landowner, and I have to do a great deal and get very little out of it. I want to know how it is you are in a different position from me?—We are in a different position from yourself in respect of being holders of whole villages. Practically in your country you are the real masters of the land; you are real landlords. We are not real landlords in that respect; we only receive land revenue as settled by Government in some respects, and in other respects we receive it as you do, as holders of land. We are holders of land as well as holders of villages, and there is a difference between the two classes of Inams. In one we are in direct touch and can work for tenants. In the second, viz., as holders of villages we receive the revenue through Government agency and are cut off from the tenantry.

76. Lord Strathcona: You say you want 12 representatives on the new Legislative Council. On what do you base your figure of 12?—We base our figure on the expansion of the Legislative Council since 1861, and not only on that, but on the ground that there should be a sufficient number of representatives of this class in the Legislative Council.

77. Dr. Ambedkar: You say that you represent special interests?—Yes.

78. Can you tell me what are the special interests that your constituency would represent as distinct from the interests of the rural population?—As holders of the whole of the villages.

79. I take it that you represent property?—Yes, in a way.

80. Your interest is that you hold property?—Yes.

81. And, therefore, you want representation in the Legislative Council?—Yes.

82. I put it to you whether there are other property holders who are not Inamdars?—There are. They will have representation, and they have it, I think.

83. My point is this. If your interest is merely the interest of property, then, having regard to the fact that there are also other property holders, although they do not happen to be Inamdars, would not they represent your case, whatever your case may be, in the Legislative Council?—Certainly not. They will represent the interests of other property. Ours is a special sort of property, governed by special rules and special Acts.

84. Then your position is this: you claim representation in order to retain the privilege which you now enjoy, namely, that you enjoy property tax free? That is what you claim, is it not?—That would be only with regard to our own interest. That is one claim that we put forward for this representation, but there are other claims.

85. I am for the moment discussing the question of your special interest. Your special interest, then, is this: that your property is tax-free?—It is not tax-free.

86. To some extent it is, the Inam?—Yes.

87. While other property is not tax-free?—Yes.

88. And, therefore, there is a conflict?—To some extent.

89. And you want to have your interest represented on that account?—Yes. There are other rights also which we have—rights and privileges with regard to our villages, with regard to our property, with regard to the management of our property.

90. Chairman: I do not know that I understand it rightly. I did not understand that the Sardars' property was tax-free. These gentlemen are a deputation of Sardars and Inamdars: is not that so?—Yes.

91. Are Sardars a kind of Inamdars?—Sardars are not necessarily Inamdars. Let there be no misunderstanding about this tax-free holding. Let me make it clear that we are paying taxes.

92. Dr. Ambedkar: Yes, I know you are paying taxes, but you are not paying at the same rate as the other population?—We are paying at a higher rate.

93. Very well; that is a matter for later investigation. You are opposed to the lowering of the franchise?—I am opposed to it, yes.

94. And you are at the same time claiming twelve representatives for your constituency, as a conservative force?—Yes.

95. Do you still maintain that the retention of the existing franchise and your claim would make the Legislative Council more representative of all the classes?—I think so.

96. Do you have any representative of the tenant class, of the labouring class, as such?—There are representatives of the labouring classes. All the representatives are elected by the general constituency.

97. Do you think they represent the labourer?—They represent the tenant class, and labouring class.

98. Do you think the existing franchise of 32 rupees reaches the ordinary tenant?—Certainly.

99. You are quite certain about it, that the existing franchise of 32 rupees in the rural constituency enables the tenant class, as apart from the landlord class, to have their representatives elected to the Legislative Council?—No, most of them are the actual cultivators of the soil; but tenants are in a better position, because they take the lease of land and become entitled to vote. Most of the representatives that come from the general constituencies are representatives of the cultivators and tenants.

100. I am not using the word "cultivators," I am using the word "tenants"?—Tenants are in a better position, because their claim on entering in the voter's list is based on the rent that they give. If you take a land assessed at 4 rupees and they are paying 32 rupees as rent, they are on the voters' list, so they are in a better position, while the owner of land assessed at less than 32 rupees is not entitled to vote.

101. Dr. Ambedkar: On page 10, para. 27, you state that the depressed classes labour under no special disability, that their problem is a social one, and that there is an awakening in their favour?—Yes.

102. Now, suppose a depressed-class man is qualified for any particular post, and by reason of the fact that he is looked upon by society as an untouchable, and on account of that he is deprived of being enlisted in any particular post, would you not regard that as a political disability?—But I do not think a man of the depressed classes, with the necessary qualifications, is debarred from entering Government service.

103. We had an official witness who maintained that the depressed classes could not be enlisted in the police service because society looked upon them as untouchable, although they were in other respects quite efficient people?—My personal knowledge is the other way.

104. What sort of disability would you call it?—I do not think it exists.

105. Is that no disability?—I do not think there is any disability in this respect at all.

106. A man is deprived?—If he is deprived only because of his caste, I think it goes against the spirit of the Proclamation of Queen Victoria.

107. It may be, or is, a disability?—It may be.

108. Khan Saheb Abdul Latif: Are the majority of the Inamdars in favour of the agricultural reforms?—Many of the Inamdars are; Sardars are not generally.

109. I asked you about the majority of the Inamdars?—You must understand the difference. Sardars as Sardars have no claim to property. They may be absolutely without any landed property.

110. Is it not the case that the Sardars and Inamdars, although they are representative of the ancient aristocracy, are a class of men of decaying fortunes?—Some of them are.

111. Are they able to cope with the rising standard of living on the income they get from the villages?—Only some have to supplement their incomes in some respects by their own industry.

112. Is it not the case that the social position is not being maintained, and that, as regards political influence, their position is negligible?—I do not think so.

113. Rao Saheb Patil: Will you kindly tell me whether you have come to give evidence in order to advocate the cause of democracy or to protect the rights of the aristocracy?—I have come to——

114. To defend both?—To place the case of my own class before the Commission.

115. That is, you have come to defend both democracy and aristocracy?—Certainly.

116. That is, aristocracy and democracy go hand in hand, according to you?—Yes, we have to go hand in hand for the good of the nation.

117. I know you are opposed to communal representation. You have a separate constituency of Sardars?—Yes.

118. Yet I believe you will have to accept the view that your special representation for a class is nothing but a sort of communal representation in a way?—Not in the least. Communal representation is altogether different from class representation. When I advocate class representation I do so not only for my own constituents, but also for millowners and producers, merchants and university men, Europeans and all special interests.

119. Do you agree with the view that special representation of special interests is open to the same objections as those to which separate elections are open?—You mean separate communal elections?

120. Yes?—No, I do not agree to that.

121. May I know from you what castes are included in your community?—All castes.

122. Let me know the castes. Is it three or four?—Brahmins, non-Brahmins, Marathis, Muhammadans, Parsis, Christians, and the Depressed Classes.

123. Who will command the majority so far as your class is concerned?—What is my class?

124. The advanced class?—I would say that all Inamdars are men of advanced classes, because every Inamdar is of a high social standard and generally well educated.

125. Chairman: You have already pointed out that properly speaking "Sardar" is an honourable title?—Yes, with certain privileges.

126. Whatever the privileges may be, it is a title?—Yes.

127. That means, apparently, that some people in this Presidency might have the title of "Sardar" though they did not own any agricultural land?—Yes.

128. There are such cases, I gather?—There are only a few cases.

129. In those cases where the Sardar has been given that honourable title, but does not own any land, is he included in the list of those who have a vote as a Sardar for the Council?—Yes.

130. The other thing I wanted to know was this. All the Inamdars, I imagine, are the holders of Inams?—Yes.

131. There are no honorary Inamdars, so to speak?—They all must own land. There cannot be an honorary Inamdar.

132. Then the last point was, which Mr. Patil brought out for us very clearly, a man may be a Sardar in the Presidency here whether he is a Hindu or a Muhammadan or a Parsi?—Yes, in fact we have all those castes, represented in the list of Sardars.

133. Lord Burnham points out to me that to put the Sardars and Inamdars together is to bring together people in a different position, because some Sardars are honorary, whereas all Inamdars are owners of land?—The fact is that there are very few Sardars who are not landowners—very, very few.

134. Rao Saheb Patil: I think you will have to admit that your community will command a majority of votes so far as the constituency goes?—No, it does not command a majority. The man who preceded me was a non-Brahmin.

135. I am not going into questions of Brahmin and non-Brahmin. My question is that your community will command a majority of votes—the Brahmin community?—Not necessarily.

136. What is the number of Brahmin voters so far as Sardars are concerned?—I cannot say, but I think by my calculations at the time of the elections, the majority were non-Brahmins.

137. Supposing that case was altogether reversed, and suppose that we recommend one more seat for your constituency, represented by my honourable friend Sardar Mujumdar, would you like to give that seat for the other group of your class?—We are opposed to community representation altogether.

138. But you do not want to recommend that for the other group of your class?—No, we do not want a communal representation in our class at all. We want to stand solid.

139. Suppose one more seat is given to safeguard the interests of your class as a whole, and if you formed the majority of the voters, then would you give that seat to the other group of your class?—No.

140. Chairman: I gather that your inquiry is whether he would like to subdivide the landowners so that there will be, as it were, non-Brahmin landowners and Brahmin landowners, or whatever it may be, and his answer is No, he does not want to subdivide: he wants the constituency to contain both sorts.—Yes, I want a solid constituency.

141. Rao Saheb Patil: You are in favour of provincial autonomy?—I am.

142. Please refer to paragraph 53 on page 12. You have stated there: "While advocating provincial autonomy, we make it clear that provincial councils should have no power or control over Inams, Saranjams and solemn engagements made and sanads given by the previous governments. Where the sanads given to Inamdars provide that they shall not be subject to the increase of land tax or to any other tax, the councils should have no power to impose any tax or increase the land tax on the Inamdars, either directly or indirectly. The Council should have no power to legislate regarding the Inams and Saranjams, unless any Bill affecting the class is moved by a member elected by the Inamdars, nor should the Council have the power to attack, abrogate, or curtail an Inam." Then as you want to preserve these powers, why should you want anyone on the Council in case provincial autonomy is granted? I do not understand what interest you have to be represented on the Legislative Council?—I do not think my constituency can separate the national good from the good of a particular class.

143. You want to safeguard the interests of the poor agriculturists and that is why you want to come in?—Not only the poor agriculturist, but the nation as a whole.

144. You want the progress of the nation?—Yes.

145. And you want to progress by keeping all the powers of your class to yourself, and not vesting them in the Council?—I do not think that the old system should be disturbed at all.

146. Why do not you give the power to the Council, since you are so very fond of provincial autonomy?—In what way? Do you think that engagements entered into by previous governments should be abrogated?

147. Are you willing to transfer the very powers and control that are exercised by the Government to the control of the Legislative Council?—Well, I do not think for a time I shall be willing.

148. Whatever power or control is exercised by the Council now, are you willing to transfer that very power and control to the Legislative Council?—No, not for a time, till conditions settle down.

149. What are the reasons for that, please?—My reasons are that there is a prejudice against this class, and perhaps there may be certain legislation immediately brought forward by the Legislative Council affecting the property of the Inamdars.

150. That means, of course, that you would like your affairs to be managed, or rather controlled by the Government rather than by the Provincial Council?—No, at present the Government does not do it, and the Government are not empowered to do it.

151. Can you say that an adequate number from amongst the Hindu backward classes is returned either in proportion to their numbers or to their voting strength?—In the Legislative Council?

152. Yes, and in the Central Legislature?—There is sufficient representation.

153. My question is this. I want to know from you whether there is an adequate number elected from amongst the backward classes in proportion to their population or their voting strength?—I have not worked out the proportion.

154. What is your general impression?—My general impression is that it is easy for a member of the backward classes to come in at elections. I will give you the experience of my own district, where I know the conditions very well. My district has three seats for general constituencies, two of which are generally occupied by persons belonging to the backward communities.

155. Rao Saheb Patil: I want your general impression for the whole Presidency?—That is what is going on everywhere.

156. There is sufficient representation of the backward classes in proportion to their population and voting strength?—You may take the enfranchised population or the population as a whole.

157. Take the enfranchised population?—I think it is in proportion to the enfranchised population.

158. There is adequate representation of the backward classes?—Yes.

159. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: You wish our province to be autonomous?—Yes.

160. In order that the power of the people may be increased?—Yes.

161. And the Government should be a truly democratic government?—I want representative government.

162. What is you idea about democratic government?—Do you mean that all interests and all classes should be represented, or a particular class only?—I am against the representation of particular classes as a majority; I wish for the representation of all classes.

163. And therefore you wish that your interests should also have representation on the Council?—That is so.

164. And your interests should have not only representation but effective representation?—Not only our interests, but all classes combined.

165. But so far as your interests are concerned, you want effective representation?—Yes, combined with other interests.

166. Why do you want effective representation and not representation according to your numbers?—We want representation in proportion to our interests in the country.

167. What is your interest in the country?—My interest in the country is one-tenth of the villages and one-quarter of the land revenue.

168. Do you mean to say it should be on the basis of property? Do you mean that those who hold property should have greater representation than those with less property?—I do not claim any proportion to property.

169. But you say you should have more representation because you hold one-tenth of the villages?—If we were to take property as the basis, I should be entitled to ask for 25 or 26 per cent. seats.

170. But you want to base the franchise on property and representation on property?—I have given my schemes on the first page of our memorandum; it should be based on property, education and so on.

171. What is the number of Mohamedans who are Sardars in your constituency?—I cannot say off-hand; I think there are seven or eight in the Sardars of the Deccan.

172. Out of 900?—No, out of 111, standing on the list of Sardars.

173. Do you think a Muhammadan would ever have the shadow of a chance of being returned for your constituency?—By all means, if he is a good man; there would be no difficulty at all. Any one can represent our class, provided he has worked for the good of the constituency. We do not make any communal differences between people.

174. You are in favour of the separation of Sind?—Yes, provided a suitable financial adjustment is made, but for Sind I have got my own scheme, if you would like to have it.

Chairman: We should be grateful if you would care to send us a paper containing your own scheme for Sind, but it will help us if we deal with that when we are considering Sind as a whole.

175. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: I want to draw attention to page 13, in which the witness has advocated the separation of Sind, but at the same time wants affective representation for his Hindu brethren there. I want to draw attention to his communal feeling, for he says that "before doing it" (making Sind a separate province) "the interest of the Hindu minority in it should be properly safeguarded by providing for seats in the Sind legislature."—Yes, but that is only for a transitional period. I would do away with it as soon as possible.

176. You would give it to the Mohamedans also, if Sind is not separated, for a transitional period?—Yes, they had it.

177. Sardar Mujumdar: What do you mean by "adequate and effective representation"?—So that it should be possible to throw some weight on one side or other of the parties in the Legislative Council.

178. What was the origin of the Deccan Sardars?—The origin was with the Mahratta Government.

179. Were they formerly Sardars of the Peshwa Government?—Yes, of the Mahratta Government.

180. Is not it a fact that so long ago as that the Sardarship was considered hereditary?—Yes, as it is even now.

181. Why is it you say the representation given to your class is not adequate? Has it been the same since 1861?—Yes, it is now the same as in 1861.

182. Can you show that by figures?—In 1861 by nomination the Government took one man from the Sardars of the Deccan, and in 1892 also there was only one man from the Sardars of the Deccan, and Karnatak. Again in 1909 there was only one seat given to them, and in 1920 the same was repeated. They return only one member, and now that the Inamdars are added they enjoy only one seat, in spite of the expansion of the Council.

183. The number of Inamdars was added since the Reforms?—Yes.

184. What taxes are levied from your class? How do they compare with other taxes on agriculturists, merchants', etc.?—One-fourth of our revenue, and in addition I think we are the only class paying death duties to Government.

185. Is it the same as succession duty?—Yes. No other class pays death duties. We also pay away one-third of our revenues in duties and we pay local taxation also.

186. Is there any Act under which you have to pay this succession duty?—Yes.

187. There is a Settlement Act under which you pay this?—Yes.

188. In para. 13 of your memorandum you state: "We have confidence that representatives of the special interests detailed in the first paragraph will be persons of balanced views, and their voting will be guided by reason and responsibility."—Yes, that is exactly our idea; it should serve the purpose of a second chamber.

189. You are referring there to the representatives of special interests, those whom you detail on the first page, at the beginning?—Yes.

190. Not only the landed classes?—Not only the landed classes, but all special interests taken together.

191. With regard to para. 23, will you kindly amplify your statement and say why you want special representation?—We want it, as I have just explained, both for the protection of our own interests and for the purpose of exercising a restraining influence on the Councils, i.e., for the sake of serving the purpose of a second chamber.

192. Are you aware that in other Provinces the landed constituency have more seats? In Madras, for example, they have 6; in Bengal, 5; in the United Provinces, 6; in the Punjab, 4; in Bihar and Orissa, 5; and in the Central Provinces, 3; while in Bombay you have only 3?—We have represented to Government from time to time on this very line.

193. Have you sent any petitions to the Government of India with regard to your seat in the Assembly?—Yes, I sent one, when I was a member of the Legislative Assembly, in 1925.

194. Are you primarily responsible for the local fund cess?—Yes.

195. And yet you have not got representation on the local bodies?—No, though it was on the understanding that we accepted to pay the local fund cess—that we should enjoy representation on the local boards.

196. When were you deprived of your right of representation on the local boards?—By the Act of 1923.

197. Chairman: There is one answer you gave just now which I do not follow. I thought I heard you say, in answer to a question from the Sardar Sahib, something about death duties. You were recounting the burden put on you, and you mentioned death duties?—Yes.

198. Is it a fact that the Sardars and Inamdars as a class pay these duties?—Succession duties mean death duties.

199. You look on it in that sense and I accept it. Is there any law which says that, because you are a Sardar you have to pay it, but that if you are not a Sardar you do not have to pay it? It is not the fact, is it, that the body you represent have a special tax of this kind imposed on them as such?—It is a special tax on the Inamdars. The tax does not affect Sardars as Sardars.

200. It is a tax which is put on succession, and in proper cases it will have to be paid whether a man is a Sardar or an Inamdar or not?—Yes, if he has any landed property. It is a tax on Inams.

201. Major Attlee: You have just said you are primarily responsible for paying the local fund cess?—Yes.

202. You pay it and then recover it from the tenants? The tenants repay it to you?—In some cases the tenants pay and in some they do not. The liability varies in different cases.

203. But you have the right to recover it if you can?—There is a statutory provision for recovery, the tenants are not always necessarily liable to pay. We can recover from the tenants in cases where tenants are liable, but in some cases the tenants are not even liable to pay.

204. Sir Sankaran Nair: You represent only the holders of alienated villages and lands?—At present the constituency represents holders of alienated villages, but we are holders of alienated villages and alienated lands also.

205. Alienated lands and villages, but you do not speak for other land holders?—No, not for the ordinary cultivators.

206. It is not only the cultivators; there may be land holders too. Have not you land holders here other than the owners of alienated villages and lands?—Yes. We own lands. We own lands apart from villages.

207. Are those lands alienated lands?—They are.

208. Leave alienated lands alone; I am speaking of lands which are not alienated. Are there not big landlords of unalienated lands in this Province?—Yes, there are many.

209. There are?—There are.

210. You do not speak for them?—We do not speak for them.

211. None of you is a landlord of lands which are not alienated?—We are. We hold unalienated lands also.

212. You hold unalienated lands also?—Yes.

213. The Joint Parliamentary Committee say in their Report: "The subject" (land revenue) "is one which probably would not be transferred to Ministers until the electorate included a satisfactory representation of rural interests, those of the tenantry as well as of the landlords." Note the words "as well as the landlords." Has this condition been satisfied in Bombay?—Yes, so far as our representation goes.

214. That is, the landlord representation?—Yes.

215. Has there been a representation of the tenantry too, as the Joint Parliamentary Committee say?—Yes, there is representation of the tenantry.

216. They say satisfactory representation of the tenantry. Has there been satisfactory representation of the tenantry also?—I think so.

217. I want only your opinion on this, and I am not going to press you further. Do you think that in this Province there is already a satisfactory representation of the tenantry, so that the subject can be transferred?—Yes.

218. You think so?—Yes.

219. You said you are landholders of land which has not been alienated also?—Yes.

220. If you are not familiar with it, say so at once, and I will drop it; but can you say anything about the terms of letting land to your tenants, the conditions on which they are let, or do you simply leave it to your land agents?—No, we look to the details of leasing ourselves and do not trust only our agents.

221. You inquire into the thing yourselves?—We look to it ourselves.

222. Very well. Now, according to our old custom, when lands are let to tenants, after the crops are harvested and brought to the threshing floor, first of all a share of the crops is set apart for labour and given over to the agricultural coolies, or slaves as they were in those days. Is that practice still recognised?—We pay to the village labourers, to the persons who work for the village, the village servants ——

223. I did not mean the village servants; I mean those who work in the fields?—We give it.

224. You do?—If we only take a share of the crops; otherwise we leave the arrangement to the tenants.

225. Do you set it apart first, out of the crops brought to the threshing floor?—Yes.

226. You do?—Yes.

227. You do it now?—Yes.

228. Are you able to say whether the Government, in fixing the assessment, set apart a certain share for the actual labourers in the field? If you do not know, say so?—I cannot tell you definitely.

229. Then I will not pursue that matter further. After you give this share out of the crops to the labourers do you set apart a share, as you said before, for the village servants, like the carpenter, the blacksmith, and the dancing girls in the temples, and so on? Do you do that?—Yes.

230. You do that even now?—Yes.

231. Are you able to say whether the workmen in the fields are paid throughout the year, work or no work, at different rates of pay by you Sardars?—We do not pay them anything.

232. Do the farmers pay them?—There are two systems on which the farmers pay. Either they pay a share when the crops are ripe, or they pay by daily wages.

233. They pay by daily wages?—Yes.

234. When they pay by daily wages, do they pay them throughout the year?—Yes, for working days.

Chairman: Does "wages" mean money there?

235. Sir Sankaran Nair: Wages means payment in kind?—No, not payment in kind.

Chairman: I did not know whether the wages were money wages.

236. Sir Sankaran Nair: They are not. In some parts of India, to my knowledge, work or no work, the agricultural slaves are paid daily wages in kind?—Yes.

237. Of course, there are different rates. When there is no work to be done they are paid at a lower rate?—I cannot say.

238. So far as I know, that practice obtains here in the Bombay Presidency, which is also like Madras. Is that practice in any way continued in the province?—It is continued, but that practice is now dying out.

239. It is continued in some places, but the practice is now gradually dying out?—It is being replaced by daily payment.

240. By daily payment in cash?—Yes.

241. Would you be willing to have those things made obligatory by law, all these payments which are made to agricultural labourers, or would you resist it?—As a general principle I would leave the things to themselves.

242. As they are?—Yes.

243. You do not like to have it made an obligation?—No, there should be no legislative provision for that.

244. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You represent the Inamdars?—Yes.

245. You belong to the privileged tenure class?—Yes.

246. And intermediate between yourself and the ryotwari settlement you have the Indian villages?—Yes. We have ryotwari settlement in our villages.

247. You do not speak for the holders of the ryotwari land?—In the villages we exactly stand in the position of Government. The ryotwari system is there. There is direct relation between the tenants and us only with regard to the lands that are leased out by us.

248. I understand you to say that you are representative of the privileged class?—Yes.

249. And you speak as a representative of that class? Now, you have made a point that you pay a death duty which is called succession duty?—Yes.

250. Is not that by reason of the fact that when you are Inamdars you have the privilege of paying only 25 per cent. of the assessment?—We pay 25 per cent. of our income.

251. The other 75 per cent. is remitted in your case?—Yes, it is our income.

252. And therefore after each death, as in the case of the ruling princes of India, you have to pay succesion duty?—It is a special duty imposed on us.

253. Because you are in the enjoyment of a special privileged tenure?—It is not exactly because of that. It is a special tax levied upon us.

254. It is only levied upon Inamdars paying what is called the favoured rate, not from the rest of the people? While as holders in ryotwari villages, you are not liable to pay anything at all?—That is so, landholders in ryotwari villages are not liable to that tax.

255. Because during your lifetime the Government remits three-fourths of the assessment in your favour, therefore on each death a succession duty is levied?—No, it is not that. This tax came later on. It was a later growth.

256. I know, but the reason given for it is that yours is a privileged tenure?—No. Inam is not really a privileged tenure. It is our income on which the tax is levied.

257. Then what is the reason given?—The reason given is that we are taxed. That is the only reason given.

258. The only reason is that you have got to pay it?—Yes, we have got to pay it.

259. You have just told the Commission that there is a prejudice against your class?—Yes.

260. Can you please give some concrete reasons for that prejudice?—There is a general prejudice against Inamdars, * * *

261. That they are a bad lot?—Yes, a bad lot.

262. What are the special reasons? Is there any reason why there is such a strong and deep-rooted prejudice against your class, that without special representation you have no chance of coming in through the general electorate?—In the general electorate, unless you champion the cause and come under the ticket of the party, there is no chance. We stand in relation to the cultivators as mill owners stand to the labourers; cultivators consider our interests antagonistic to theirs.

263. I know; but I was dealing with the question of prejudice rather than with your chances of coming in at a general election. What is the reason why there is this feeling?—Because we enjoy privileges.

264. Because you are in the enjoyment of privileges which the general public do not like?—Yes.

265. That is it?—Yes.

266. You say you have a great power for doing good to the public. In what way will you do good to the public will you please tell the Commission?—I will say that my class has got more leisure to devote itself to the public good.

267. Tell us some concrete good that you would do to the public?—Rural development and agricultural development.

268. Give me an instance?—We go in for village sanitation, and in the village industrial field also we shall be able to help the worker, as well as in the development of agriculture.

269. But do not the ryots complain that you will probably take possession of the little land they have got?—No, their tenure is secure, by law, and they have absolutely no fear on this ground.

270. Do they not say that you are only rent receivers, middlemen, who have no direct touch with the tillers of the soil, and that if you are given a greater foothold in the village life you will deprive them of the little they have got?—That is not exactly the prejudice against us. We are not middlemen or rent receivers. We receive assessment, fixed by government agency.

271. It may not exactly be, but it is on the lines of that argument, it is something to that effect?—It may be.

272. You say you are in favour of a democratic form of government?—Yes, representative form of government.

273. But do you think that communal and class representation is consistent with a democratic form of government?—The point which these two bodies have made is that class representation combined with a democratic form of government will be the best form for India at present.

274. But the two things are irreconcilable?—No, they are not.

275. It is the very antithesis of a democratic form of government. The moment you introduce classes you have done away with the very foundation of a democratic form of government?—We give them a majority. We only have a small representation of the classes in the legislatures.

* * * * * * * * * * *

281. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Will you turn to page 10, paragraph 14 of your statement? You say, "We modestly ask for 12 seats"—out of how many elective seats?—It will be about 125, I think.

282. That is in the Council. Out of how many elective seats in the Assembly do you want, three?—I think there will be some increase in the number of seats of the Assembly.

283. Now take paragraph 16. You say: "Such sharers remain without representation according to the rules now in force." Have they not got a vote in the general constituency?—Yes, they have.

284. The effect of your paragraph 16 would be to give them double votes?—Yes.

285. Therefore you want not only 12 seats, but also double votes?—They have already on the other side.

286. You want 12 seats and double votes for your class?—Yes.

290. In para. 49 on page 12 you say, in advocating provincial autonomy, the cabinet should be formed on the British Cabinet system?—Yes.

291. If you will turn to page 12, para. 55, you say: "The Governor should be the head of the executive government, and should preside over the cabinet meetings." How do you reconcile the British Cabinet system with the Governor presiding?—We mean that there should be one chief Minister, and he should be responsible for the policy of the whole Cabinet.

292. But if the Governor presides over the Cabinet it will be very antithesis of the British Cabinet system. In para. 49 you say: "The Governor should call upon the leader of the party having the largest following in the Council to form his own Ministry. It will remain in power so long as it enjoys the confidence of the House." In another place you say that Ministers must come from your class, do you not?—Yes. That refers only to the present constitution. That is one of our grievances.

293. It does not apply to the future?—The future, of course, will depend on whether we command a majority in the Council or not.

294. In para. 50 you say: "No men are better qualified to advise with understanding and great natural shrewdness on the great mass of rural questions which will come before the provincial legislatures"—that is a quotation from the Montagu-Chelmsford Report—and you claim that persons from your class should have preference?—Yes.

295. How do you reconcile that para. 50 with the preceding paragraph, 49? In the one case you say the Minister should be drawn from the largest group?—Yes.

296. In the other paragraph you say he must be drawn from your class?—Yes. It is very easy. If there are two candidates who can claim to be in the same position, our man should be preferred.

297. You have not got a largest group in the Council?—I said if there are two persons who have equal following in the Council, we may be given the preference.

* * * * * * * * * * *

305. Dr. Suhrawardy: Am I right in concluding that there are landholders, big and small, whose names are not included in the constituencies of Inamdars and Sardars?—Yes, holders of lands are not included in this constituency.

306. Have these people any special electorate of the kind you have got?—No; we are advocating a special electorate for them.

307. So the landholders other than Inamdars and Sardars stand from the general constituency?—Yes. Holders of alienated lands can stand for the general constituency.

308. So you do not represent on the Council the landholders' interest entirely? You represent only Inamdars and Sardars who may be even landless Sardars?—We represent the privileged classes.

309. You said that there are Sardars on the Government list who have no lands?—They are very few—one or two.

310. You have stated in your memorandum that "if the Commission unfortunately come to the conclusion to give separate representation to the Muhammadans it should be by reservation of seats in joint electorate." Supposing the Commission were unfortunately to come to the conclusion to give you a special electorate, will you be content with a reservation of seats in joint electorate?—Certainly.

311. You have no objection?—No objection.

312. Why do you want to increase representation in the Local Council? If I am not mistaken you said that in your constituency there are five or seven Mahomedans on the list of voters?—In the Sardars' list.

313. How many of them are there in the Inamdars' list?—Quite a number of them.

314. Can you give me an approximate idea?—More than 50 in a constituency of 500.

315. They are in the minority?—Yes.

316. You suggest that, if there is a good Mussalman who is capable of protecting the rights and interests of your class as a whole, he has got a chance of being returned?—Yes, a very good chance.

317. That is a mere chance. Can you tell me whether either a Mussalman or a Parsi has ever been returned?—I am sorry to say that no Mussalman or Parsi has even taken so much interest and has ever stood for election.

318. I am asking you to give me the facts?—Nobody ever came forward for election.

319. Since when do you enjoy this privilege of being returned to the Local Council?—Since 1892.

320. Through election?—Yes.

321. That is to say, even prior to the Minto-Morley Reforms?—Yes.

322. Since 1892 there has been no Parsi or Mussalman representative on the Council?—Only one Parsi stood for election in 1923 and he was not returned.

323. Your idea is that it is not the number which counts, but it is the personality?—Yes.

324. May I suggest to you that in the Local Council also it does not matter whether you have 12 or three men provided they are good men, capable of protecting your rights and interests?—No. The interests of the classes are different from those of the masses.

325. You represent the Sardars' and Inamdars' Central Association?—Yes.

326. May I take it that you do not represent the Sardars and Inamdars of the whole Presidency; I mean the proper and improper, as the Chairman put it?—We have nothing to do with Sind.

327. May I ask you whether you have got in your Association any Mussalman member?—Many. Our Vice-President is a Mahomedan.

328. In the present deputation of yours are there any Mussalmans or Parsis?—No.

329. Any non-Brahmin?—No.

330. Rao Bahadur Rajah: You say in paragraph 43 of your memorandum that the electorate is growing in education and understanding of public opinion. I take it that this advance is largely due to the fact that they take part in various elections and thus have frequent opportunities of getting into touch with the public opinion of the country?—Yes.

331. Do you think this qualifies an average person to an intelligent use of the franchise?—In some cases they do use intelligence in exercising their franchise, but in some cases they may not.

332. You say that the electorate is growing in education and understanding of public opinion. If so, will you kindly let me know whether you think that this qualifies the average voter to intelligently use his franchise?—Yes, to some extent.

333. You do not recommend extension of the present franchise beyond that mentioned in para. 2 of your memorandum?—I do not recommend.

334. Why?—Because I think the time has not come for that. The present electorate, though it is getting more education, still wants to be further educated.

335. You claim to be a military class?—Yes.

336. You say you still wield a great influence with society?—Yes. We are a military class in the sense that our income is due to our military exploits.

337. You are not in any way inferior to any other class in education and culture?—Yes, we are not.

338. And still you want separate electoral register for you?—Yes, because of our special interests.

339. You say that among you are persons of all castes and creeds and religions? How many are there among the ranks of Sardars and Inamdars who belong to the depressed classes?—There are two members of the depressed classes in the constituency.

340. You recommend two seats in the Local Council to be given to the depressed classes and that by election?—Yes.

341. Will you kindly tell me how you arrive at that basis?—We have not worked out on any mathematical basis, but we think that two special seats with chances of standing for the general election are quite sufficient for that class.

342. Is it by a separate electorate or by general electorate?—I would like to have separate electorates for this class (depressed) in the beginning.

343. You take the view that Government should not interfere with social or religious matters?—Yes.

Are you, or are you not, aware of the fact that the members of the depressed classes are denied many of the ordinary civic rights and privileges?

Chairman: Can we not have that point discussed to-morrow?

Rao Bahadar Rajah: My point is this. This point has been raised in the memorandum of the Sardars and Inamdars and I would like to get their opinion. To-morrow we are going to examine the depressed class representatives, and I do not think that it will be relevant to put to them questions on the points raised in this memorandum.

344. Are you, or are you not, aware of the fact that members of the depressed classes are denied many of the ordinary civic rights and privileges?—Perhaps there are some disabilities which existed formerly, but we are trying our best to remedy the evil.

345. Am I to understand that these disabilities do not exist to-day?—Many of them have disappeared.

346. May I mention to you some of the disabilities to make my point clear? In the first place the depressed classes are not allowed to draw water from public wells?—I may say that most of the so-called public wells are not really public wells. They are endowed by some charitable people and given to the public on certain conditions. Neither the local boards nor the Government have built them and in such cases the wishes of the donors have to be respected. But in cases where the local boards or the Government construct these wells, there is no restriction whatsoever at present.

347. Where there is any interference of the civic rights of the depressed classes would your Association assist these classes in exercising these rights?—Certainly. In fact, the position is that we count them amongst ourselves as Vatandars.

348. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: Your Association generally is not in favour of communal representation?—It does not favour communal representation.

349. On page 13 of your memorandum, while dealing with the separation of Sind you recommend that the separation of Sind should be made on two conditions, firstly, the financial adjustment between Bombay Government and Sind and, secondly, the proper safeguarding of the interests of the Hindu minority. Is it your view that minority communities should be given special protection?—No, the experiment with regard to Sind should be tried separately and I advocate this only for two elections, after which this safeguard may be taken away.

350. That is, for six years?—Yes.

351. For six years it is necessary that the minority community should be protected?—It is only during the transition period. We also had it in the transition period.

352. After two elections you would recommend general election?—Yes.

353. No class representation?—We are strongly in favour of class representation.

354. Even in Sind you recommend class representation after six years?—Yes, but not communal representation.

355. While you recommend representation of the landed class to which you have the honour to belong, what will become of the peasantry class? Do you not think that they should be represented on the Council?—Yes, they are well represented at present.

356. How?—Practically the general constituencies consist mainly of peasants' representatives.

357. Similarly I understand that members of your class are in the general constituency and they can also take part in the general elections?—Compared to the numbers they are in an insignificant minority.

358. You have been good enough to mention in your memorandum something about the Council of State of which I have the honour to be a member. You say that the Council of State should be reconstituted on different lines?—Yes.

359. You also say that the present Council of State is not very popular. May I know something more about it? Why do you think it is unpopular?—I think you yourself know better about it.

360. I do not hold that view which you hold and I would like to know something from you as to why you hold that view?—We have given reasons in the memorandum itself. The general public opinion is that the Council of State does not do much business. It only sits for a short time and much of the important business is done in the Legislative Assembly and the only thing the Council of State does is to act as a drag on the Assembly.

361. You do not recommend the abolition of Council of State altogether?—No.

362. You simply recommend a change in the constitution?—Yes.

363. You recommend that it should consist of three electorates, the landholders' class, the commercial class and the graduates' class?—The electorates and franchise should be such that these classes should be returned.

364. With regard to the commercial class, anyone who pays Rs. 1000 as income tax should be an elector?—Yes.

365. How do you think this change will improve the constitution?—It will give representation to all interests, but, as we have mentioned in the memorandum, unless the Legislative Assembly is invested with more powers, the Council of State cannot function much in a useful way.

366. But this cannot be a ground for the unpopularity of the Council of State. If the Legislative Assembly has not been given more powers there must be a separate recommendation for giving more powers to them. Is it not so?—Constitution is altogether different from the unpopularity of the House.

367. How do you propose to make the House a popular one?—It should be representative of all classes.

368. Is it not so now?—The electorate is too general for all provinces, and all interests in different provinces are not returned.

369. There are advanced landholders, men belonging to commerce, men belonging to the general public and so on, and thus all classes are represented on the Council of State even now?—All Presidencies are not represented in the same way.

370. You want different qualifications for each Presidency?—Yes, different qualifications for different Presidencies.

Memorandum submitted by A. N. SURVE, Esq., B.A., LL.B., J.P., Advocate and Fellow, University of Bombay.

1. The Representative System as Applied to British India.

(a) The Basis of Franchise.—Early introduction of Universal Franchise should be the goal. Time has arrived for liberalising the franchise. The rules, as they stand at present, prevent the labouring and depressed classes from being enfranchised. In the City of Bombay Rs. 10 franchise has kept the masses, i.e., labouring and depressed classes without a vote. I suggest that Rs. 4, 2, and 1 should be the rental qualification for a vote in the constituencies of Bombay and Karachi Cities and in the rest of the Presidency respectively. In the case of depressed classes it should be still lower, say, 1 rupee in the urban and 4 annas in other constituencies. Unless they are enfranchised they will not obtain direct representation, which is essential for their all round advancement. They should be given elected representatives in the Legislature—Central as well as Provincial.

The amount of land assessment which is prescribed as a qualification for a vote should be reduced by half.

(b) Methods of Election.—Voting by ballot is all right, but care is required in fixing the polling day, which should be such as would enable a large body of voters to attend the polling stations, i.e., it should be when the pressure of agricultural work is least and the transport facilities are most easy. Polling stations should be located with due regard to the convenience of voters. Polling day should be declared a public holiday. Liberty of cumulative voting should be withdrawn. Voters should vote distributively, i.e., give one vote to each of the candidates of his choice.

(c) Communal Interest.—Communal electorates should continue if the communities concerned want them.

The Maratha and the allied castes are given reservation of seats in the Bombay Council. The present number of reserved constituencies should be doubled. Experience has shown that the Maratha caste has been able to return its representatives, therefore there is no need now for continuing the facility provided by reservation in its favour. The allied castes need protection, therefore steps should be taken for confining the benefit of the device, i.e., reservation to them (i.e., the allied castes). In order to secure representation to all the allied castes, I would even recommend rotation or reservation of a particular constituency to a particular caste, i.e., if there is a preponderance of a particular caste in a constituency, it should have the privilege of returning a member of the said caste, say, for instance, a Koli from Thana, an Agri from Kolaba, a Bhandari from Ratnagiri and a Kunbi (non-maratha) from Khandesh, and so on. The advantages of this proposal will be that all the allied castes will be able to share the benefit of reservation, there will be fewer contested elections—and be it noted that a contest deters many a deserving person from offering himself for election.

There should be reservation in favour of the allied castes in the Central Legislatures—three in the Assembly and one in the Council of State, should its existence be continued.

Reservation should also be extended to the depressed classes. They should have six elected representatives in the Bombay Council, two in the Assembly and one in the Council of State. Unless this is done, their advancement would be very slow and uncertain and they would be acting as a clog upon the early attainment of complete self-government.

Local Interests.—Industrial centres should possess the right of returning by election representatives of labour, two for Bombay City and one for each of the other industrial centres in the Presidency. Labour should have its elected representatives—two in the Central Legislatures as well. Liberalisation of franchise in the local self-governing bodies has given in the Presidency appreciable increase in representation to the masses as against the classes, who formerly enjoyed exclusive representation on them. Franchise should be still further liberalised. Local bodies, e.g., village panchayats, etc., should be established for the purpose of giving education in self-government. In the Bombay City franchise for municipal corporation should be 4 rupees as against 10 in force at present.

(d) Relationship between Representatives and Constituents.—A representative should represent the constituency in the true sense of the word, i.e., he must voice his constituents, but in the present state of political consciousness this proposition is merely an ideal. I do not think that it is possible to enforce it by legislation. As political consciousness in the electors grows the representative will gradually become a true representative of his constituency.

(e) Growth of Parties.—To state my experience of the first Council (Bombay), there were no well-defined parties except the Government and the Opposition. As such, its achievements were remarkable. Much good and beneficial work was accomplished.

Second Council was marked by the formation of parties—Swarajist-Responsivists, Mahomedans, Non-Brahmins, Independents and Liberals. In the first half of its life there was co-operation with Government where possible and opposition where necessary; but, in the latter half, walkouts and sulks or vows of silence were the order of the day, which broke down all opposition and enabled Government to win easy victories.

As regards the present Council—from observation—I say that the formation and dissolution or transformation of the parties are constantly taking place. This process conduces to weaken the Opposition. And I believe Government are having very easy time. It is fortunate for the Presidency that its head and executive are not reactionary, otherwise the presence of numerous and ill-formed parties in the Council would have led to disastrous results, so far as the public are concerned.

It is hoped that with more experience the fissiparous tendency will disappear, and the Council will resolve into distinct and well-informed parties which will be able to voice the views of and safeguard the interests of the public.

(f) Growth of Public Opinion.—Informed public opinion is growing day by day. The increase in the number of newspapers, meetings and conferences is an unmistakable indication of this fact. Urban areas are far in advance in this respect of the rural areas. Even in the districts people have begun to recognise that they ought to have a share in the Government. It is regrettable that these activities are carried under colour of religious propaganda. Responsible leaders are aware of this tendency and they are adopting such measures as they are able to. It is hoped that in course of time people will learn to separate politics from religion.

(g) Nomination of Officials and Non-Officials as Additional Members of Elected Bodies.—Nomination will have to be tolerated during the period of transition. It can be tempered by giving preference to non-officials. Bombay Presidency has made considerable advance in this respect. It is hoped that in near future the small proportion of nominated members now existing will be abolished. Co-option can be substituted for nomination where necessary.

2. Suitability of Existing Areas for Legislative and Administrative Purposes and for the Growth of Representative Institutions.

(a) Local Self-Governments.—Local Boards, Municipalities, Notified Area Committees and Village Panchayats, where they are established, are all right for the respective areas, but, as stated elsewhere (in this memorandum), more village panchayats should be established. The scope of their duties and responsibilities should be widened; they should be better financed by grants and loans. Unless this is done improvement in the condition of sanitation, education and amenities in the rural areas will be long in coming.

(b) Proposals for Division of Existing Provinces.—Non-division of Sind from the Presidency will result in the mutual benefit of both. It is a complaint of the Sindhis that they do not receive fair treatment in the matter of their wants in spite of revenue received by Government from them. My impression is that the charge is not well-founded, but I am not against separation if the Sindhis, as a whole, want it. The Mahomedan demand for its separation and its opposition by Hindus, so far as they are based on communal differences, should not be countenanced. If Sind can shoulder the burden involved in its attempt to achieve its advancement, financially and administratively, it should be separated from the Presidency.

4. The Provincial Governments.

(a) Constitution.—The allied castes and the depressed classes are not well represented in the Bombay Council. Labour and depressed classes obtained representation by nominations—1 for each in the first and the second Councils, and 2 for each in the third Council. The amount of representation thus secured is insufficient. During this period the allied castes had to remain satisfied with vicarious representation. To remove the defect a suggestion has been made above under 1 (c) communal interest. Measures should be adopted to secure direct representation for the allied castes, depressed classes and labour.

(b) Working of Dyarchy.—Apparently it has worked without friction in the Bombay Presidency. Credit for this is due to the sympathy of the heads of the Presidency, the tactfulness of the Executive, and the co-operation of the people's representatives. Even under trying circumstances the members have loyally supported the Ministers. Deadlocks were avoided. Bombay may be cited as an example of the good working of an essentially bad system of Government. The sooner it is abolished the better.

(c) Position and Power of Governor.—They were sparingly used, and when they were used they did not leave a sting behind. I was a victim of this power in the matter of resolutions of which I have given notice. As the resolutions passed by the Council have no more effect than mere recommendations, I think the power of veto of Governor in respect of moving resolutions in Councils should be withdrawn. Same remarks apply to motions for Adjournment of Business. This power is open to abuse in unsympathetic hands.

Power of certification of a bill or of any of its clauses should not be exercised by Governors if the measure is passed unanimously or by an overwhelming majority of non-officials.

(c) Relation of Ministers to each other and Questions of Collective Responsibility.—Bombay Ministers were fortunate in not having to face the question of collective responsibility, as votes of no-confidence in Ministers were not carried to the bitter end, the resignation of a Minister or the question of collective or separate responsibility did not arise. I prefer collective over separate responsibility. The Ministry should stand or fall together rather than any of its individual members.

(f) Growth of Party System in the Provincial Councils.—My views are stated in 1 (e).

(g) Classification in Reserved and Transferred Subjects.—The sooner it is done away with the better.

(i) Desirability of Second Chambers.—They are not necessary or even desirable in the Provinces.

(j) Provincial Autonomy.—It should be given as early as possible.

This memorandum contains the personal views of the undersigned, who, if required, for examination or re-examination will be ready to tender oral evidence.

31st May, 1928.

Memorandum from Mr. S. K. BOLE, J.P., M.L.C., Bombay.

(1) The Representative System as applied to British India:—

(a) The basis of machine:—The franchise should be universal suffrage—

> A male attaining the age of 21 and a female attaining the age of 25 should have the right of vote for all the legislatures, Central and Provincial, provided the usual disqualifications as enacted by the Government of India Act, 1919, should prevail.

(b) The widening of the franchise is the only solution to do away with the principle of reservation of seats, nomination of non-official members to the elected bodies, and religious constituencies now in existence and operation under the Government of India Act of 1919. The objection of the ignorance of the masses in education and politics can be well answered. The progress of education of India will always be slow and no institutions can be opened to give political education to the masses. The right of vote will teach them to know and understand that they enjoy the political freedom and it is in their hands to remedy their political grievances through their representative. If the franchise is not made universal, then the principle of reservation of seats, nominations, separate electorate and constituencies is a dire necessity and no reforms of whatever nature and character will be adequate without these things.

(c) Methods whereby particular interest, communal, local, social and economic may obtain adequate representation on local self-governing, provincial and central representative bodies.

As far as the particular interests, local and economic, are concerned, the present representation in their case is adequate, but in the cases of communal and social interests, the present arrangement requires an increase in the number of the representatives given to the communal and social interests under the Government of India Act, 1919.

Under the head communal, the thorny question of the Hindu-Moslem solution will loom largely on the dark horizon of Indian politics. I have suggested "Universal Suffrage" as the best solution of the problem, and if it is not resorted to, then India will be divided as Hindu India and Moslem India, that is what the resolutions of the Hindu Mahasabha and the Moslem League are trying to aim at, though suitable arrangements should be made to get the representatives of the minorities. Whether there be Hindus or Mahomedans in any provinces, yet the methods of joint-electorate should prevail, which may arouse in the minds of the voters, that there is some element of unification in the law of the land, which may lead to Nationalism, or he may try to be a national as this open opportunity is given to him.

Apart from the Hindu or Moslem question, the question of the backward communities or depressed communities, labour population and agricultural population requires serious attention of the British Parliament. The solidarity of the higher castes, the weapon of social ostracism which they can easily handle, makes it impossible for the backward communities to express their robust opinions, when only a small section out of them is enfranchised. Hence the need for reservation of seats to the backward communities in every province, separate constituencies for the depressed classes, special representation on the central and provincial legislature for labour and agricultural population should be embodied in the new Government of India Act.

Nomination of Officials and Non-Officials as Additional Members of Elected Bodies.

The nomination of officials in the provincial legislatures should be done away with, while in the Central Legislature it should be kept so low as to ensure non-official majority as it is done in the provincial legislatures at present. While nomination of non-officials to the provincial as well as to the central legislatures should be equitable.

At present the official members help the Government in two ways: by answering the arguments of the popular side and keeping themselves in touch with a responsible criticism of the administration and secondly in assisting the Government by their block vote, in turning down any proposal that Government may not wish to pass. As it is high time to introduce full autonomy in the provincial administrations and as the ministers will be in charge of departments, they can well answer the opposition side and also there is no need of assisting the Government in turning down any issue, as the defeat of any ministry means a change of ministry and a new Government, who commands the confidence of the House.

We do not know what fate our proposal of universal suffrage will meet at the hands of the Commission, and hence it is better to err on right side and propose the non-official nomination to the provincial and the central legislatures. The present nominations to safeguard any other interests, other than the agriculture and labour should be done away with the adequate (for example, 5 seats for labour and 7 for agricultural population) nominations for these two classes of population should be recommended and embodied in the new Act.

II. The suitability of existing areas for legislative and administrative purposes and for the growth of representative institutions. (a) The settlement of areas for local self-governing bodies should be under the control of the provincial Government as it is at present and no change is required. (b) No part of British India should henceforward remain without an introduction of representative government in some form and the provinces—the North-Western Province and the British Baluchistan—be put on par with other provinces in British India in matters political. The separation of Sind and the redistribution of provinces on linguistic basis should be aimed at in the constitution and the Government of India should be entrusted with that work.

It is an anomaly in the nature of things that the people living in the same country, under the same Government and obeying the same laws should be divided in two, one enjoying all the civilised forms of government while the other should be debarred from enjoying these rights only on the plea of the geographical situation they are put in. As it is in London that the British citizen of whatever nationality, colour, caste or creed, is on the same footing with any other British citizen of the British Empire of whatever status and position, it should be in India with any Indian living in any part of the country should have and enjoy the same privileges which his brother in India may be enjoying in any part of the country.

The trend of political thought in the world is on the side of creating small self-sufficing nationalities, which may achieve fullest realisation of their political ideals without any outside interruption, and such conditions require same language and same historic traditions, the division of India in new provinces based on "one language" is ardently desired by every thoughtful Indian, and sooner it is done the better. India should be federation of nations giving fullest freedom to its component parts to develop to its fullest limits.

IV. The Provincial Government.

I have already put forward the claim of provinces for full autonomy, and hence the questions of working of dyarchy, the position of ministers in relation to the members of Executive Council, the working of particular department, the classification of reserved and transferred subjects, the desirability of second chambers, do not arise. The position and powers of Governor, the position of ministers in relation to Governor, the collective responsibility of ministers are to be dealt with by themselves and by exact clauses in the new Government of India Act.

"The Treasury of the Provincial Government and the Central Government" should be separate. If the Meston Settlement is to be continued, the head "Income Tax" under the Central Government should be made provincial.

The aim of Indian political system is to nationalise the Provincial Government, hence a separate and independent provincial system of finances cannot but be the basis of such a Government. Every province should be left, as far as possible, to develop its resources and all the avenues of taxation. As the sovereign authority in all matters under the constitution, the Provincial Government shall be controlled by the Government of India, but devolution of authority in matters political, social and economic be embodied in the New Government of India Act, so as to ensure complete provincial autonomy.

V. The Central Government.

"Some element of responsible Government in the Central Legislature should be introduced."

The introduction of responsibility in Government of India will be in accordance with the constitutional progress already defined and decided by the British Parliament in granting self-government to India. The system of dyarchy should be introduced, some subjects like the Army, Navy, Foreign Affairs, Indian States Management and other subjects of Imperial importance should be made reserved and separate non-votable items in the Central Budget should be shown, while all other subjects, finances, taxation, railways, Indian marine, education, and sanitation should be made responsible to the legislatures. The present system of giving over as many departments as possible to one Secretary or a Minister discloses a lack of political science. Each secretary or a minister should be in charge of one department and one subject only. Limiting the number of secretaries (executive councillors) or ministers by the Government of India Act has no meaning. If it is introduced on economic basis, then the salaries of such secretaries or ministers should be reduced. But it should be borne in mind that the present salaries of executive councillors, and ministers are all within the economic boundary, and to level them down will not only impair efficiency, but will give rise to immeasurable sources of abuse. It cannot be denied that high salaries of elected allure all political adventurers, yet the returns for services rendered—when all sources except personal and private are barred—should be in proportion to what is paid in other walks of life to the average intellectual persons, otherwise the State will not command the best intellect of the land in the service of the country. The life at legislature and the secretariats should not be made a slavery, as to result in turning away honest, straightforward and self-respecting persons from political life as it is done in the United States of America and in some slight degree in the United Kingdom.

Defence of India.

(1) The employment of British Army, Navy or Air Forces should be eliminated, and the recruitment of Indian Army, Navy and Air Force should be made so as to take the place of the British force in India within a period of ten years. I do not claim the severance of British connection, yet an employment and presence of alien army, whether British or non-British, is always an eyesore to the extremist leaders of thought and they make much out of it even on uncalled-for occasions. On the question of appointing Indian officers over the British troops, an argument is put forward that British soldiers will not be willing to serve under Indian officers, the same argument can be well advanced and it can be said that the Indian troops will not like to serve under British officers. Whatever be the sentiment behind the argument on the side of the British force, the same sentiment should prevail in the case of Indian forces; and we are further of opinion that the British Parliament should not wait to see that the Indian forces with one voice condemn by action or by express will the employment of British officers over them.

2. The command of the Army, Navy and Air Force should be vested in the Governor-General in Council.

In putting this claim we are making the forces employed in India independent of the British Army, and putting on the same level as the forces of the Colonies, which cannot be employed outside the Indian frontiers without the sanction of the Indian Legislatures. The forces in India are paid by India, and hence their engagement and movements should be controlled by India.

3. Half of the revenues of the Central Government are spent after the forces. We do not think India is able to bear such a heavy load for the times indefinite. Some way is to be found. The Indianisation of the Army is the one way, and the most effective is the establishment of territorial force and the introduction of compulsory military and naval service for the youths of the country. Two years' military and one year's naval service should be made compulsory for all males (at the age of 18 till the age of 21) and one year's naval service should be made compulsory for all males (at the age of 18 till the age of 21) and one year's Red Cross service should be made compulsory at the age of 16 till the age of 18, and the units of the standing army should be appreciably reduced so that expenditure on forces will have control. In this connection we may warn the British Parliament that their suspicious treatment of Indian people have given birth misunderstandings, and we hope that the era of trust will be inaugurated.

The Position of Services.

"All services should be dependent on the Governor-General in Council. No services should claim a higher authority or an appeal to higher authority than the Governor-General in Council."

This clearly denotes that the Council of the Secretary of State, his control over Indian affairs, the recruitment of services independent of the Indian Government are all done away with, as they are not only useless but at the same time harmful to the growth of Indian representative institutions and democratic ideas.

AFTERNOON.

Mr. A. N. SURVE, B.A., LL.B., J.P., Advocate and Fellow, University of Bombay, and Mr. S. K. BOLE, J.P., M.L.C., Bombay.

162. Chairman: (To Mr. Surve) We are obliged to you, Sir, and to Mr. Bole for coming in together because we know that you are not of quite the same view.

Mr. Surve, just a word to you first. Were you not a member of the Bombay Council?—In the first two Councils I was a member.

163. From the City of Bombay constituency?—Bombay City North Reserved Constituency.

164. The seat that is reserved for non-Brahmins?—It is reserved for the Mahratta and allied castes only, not for all the non-Brahmins.

165. In the same way, Mr. Bole, you are, I believe, at present a member of the Legislative Council. Are you not?—Yes, Sir.

166. You are a nominated member representing labour?—Yes, Sir.

167. Chairman: Let us take Mr. Surve for a moment. Mr. Surve, when I read your document what I see you suggest is this. You say at present there are seven seats reserved for Mahrattas and allied castes?—Yes, Sir.

168. Are you one of the members?—Yes, I belong to one of the allied castes.

169. Well, now, your suggestion is that the number of seats should be increased to 14?—Yes, sir.

170. But I thought I read it in your document that you thought they should not be for the Mahrattas but for the allied castes only?—Yes, Sir; that is what I suggest.

171. That would mean 14 seats to the allied castes excluding the Mahrattas?—Yes, sir. There are only seven seats reserved at present. I ask for 14 seats. If 14 seats or a larger number of seats are given to us then the Mahrattas need not be taken out of the protection which the reservation of seats confers.

172. At present I understand there are seven seats in the Council which are reserved for non-Brahmins, and they are what are called "Mahrattas and the allied castes"?—Yes.

173. If you suggest that there ought to be 14 seats what I am not clear about is—do you suggest that the 14 seats should not be reserved for the Mahrattas strictly speaking?—They should be reserved for Mahrattas as well as the allied castes, but care should be taken to see that the latter get the benefit of the reserved seats and are not altogether excluded from them in the future as they are at present by the Mahrattas.

174. I think your view is that there should be some extension of the franchise?—Yes, Sir.

175. But you do not think that you should go to the length of adult suffrage?—Yes.

176. You suggest some lower qualification?—Yes.

Chairman: That, I think, gives the Conference the special views of this gentleman.

177. Mr. Hartshorn: (To Mr. Bole) I would like to ascertain by reference to Bombay what is your connection with labour. I understand you are a nominated member of the Legislative Council?—Yes, sir, I am.

178. Are you an official of any industrial concern?—I was a member of the Bombay Textile Workmen's Union.

179. Can you give us the membership of that union?—About 6,000.

180. Are you connected with the Trade Union Congress?—I was once the Chairman of the Reception Committee in Bombay of the All-India Trade Union Congress held in Bombay.

181. Are you still associated with them?—I am on the Provincial Committee.

182. In the document which you have sent, is it your personal opinion expressed or has the opinion you have expressed been submitted officially through the organisation with which you are connected?—It is my personal opinion.

183. So that you cannot say, can you, whether if the suggestions you made were submitted to the organised labour, there would be common agreement with them or not?—I cannot say that. But I think they would be acceptable.

184. You express the belief that the only solution is to do away with the principle of reservation of seats and nomination of non-official members and to adopt the principle of universal suffrage?—I still hold that view.

185. Has that subject ever been discussed in your Trade Union meetings?—Yes, that has been discussed.

186. And you have found fairly common agreement on that point?—Yes, common agreement.

187. Can you tell us why you have come to the conclusion that the adoption of that proposal would have solved the problems associated with separate electorates, nomination and other things which you have mentioned?—I think then every man will get the opportunity to exercise the right of voting.

188. But do you think that the Mahomedans would be prepared, if they got universal suffrage, to dispense with the separate electorates or the reservation of seats?—I cannot say about the Mahomedans.

189. But I rather gather from the opinion you have expressed in this document that the adoption of universal suffrage will solve those problems?—I think so.

190. Is it your experience that in the labour organisation your membership would be prepared to accept the adoption of that principle and give up the claim in the other directions if they got universal suffrage?—Yes.

191. Now you say if that principle is not adopted, then it becomes necessary to have reservation of seats and nomination and separate electorates and so on?—Yes, that is necessary.

192. I notice that on page 31 you say: "Apart from the Hindu or Moslem question, the question of the backward communities or depressed communities, labour population and agricultural population require serious attention of the British Parliament." There I notice you distinguish between the depressed classes and labour population?—Yes.

193. Where do you draw the line between the depressed classes and the labour population?—The depressed classes are regarded as untouchables. That is quite a distinct class.

194. I notice on page 31 you say: "We do not know what fate our proposal of universal suffrage will meet at the hands of the Commission, and hence it is better to make certain suggestions for nominations, and so on." Then you say: "The present nominations to safeguard any other interests other than agriculture and labour should be done away with and adequate (for example, 5 seats for labour and 7 for agricultural population) nominations for these two classes of population should be recommended." In this paragraph you wish to abolish nomination for all classes except labour and agriculture?—Yes.

195. In the previous paragraph you made a distinction between labour and the depressed classes?—Here I mean that capitalists as such do not want separate nomination.

196. I will make myself clearer. You have got, according to the memorandum supplied to us, in the present Legislative Council 3 nominated to represent the labouring classes and 2 those classes which, in the opinion of the Governor, are depressed. That is to say, you have 5 now for labour and the depressed classes. Now you say on page 31 that all nominations should be abolished except for labour and agriculture and you ask for 5 for labour?—What I mean by that is that at present reserved seats are given to mill-owners of Bombay and such other industrial interests in the Bombay Council. That is not necessary. That is what I say.

197. Then am I to understand that what you are asking for is 5 labour seats in addition to representation for depressed classes?—Yes.

198. You do not propose to exclude them from nomination?—No.

199. The Chairman: I gather that Mr. Bole would propose to get rid of reserved seats for the Mahrattas and the allied castes?—Yes, if the proposal of universal franchise is accepted.

200. Then I do not think you agree with Mr. Surve?—I do not agree. But if my proposal is accepted then his difficulty would also be solved. At present Gujarat and the province of Sind have got more representation than their proportion of population entitles them to, whilst the Marathi-speaking districts are neglected. They do not get adequate representation according to their population. If the Marathi-speaking districts and all other districts get representation on the basis of population, then this difficulty would be solved. What is required is to increase their number of members in the Bombay Legislative Council. If the number is raised to 200 then each district will get about four seats. Then if some seats are reserved for the Mahrattas and allied castes one Mahratta may come in and other non-Mahratta communities also may get a chance.

201. Mr. Hartshorn: Am I to understand that it has been laid down in any official way by labour in the Bombay Presidency that what labour is asking for is first of all universal suffrage, then the complete abolition of reservation of seats, of nominations, separate electorates, and so on, but that if you failed to obtain that, then you ask that labour shall be represented by five nominated members and the agricultural population by seven?—Yes.

202. Is that an official demand put forward by organised labour in Bombay?—No.

203. That is merely your own view?—Yes.

204. That is your suggestion?—Yes.

205. Then we must take this at the moment as very largely being the opinion of yourself, and that alone?—Yes.

And I gather that you lay down the suggestion that first of all you should have universal suffrage, secondly that India should be divided up into areas on a linguistic basis and that within those areas there shall be provincial autonomy? I think that sums up pretty well what you said here?

206. Mr. Hartshorn: Are there any organisations connected with the textile industry besides the one in which you were an official?—Yes.

207. Will you give us the total membership of the textile workers in the Trade Union in Bombay?—Only textile?

208. Yes.—About 16,000.

209. They have not been consulted about these proposals?—No.

210. Dr. Ambedkar: There was one thing about which the evidence of the witness has not been correctly summarised by Mr. Hartshorn. The witness said that the number of seats in the Bombay Legislative Council should be apportioned among the different parts, Sind, Karnatak and Marathi-speaking districts, in proportion to the population. He did not say that there should be Provinces on the basis of language.—(Mr. Bole): No.

Dr. Ambedkar: His point was that there was unfair distribution.

Mr. Hartshorn: He said: "The trend of political thought in the world is on the side of creating small self-sufficing nationalities, which may achieve fullest realisation of their political ideals without any outside interruption, and such conditions require same language and same historic traditions; the division of India in new Provinces based on 'one language' is ardently desired by every thoughtful Indian, and the sooner it is done the better."

211. Dr. Ambedkar: There the witness was saying about the distribution of seats.—(Mr. Bole): What I say is that seats should be distributed on a population basis.

212. Major Attlee: I just wanted to bring out one point about your reply to Mr. Hartshorn as to the number of textile workers in the union in the City of Bombay. Of course, there are other textile operatives outside Bombay who are organised—in Ahmedabad and so forth. I have seen the figures in the official labour returns. I just wanted to make that clear. You are speaking only of the Bombay City, but not of the textile workers of the Bombay Presidency?—No.

(At this stage the Chairman vacated the Chair, which was occupied by Lord Burnham.)

213. Rao Saheb Patil: Mr. Surve, I think, in the interest of the backward classes, you want reservation of seats for the whole of the Presidency?—(Mr. Surve): Yes; but I am speaking generally for the Marathi-speaking districts.

214. My question is that you like the idea that in all the districts of the Bombay Presidency, so far as the backward classes are concerned, there ought to be reservation of seats in each and every district?—Well, that would be a desirable thing indeed.

215. It is quite desirable?—Yes.

216. In the interest of the backward classes?—Yes.

217. So I think you will like the idea that all the backward classes should be included in the Mahratta and allied castes?—Yes. And to that effect a resolution was passed only last Sunday (14th October, 1928) by the conference of the allied castes held in Poona. That resolution has been already sent to the office of the Commission. The resolution, as we passed it, was in Marathi. Its English rendering is as follows:—

> Those backward Hindu castes, excepting the depressed classes, who desire to be included among the allied castes should be so included.

The exclusion of the depressed classes does not mean that we want to go against their interests. They want that separate provision should be made for them and therefore we have not asked for anything on their behalf. We are asking in this resolution only for our own interests, but we do not oppose the granting of more facilities to the depressed classes. That is the explanation which I want to give for excluding the depressed classes in this resolution.

218. So then you want more reserved seats for all the backward classes?—Yes.

219. You have said in your memorandum that there ought to be reserved seats for non-Mahratta backward classes?—Yes.

220. Of course, you wanted to safeguard the interests of the non-Mahratta backward classes?—I wanted to safeguard their interests as well as the interests of the large number of castes that are at present not included in the term "Allied Castes." The idea before my mind was about these 14 reserved seats only, but if reservation is to be extended to other backward classes and the number is not to be increased beyond 14 seats then the first preference should be given to the allied castes, which term will include, as stated by me a little before, all other Hindu backward castes also.

221. So far as Mahrattas are concerned, the non-Mahrattas can settle their difference with the Mahrattas?—Yes. We have political organisations—both Provincial and All-India—called the Non-Brahmin Conference and Congress respectively. Whatever differences we may have among ourselves can be settled in that body.

222. In short, your claim is that reserved seats should be given to all the backward classes as such?—Yes.

223. These reserved seats should also exist in the Central Legislatures?—Yes. I may as well mention that in the second and the third Legislative Assembly there was not a single person who represented the backward Hindu communities. The Maratha and the other Hindu backward communities are at present unrepresented. In the first Legislative Assembly, which was elected during the non-co-operation days, two members were returned. One got in from the Central Division and he was Mr. Bagde, and another got in from the Southern Division, and he was Mr. Latthe. But they got in only because the other advanced communities were at that time under the influence of non-co-operation. If non-co-operation had not existed then even these two gentlemen who had the chance of getting into the Legislative Assembly would never have got it. Therefore, if no arrangement is made, if no special facility is provided, then, under the existing order neither the Mahrattas nor any other backward classes will ever have an opportunity of being represented in the Legislative Assembly.

224. Lord Burnham: Do I understand from you that on the general list in the constituencies not a single Mahratta was returned?—Yes; no Mahratta was returned.

225. Rao Saheb Patil: So far as the Central Legislature is concerned not a single Mahratta was returned for the Council?—Yes. Several candidates came forward, but they were defeated.

226. So then, do you mean to say that though the number of voters of the backward classes is sufficiently large, still on account of certain influences at work they cannot take full advantage of the right of vote?

—That is so, because there are various interests. For instance, there is indebtedness, there is illiteracy, and then there is the landed interest. All the land is practically in the hands of the rich people. So practically these rich people in a way coerce their tenants to vote in a particular direction, and that is why other people get returned.

227. So then may I take it that the reservation of seats in the Central Legislature is quite essential in the interests of the backward classes?—Indeed it is so.

228. You are in favour of lowering the franchise?—Yes.

229. To what extent?—My individual idea is to lower it as far as the land assessment is concerned to half of the present limit. The present limit is Rs. 16 in the Ratnagiri district and in the other districts it is Rs. 32. I want that it should be half of that, that is, Rs. 16 for all the other districts and Rs. 8 for Ratnagiri. As for rental qualification, I want that in the urban area it should be Rs. 4 for Bombay City and Rs. 2 for Karachi City—I have said that in my memorandum—and Re. 1 for other urban areas.

230. Mr. Bole, do you agree with the views expressed by Mr. Surve?—(Mr. Bole): I agree. But I want to increase the number of seats allotted to each district.

231. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You, Mr. Bole, represent the labour organisation in Bombay?—Yes.

232. What is the condition of labour as regards education?—The percentage is very low.

233. What is the percentage of educated labour?—I think it might be 3 or 4 per cent.

234. Has any progress been made in literacy during the last ten years?—Yes, some progress has been made.

235. Could it amount to $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{3}{4}$ or, say, 1 per cent. more?—I think it might be 1 per cent. more, because it is only now that the corporation has introduced the scheme of free and compulsory primary education in some of the wards.

236. When you speak of universal suffrage, do you speak of universal male and female suffrage or only universal male adult suffrage?—Universal male and female suffrage.

237. You will enfranchise all men and women irrespective of whether they possess any property qualifications or not, whether they are literate or illiterate? Only the fact that they have attained the age of 21 years would do?—Yes, 21 in the case of males and 25 in the case of females.

238. You think that by giving a universal male and female franchise, labour is not likely to be exploited by designing people? Do you think that there will be the danger of exploitation?—In the initial stage that will happen.

239. And therefore in the initial stage it might endanger the purpose for which reformed legislature shall have been constituted?—But by that way only these men will get the proper training.

240. Will you not therefore begin by giving them universal franchise in district councils and municipalities and when they are sufficiently schooled in the art of self-government in these local bodies then extend the franchise to local councils and last of all to the Legislative Assembly. Do you not think that that would be a more logical course to follow?—I think it is no use to wait; how long are they to wait, I do not know.

242. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You have stated in your memorandum that you would not like any nominations?—Yes.

253. Sir Hari Singh Gour (to Mr. Surve): You are in favour of provincial autonomy, Mr. Surve?—Yes, with certain safeguards.

254. Do you like to suggest any other safeguards beyond those you have mentioned in your memorandum? You have suggested, on page 7, clause (c): "I think the power of veto of Governor in respect of moving resolutions in councils should be withdrawn. Same remarks apply to motions for adjournment of business. This power is open to abuse in unsympathetic hands. Power of certification of a bill or of any of its clauses should not be exercised by Governor if the measure is passed unanimously or by an overwhelming majority of non-officials." Subject to these safeguards the removal of these provisions, you would advocate giving provincial autonomy to the provinces?—Yes.

255. I am asking you whether these are the only safeguards which you wish to suggest. You want that the powers which are now enjoyed by the Governors should be taken away. Have you got any safeguards to put in their places?—When I was examined by the Reforms Inquiry Committee, I suggested at that time that Finance and Police should remain with some agency which is not under the control of the legislature. Taking the situation as it exists to-day, I mean the communal conflicts where one party tries to overawe the other, I think that this safeguard is essential. In other respects provincial autonomy should be given, but before it is given communal quarrels should first be settled. If they are not settled, provincial autonomy will not work and will prove disastrous to the welfare of the Presidency. These are the only safeguards which I would like to suggest for the granting of provincial autonomy.

256. Are you in favour of transferring law and order in your Presidency?—No.

257. You want to exclude law and order and put them under the Central Government?—Not exactly. I want to have a sort of limited provincial autonomy. With the safeguards I have suggested provincial autonomy should be given.

258. Do you want that law and order should be a reserved subject under an Executive Councillor or you would transfer them directly under the control of the Central Government?—I think the suggestion that I made before the Muddiman Committee—and to which I stick even to-day—was this: that the Governor should have the control of law and order. I should think that so long as party disputes are not settled it will not be in the interests of the Presidency to transfer law and order. I had also made a suggestion about finances. The finances also should remain for some time at least out of party influence.

259. Lord Burnham: Do I understand you to be saying that you wish to leave the subjects of Government divided as at present, that is to say, to keep land revenue, law and order still reserved subjects?—I do not want that land revenue should be a reserved subject.

260. I thought you said Finance?—Yes, I want Finance to be a reserved subject. In Bombay Finance is a portfolio by itself. It deals with revenue and expenditure also.

261. Sir Hari Singh Gour: As regards the claims of the community, the Backward Classes, the Depressed Classes and the Mahomedans, how may seats in a total of 100 would you give to these three combined classes and also to Landed Classes and the Labourers? Have you worked out all this?—I have not worked out on that line.

262. After making these reservations, what will be the number of seats that will be left over to the Advanced Classes? Have you worked it out?—I have only worked out for the Marathi-speaking districts; I have not touched the Mahomedan interests or any other interests.

263. Sir Arthur Froom (to Mr. Bole): May I know, Mr. Bole, the name of the Labour organisation with which you are connected?—The name of the Union with which I was connected is called the Bombay Textile Workmen's Union.

264. Is it registered?—Yes.

265. Under the Trade Unions Act?—Yes.

270. You have made another statement, Mr. Bole. I preface my remarks by saying that I do not question at all there being an army in India officered by Indian officers, I do not disagree with it nor am I arguing against it. But you make a statement here that Indian soldiers do not like to serve under British officers. Have you any justification in making that statement?—As the Europeans do not like to serve under Indian officers, it is natural that Indians will not like to serve under European officers.

271. They never tried it. Have they?—Because Indians are never given the chance of being officers in the army.

272. Lord Burnham: I suppose you do not refer to the past or the present, but that your statement is confined to the future?—Yes.

273. Dr. Suhrawardy: Mr. Bole, I understand you say that you are in favour of provincial autonomy? Yes.

274. One of the reasons why you want provincial autonomy is, I believe, due to the fact that, generally speaking, dyarchy has failed in the provinces?—No; in Bombay Presidency it has not failed.

275. Why do you then want provincial autonomy? —We want provincial autonomy because we want that there should be no reserved subjects.

Lord Burnham: Thank you, gentlemen. That concludes the evidence. We are much obliged to your attendance and for having answered so frankly the questions put to you.

Statement concerning the safeguards for the protection of the interests of the Depressed Classes as a minority in the Bombay Presidency and the changes in the composition of, and the guarantees from, the Bombay Legislative Council necessary to ensure the same under Provincial Autonomy. Submitted by Dr. BHIMRAO R. AMBEDKAR, M.A., Ph.D., D.Sc., Barrister-at-Law, Member of the Legislative Council, Bombay, on behalf of the Bahishkrita Hitakarini Sabha (Depressed Classes Institute of Bombay).

I.—Protection through Adequate Representation.

1. Preliminary.—The Sabha feels relieved of great anxiety by the decision of Parliament not to appoint an Indian on the Statutory Commission. The agitation for the appointment of an Indian would have been proper if the Commission had to consider a common Indian demand for self-government. But the fact is that the Commission shall have to consider not one demand, but a variety of demands made by the different interests prevailing in the country. That being the case the agitation should have been for a representation of all such interests on the Commission. The Sabha desires to point out that nothing could have satisfied the Depressed Classes better than the appointment of Indians representing various interests in the country, including their own, on the Statutory Commission. The demand for representation on the Statutory Commission was not, however, of such a nature and the Sabha, therefore, could not feel at one with those who urged it. The Sabha, it is true, did not agitate as it should have done, in conformity with its own views, for the representation of the depressed classes on the Commission. But that was because the Sabha felt that it was too much to hope for in a country where those in charge of the affairs from the Viceroy downwards have cultivated the habit of recognising the noisy few and forgetting the dumb millions. To use the language of Burke, because half a dozen politicians, like grasshoppers under a fern, make the field ring with their importunate chink, whilst the masses, like thousands of great cattle, are reposing beneath the shadow of the oak, chew the cud and are silent, the Government of India imagines that the politicians who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field—that, of course, they are many in number—or that, after all, they are other than the little, shrivelled, meagre, hopping, though loud and troublesome insects of the hour. But there was also another reason why the Sabha did not press for its views. In the opinion of the Sabha this exclusion of Indians from the Statutory Commission was no small mercy to the depressed classes. For, by their non-appointment the depressed classes are, at any rate, saved the prejudice that would have otherwise been caused to their case, which the Sabha has hereby undertaken to place before the Commission.

2. Injustice done to the depressed classes in 1919.—The Montagu-Chelmsford Report recognised fully (para. 151) that the existence of the social differences and divisions formed " a feature of Indian Society which is out of harmony with the ideas on which elsewhere in the world representative institutions rest " and the authors of the Report (para. 153) held that they " have to be taken into account and they must lead us to adjust the forms of popular Government familiar elsewhere to the special conditions of Indian life." In accordance with this, the authors of the Report, in order to pacify the depressed classes who had stoutly opposed the introduction of the Reforms, undertook to safeguard their interests, as will be seen from the following statement in para. 155 of their Report in which they say " we have shown that the political education of the ryot cannot be very rapid and may be a very difficult process. Till it is complete he must be exposed to the risk of oppression by people who are stronger and cleverer than he is; and until it is clear that his interests can safely be left in his own hands, or that the Legislative Council represent and consider his interests, we must retain power to protect him. So with the depressed classes. We intend to make the best arrangements we can for their representation in order that they too may ultimately learn the lesson of self-protection. But if it is found that their interests suffer and that they do not share in the general progress, we must retain the means in our hand of helping them * * * *."

3. The Sabha regrets that all these promises were thrown to the wind by the Southborough Committee which was subsequently appointed to devise franchise, frame constituencies and to recommend what adjustments were needed to be made in the form of the proposed popular Government as a consequence of the peculiar social conditions prevalent in India. So grossly indifferent was the Southborough Committee to the problem of making adequate provision for safeguarding the interests of the depressed classes that even the Government of India, which was not overparticular in this matter, felt called upon in para. 13 of their despatch on the Report of the Southborough Committee to observe: " We accept the proposals (for non-official nomination) generally. But there is one community whose case appears to us to require more consideration than the Committee gave it. The Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms clearly recognised the problem of the depressed classes, and gave a pledge respecting them. The castes described as ' Hindus—others ' in the Committee's Report, though they are defined in varying terms, are, broadly speaking, all the same kind of people. Except for differences in the rigidity of their exclusion they are all more or less in the position of the Madras Panchamas, definitely outside that part of the Hindu community which is allowed access to their temples. They amount to about one-fifth of the total population, and have not been represented at all in the Morley-Minto Councils. The Committee's Report mentions the depressed classes twice, but only to explain that in the absence of satisfactory electorates they have been provided for by nomination. It does not discuss the position of these people or their capacity for looking after themselves. Nor does it explain the amount of nomination which it suggests for them. Paragraph 24 of the Report (of the Franchise Committee) justifies the restrictions of the nominated seats on grounds which do not suggest that the Committee were referring to the depressed classes. The measure of representation which they propose for this community is as follows:—

Province.	Total population in millions.	Population of Depressed classes in millions.	Total seats.	Seats for the Depressed classes.
Bombay ...	19·5	·6	113	1
Bengal	45·0	9·9	127	1
United Provinces	47·0	10·1	120	1
Punjab	19·5	1·7	85	—
Bihar and Orissa	32·4	9·3	100	1
Central Provinces	12·0	3·7	72	1
Assam	6·0	·3	54	—
Total ...	221·4	41·9	791	7

" These figures speak for themselves. It is suggested that the one-fifth of the entire population of British India should be allotted seven seats out of practically 800. It is true that in all the Councils there will be, roughly, a one-sixth proportion of officials who may be expected to bear in mind the interests of the depressed (?): but that arrangement is not, in our opinion, what the Report on Reforms aims at. The authors stated that the depressed classes should also learn the lesson of self-protection. It is surely fanciful to hope that this result can be expected from including a single member of the community in an assembly where there are 60 to 90 caste-Hindus. To make good the principles of paragraphs 151, 152, 154 and 155 of the Report we must treat the out-castes more generously. * * *"

4. The Sabha feels happy that it is not alone in its opinion as to the injustice done to the depressed classes by the framers of the Reforms Scheme of 1919. This opinion was also shared by the Muddiman Committee, which was appointed two years afterwards to report upon the possibility of improving and enlarging the scheme of reforms. That Committee admitted in its Report (paragraph 64) that the representation granted to the depressed classes under the scheme was inadequate.

5. Extent of Representation that must be Granted to the Depressed Classes.—What then should be the extent of the representation of the depressed classes which can be said to be adequate? In the opinion of the Sabha the following scheme for the composition of the Legislative Council of Bombay, assuming that Sind will be separated from the Presidency, may be deemed to satisfy the demand of the depressed classes for adequate representation:—

Composition of the Bombay Legislative Council for I—Bombay Presidency without Sind.

7. In either case the demand of the Sabha is for 22 representatives of the depressed classes in a Council composed of 140 members. The Sabha desires to state emphatically that this much representation to the depressed classes in a Council of 140 is only just. The Sabha is aware that some people are likely to call such a demand as a very large one. Such a view must, however, be deemed to be the result of prejudice against the depressed classes. It cannot be said to be founded upon any definite reason. The Sabha thinks that an exact idea as to the population of the depressed classes would be a sufficient corrective to views of this sort. For it must be admitted that population is a measure by which to evaluate the representation that is to be granted to any community. The computation of the exact strength of the depressed classes is, therefore, a matter of considerable importance. The depressed classes of the Bombay Presidency have already suffered an injustice at the hands of the Southborough Committee in 1919. That Committee gave in its Report a grossly wrong figure* as to the exact strength of the depressed classes in the Bombay Presidency—a figure which was absolutely unwarranted by the Census of 1911. So small was the strength of the depressed classes shown by the Southborough Committee that even the paltry suggestions of the Government of India to give two representatives to the depressed classes in the Bombay Legislative Council failed to have any effect. Similar attempt is now being made in responsible quarters to whittle down the population of the depressed classes. For instance, Mr. Bajpai, speaking on behalf of the Government of India in the Legislative Assembly on the 23rd February, 1928, said "that the population of the depressed classes in India was much exaggerated, and that the real strength of the depressed classes was only 28½ millions and not 60 millions" as used to be stated theretofore. The Sabha fears that the Commission may fall into the same error in which the Southborough Committee fell, and may in consequence make proposals based upon such erroneous calculation. The Sabha therefore desires to draw the attention of the Commission to what the Director of the Census of India has to say in this connection. In chapter xi. of Volume I. of the Census of India 1921 the director observes:—

"Paragraph 193. It has been usual in recent years to speak of a certain section of the community as the "depressed classes." So far as I am aware the term has no final definition, nor is it certain exactly whom it covers. In the Quinquennial Review of the Progress of Education from 1912 to 1917 (chapter xviii, paragraph 505) the depressed classes are specifically dealt with from the point of view of educational assistance and progress, and in Appendix XIII. to that Report a list of the castes and tribes constituting this section of the community is given. The total population classed according to these lists as depressed amounted to 31 million persons, or 19 per cent. of the Hindu and tribal population of British India. There is undoubtedly some danger in giving offence by making in a public report social distinctions which may be deemed invidious; but in view of the lists already prepared and the fact that the "depressed" have, especially in South India, attained a class consciousness and a class-organisation, are served by special missions, "raised" by philanthropic societies and officially represented in the Legislative Assemblies, it certainly seems advisable to face the facts and to attempt to obtain some statistical estimate of their numbers. I therefore asked Provincial Superintendents to let me have an estimate based on census figures of the approximate strength of the castes who were usually included in the category of "depressed." I received lists of some sort from all Provinces and States except the United Provinces, whose extreme delicacy of official sentiment shrank from facing the task of attempting even a rough estimate. The figures given are not based on exactly uniform criteria, as a different view is taken of the position of the same group in different parts of India, and I have had in some cases to modify the estimate on the basis of the figures in the educational report and of information from the 1911 reports and tables. They are also subject to the general defect which has already been explained, that the total strength of any caste is not recorded. The marginal statement [reproduced below] gives, however, a rough estimate of the minimum numbers which may be considered to form the "depressed classes" of the Hindu community. The total of these provincial figures adds to up about 53 millions. This, however, must be taken as a low and conservative estimate since it does not include (1) the full strength of the castes and tribes concerned and (2) the tribal aborgines most recently absorbed in Hinduism, many of whom are considered impure. We may confidently place the numbers of the depressed classes, all of whom are considered impure, at something between 55 and 60 millions in India proper. * * *"

8. This cautious and considerate estimate of the Director of Census must supersede all guesses and surmises regarding the strength of the depressed classes in the different Provinces of India. It destroys the validity of the estimate of Mr. Bajpai. For, it has been arrived at after scrutinising the figures that have appeared in the Provincial Educational Reports which Mr. Bajpai says have formed the basis of his statement. Its correctness must be admitted. For, as the Director says, it was arrived at after a deliberate investigation. The Sabha must, therefore, insist upon the Statutory Commission accepting these figures in preference to any other. According to this estimate the minimum strength of the depressed classes in the Bombay Presidency is 2,800,000 souls or 10.8 per cent. of the total population. On the basis of their strength alone the depressed classes are entitled to 15 seats out of a total of 140.

9. If the strength of a community was the only factor governing the extent of the representation to be granted to it, then the demand for the seven extra seats for the depressed classes would no doubt appear to be one for an unearned increment. It must, however, be recognised that the strength of the community cannot be taken as the sole factor in determining matters of this sort. The standing of a community is no less an important factor to be taken into account in determining its quota of representation. The standing of the community must mean its power to protect itself in the social struggle. That power would obviously depend upon the educational and economic status of the community. It follows from the recognition of the principle that the lower the standing of a community the greater is the electoral advantage it must get over the rest. There can be no two opinions that the standing of the depressed classes, both educational and economical, is the lowest in this Presidency. Consequently they are entitled to some electoral advantage over what they are entitled to on the basis of their strength. This electoral advantage must be greater in the case of the depressed classes than in the case of any other community of equal strength and standing; because no community can be said to form a submerged class in the same sense in which the depressed classes do. Nor can any class be said to be burdened with those grave disabilities which form the common lot of the depressed classes and which prevent them from rising above their degraded station in life. This is one reason why the Sabha feels justified in asking for this increment in representation. There is also another reason which the Sabha thinks must justify the extra-representation claimed by it for the depressed classes. The representation of a minority, if it is to protect the minority, must also be effective. If not, it would be a farce. To escape this reproach it must be recognised that if a minority is to be protected then there must be enough representatives of the minority to save it from being entirely submerged. To put the same thing in the form of a proposition, the effectiveness of a minority representation depends upon its being large enough to have the sense of not being entirely overwhelmed. In claiming this extra-representation the depressed classes, the Sabha thinks, are entitled to invoke this principle in their favour, in common with the rest of the minorities in the country.

10. Necessity for impartial treatment of all minority communities.—These principles governing the extent of representation are those which have been laid down by the Government of India in their despatch reviewing the Report of the Southborough Committee. The Sabha desires to point out that the case of the depressed classes was more deserving of the application of such principles than that of any other community that could have been thought of in the whole of India. In practice, however, the benefit of these principles was rigorously denied to the depressed classes all throughout India and was literally showered upon a community like the Mahomedans holding a stronger and better position in the country than can be predicated of the depressed classes. To point out one such instance of unequal treatment the Sabha would invite the attention of the Commission to the two following cases:—

Provinces.	Moslem Population.	Seats for Moslems.	Depressed classes Population.	Seats for D.C.
Bombay Presidency	1,297,443	7	1,627,980	1

Howsoever indignant one may feel over the perpetration of such injustices to the depressed classes the Government of India does not blush at it. For it had avowedly enunciated those principles for the very limited purpose of applying them to the Mahomedans only. This was due, as every one knows, to the distinction the Government of India made in the political importances of the different communities. The Sabha protests against this grading of the citizens of a country on the basis of their political importance. There can be no safe and secure rule except the one that all communities are politically of equal importance. This invidious distinction is at the root of all the communal troubles and is destructive of the principle of equal opportunity. The introduction of this principle in the governance of India at the time when the first instalment of Reforms was granted by Parliamnet was disastrous to the interests of the depressed classes. The Sabha is glad to find the present Secretary of State recognising the existence of the depressed classes as a problem for serious consideration in the decision that may now be taken with regard to the enlargement of the scope of the political reforms already introduced. But the Sabha is anxious to point out that such recognition would be of no consequence to the depressed classes if it is not reflected in the changes that may now be introduced into the framework of the constitution of the country.

11. Mode of representation.—The Sabha is opposed to the principle of nomination and would insist upon the extension of the principle of election to the depressed classes. Election is not only correct in principle from the standpoint of responsible Government, but is also necessary in practice from the standpoint of political education. Every community must have an opportunity for political education which cannot well be secured otherwise than by the exercise of the vote. It must be regarded as unfortunate that the depressed classes, who need such education more than any other community, should be denied an opportunity to take their share in the rapidly developing political life of India. There is also another reason why election in the case of the depressed classes is a necessity. Ministership is a very important privilege, and the depressed classes cannot afford to forego the same. No great benefit can come to them from the introduction of political reforms unless they can find a place in the Cabinet of the country, from where they can influence the policy of the Government. This opportunity will be denied to them so long as they are denied the opportunity of electing their own representatives. For, under responsible Government nominated members must continue to be ineligible for office. A system of representation like that of nomination which deprives the depressed classes of this right must stand self-condemned.

12. Two objections are usually urged against the application of the principle of election to the depressed classes.

(a) Difficulty in forming constituencies.—This objection, the Sabha thinks, must be ruled out of serious consideration as not being honest. If difficulty in the matter of forming constituencies was a consideration which led Government to prefer nomination to election in the matter of the representation of the depressed classes, it is difficult to understand how the Government ventured to apply the principle of election to the Moslems and the Europeans. These communities are not less scattered than the depressed classes and no constituencies can be formed for them including the existing ones, which cannot be condemned as absurd from a logical point of view. All the same, the Government of Bombay did abandon its æsthetic sense and undertook to form asymmetrical constituencies for these communities when it found it impossible to form symmetrical ones. All these difficulties in regard to the formation of the constituencies for the Depressed classes are, however, set at rest under the scheme of representation outlined by the Sabha. The problem being thus simplified, no objection ought now to be raised for the substitution of the principle of nomination by the principle of election.

(b) Difficulty in getting a sufficiently large electorate.—Will there be a sufficient number of electors in any constituency to make the election of the Depressed classes to the Council a real election? By way of pointing out a difficulty in substituting election for nomination this question is usually raised and answered in the negative. The difficulty would, no doubt, be there if it is decided that the existing pitch of the franchise is not to be touched and so long as the pitch continues where it now is, the Sabha must admit that the number of electors among the Depressed classes will be very few. But the Sabha thinks that the existing pitch of the franchise is unjustifiable on every ground. It has turned responsible Government into a mockery. It means a Government of the whole Presidency of two crores of people by a minority of seven lakhs who happen to have the good fortune of being voters under the existing franchise. Such a state of things is clearly vicious and cannot be allowed to continue in future, if there is to be responsible Government, not merely in name but also in fact. It is to be regretted that the question of franchise does not seem to have been adequately pressed by the class that is most vocal in demanding Reforms. Democracy is alleged to be the aim of that class, but if the truth be told, in the words of the Government of Burma, " they are in favour of democratic institutions mainly because they are making an appeal to a democratic nation. They could not very well call for democracy and leave the Demos out. Their chief interest in the Reforms is centred in the powers that they expect to gain over the executive. The broad franchise and responsible voting in its true sense by the rural electors is not at all the central idea of their demand. As long as their own class will furnish the Legislative Councillors who will exercise the desired control, it is immaterial to them whether these represent few or many voters." Whether or not this is the correct diagnosis of the indifference of the Indian politicians to the important question of franchise, the fact remains that the question of franchise occupies in Congress politics a very subordinate place as compared to the question of the transfer of powers. In the opinion of the Sabha, this attitude of the Congress politicians is a reversal of the true relationship between the question of the franchise and the question of transfer of power. It must be admitted that the dictum of the Government of India that the forces which now hold the administration together cannot be withdrawn before satisfactory substitutes are ready to take their place must find acceptance in all quarters which are willing to look at things from a proper perspective. Now these substitutes must obviously be the electors: it follows therefore that the degree and the kind of responsibility which can be introduced into the Government of the country will depend upon the strength of the electors. So vital is this question of the franchise that upon its determination alone can depend the degree of the transfer of political power. What should be the franchise is therefore a most important question. In the way in which it is determined at present the Sabha wishes to point out that the principal aim of representative Government has been lost sight of altogether. Franchise means the right to determine the terms of associated life. Franchise can mean nothing else. If that is the meaning of franchise, then it follows that it should be given to those who by reason of their weak power of bargaining are exposed to the risk of having the terms of associated life fixed by superior forces in a manner unfavourable to them. If this is true, then the very exigencies of representative Government demand that the franchise, if the term is properly understood, must be fixed so low as to bring it within the reach of the large majority of the poor and the oppressed sections of society. Indeed, adult franchise is the only system of franchise which can be in keeping with the true meaning of that term. The Sabha would, however, be content if the franchise for the Legislative Council is fixed at the same level as that for the Taluka Local Board in the rural parts and Rs. 3 rental per month in urban parts of the Presidency. The fear often entertained on the part of the Government that such a lowering of the franchise will bring in a large part of unintelligent people is without foundation. Large property is not incompatible with ignorance. Nor is abject poverty incompatible with high degree of intelligence. Property may as well dull the edge of intelligence. On the other hand poverty does and often must stimulate intelligence. Consequently the adherence of the Government to a high property qualification as an insurance against ignorance is nothing but a superstition, which is sedulously cultivated by the classes and fostered by the Government in order to deprive the masses of their right to the making of their Government.

13. System of Election.—Free election in general constituencies is, in the opinion of the Sabha, out of the question so far as the depressed classes are concerned. On the other hand, the Sabha does not wish to ask for Communal electorates. In its opinion, it would be sufficient if the depressed classes are provided with reserved seats in the general constituencies. In the case of the candidates for election from the depressed classes the Sabha would urge the total abandonment of the residential qualification and a partial relaxation in the condition as to deposit.

14. Representation in the Assembly.—The Sabha respectfully protests against the non-recognition of the right of the depressed classes in the Legislative Assembly in 1919. The Government of India is still supreme in important matters which are directly under its control or under the Reserved half of the Provincial Governments. Even in respect of the Transferred subjects it continues to have the power of superintendence. It is, therefore, obvious that in the direction of such large powers the depressed classes should have some voice and the Sabha would, therefore, claim that three members from the depressed classes of the Bombay Presidency should be elected to the Legislative Assembly by their representatives in the Local Legislative Council.

II.—Protection through Guarantees.

15. In addition to the demand for adequate representation the Sabha feels that it must also demand the inclusion of clauses in the constitution of the country and as a fundamental part thereof, guaranteeing the civic rights of the depressed classes as a minority in the Bombay Presidency. Such guarantees must cover the recognition of the following propositions concerning the interests of the depressed classes:—

(1) That the education of the depressed classes shall be recognised as the first charge on the revenues of the Province and that an equitable and just proportion of the total grant for education should be earmarked for the benefit of the depressed classes.

(2) That the right of the depressed classes to unrestricted recruitment in the army, navy, and the police shall be recognised without any limitation as to caste.

(3) That for a period of 30 years the right of the depressed classes for priority in the matter of the recruitments to all posts, gazetted as well as non-gazetted, in all civil services shall be recognised.

(4) That the right of the depressed classes to the appointment of a special inspector of police from amongst themselves for every district shall be recognised.

(5) That the right of the depressed classes to effective representation (as defined above) on the local bodies shall be recognised by the Provincial Government.

(6) That the right of the depressed classes to appeal to the Government of India in cases of violation of these rights by the Provincial Government shall be recognised and the Government of India shall be given the power to compel the Provincial Government to conform to the law in the matter.

16. Justification of such guarantees.—It may be argued that as the depressed classes have been given adequate representation in the council, there can be no danger to their rights, as there can be in the case of an unrepresented minority. Why then should there be these guarantees? The Sabha demurs to this much faith in the efficacy of a representative form of Government to effectively protect a minority from the tyranny of the majority. In this connection the Sabha would like to invite the attention of the Commission to the views of John Stuart Mill, who has observed that " the notion that the people have no need to limit their power over themselves, might seem axiomatic, when popular Government was the thing only dreamt about or read of as having existed as some distant period of the past * * * It was now perceived that such phrases as self-government, and the power of the people over themselves, do not express the true state of the case. The people who exercise the power are not always the same people with those over whom it is exercised; and the self-government spoken of is not the government of each by himself, but of each by all the rest. The will of the people, moreover, practically means the will of the most numerous or the most active part of the people, the majority or those who succeed in making themselves accepted as the majority; the people, consequently, may desire to oppress a part of their number; and precautions are as much needed against this, as against any other abuse of power. The limitation, therefore, of the power of Government over individuals loses none of its importance when the holders of power are regularly accountable to the community, that is to the strongest party therein. This view of things, recommending itself equally to the intelligence of thinkers and to the inclination of those important classes in European Society to whose real or supposed interests democracy is adverse, has had no difficulty in establishing itself; and in political speculations the tyranny of the majority is now generally included amongst the evils against which the Society requires to be on its guard."

17. From this it is obvious that representative Government cannot altogether do away with the necessity of such guarantees for the protection of the interests of the minorities in a nation. Indeed it may safely be asserted that a representative form of Government, far from being a means of affording protection to the minorities, must be deemed to be so very inadequate for that purpose that its introduction without a system of guarantees being made a part thereof was looked upon as a most dangerous experiment. The post-war history of Europe abounds in such cases. The peace treaties between the allied Powers and Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, Rumania and the Polish-German Convention relating to Upper Silesia with their guarantee clauses for the benefit of the minorities bear eloquent testimony to the fact that the minorities cannot depend upon the representative form of Government but must seek protection in the form of guarantees of their rights.

18. If representative Government is so weak when operating among European peoples, where the secularisation of politics has gone far further, how much weaker must it be in India where politics is nothing but theology in action. It is this theology against which the depressed classes must seek to be protected. How destructive is this theology of true citizenship has nowhere been described so well as in the Note by the Honourable Sir Alexander Cardew, K.C.S.I., I.C.S., to the Government of India contained in the Letter No. 1146 (Reforms) dated the 31st December, 1918. The following extracts are made from that Note:—

"2. It may first be asked whether the democratic idea is in accordance with the prevailing philosophy of the people of India. The fundamental principle of the modern democratic state is the recognition of the value of the individual and the belief that as each individual has but one life, full opportunity should be accorded to each to attain his maximum development in that life. Neither of these propositions is accepted in the current philosophy of India. This rather holds that the present life is for each only one of a series of existences; that the position of each individual in this life has been determined for him by his merit or demerit in previous births; and that, therefore, his place in the social organism is irrevocably fixed and cannot be changed. It may, therefore, be safely asserted that the root notions of democracy run counter to all the ideas which for thousands of years have formed the common stock of popular belief in India.

"3. Closely connected with the doctrine, that each man's place in the present birth has been determined by his actions in past existences is the institution of caste, which has the effect of stereotyping and fixing unalterably the position of each individual in the social scale. Thus, a man born a Brahmin cannot be other than a Brahmin, and a man born Pariah can never be other than a Pariah. Equality of opportunity is impossible under such conditions and it is neither recognised nor desired by Indian public opinion.

"4. At the apex of the caste pyramid stands the Brahmin. This caste, originally representing, at least in Southern India, a racial difference, has established through a long period of time its absolute supremacy over all other castes. The Brahmin's claim to supremacy is based not only on race and intellect, but also on the injunctions of religion. The sanctity of a Brahmin's person and religious merit to be obtained by feeding him, paying for his education, providing money for the marriage of his daughters, endowing him with land, has been an established belief in India for centuries * * * Brahmins possessed numberless privileges * * *

"6. With such predominance in most walks of life, it is not surprising that the Brahmin has easily secured control in politics * * * No representative of the great Pariah Community nor of the Christian Community has ever sat, or would ever have a chance of sitting, for one of these constituencies. This experience strongly suggests that the political machine in the future as in the past will be under the control of the Brahmans, unless special measures are resorted to, to secure adequate representation of the other classes.

"8. Next to the Brahman sed longo intervello comes the great group of Hindu castes, some higher, some lower, generally grouped together as non-Brahmans, but all equally exclusive and largely antagonistic to one another. It is notorious that if a member of one of these castes attains to a position of influence he fills the offices in his gifts with his fellow castemen. The Standing Orders of the Government recognise this tendency and contain directions to counteract it. The Joint Report is not ignorant of this, for it says, "there runs through Indian society a series of cleavages of religion, race and caste which constantly threaten its solidarity." These distinctions of castes do not merely threaten the solidarity of Indian society—they prevent such solidarity from ever existing.

"9. Below both the Brahmans and the non-Brahman caste Hindus, come the low castes, or more correctly the persons of no castes, who number in this Presidency [i.e., Madras] some ten millions of people. For convenience they may be referred to as the Panchama or Pariah community. These people are regarded, not merely as belonging to a lower class, but as conveying by their very presence an actual pollution which requires purificatory religious ceremonies.

"13. The difficulty of introducing democratic institutions into a society such as this, illiterate, divided into hard and fast castes, with the Brahman at the top, with the various non-Brahman Hindu castes in the middle, and the low castes, liable to be oppressed impartially by both, at the bottom must be very great. Nor does this difficulty seem to have been sufficiently realised by the writers of the Joint Report. Surely the first essential of any scheme of reform is that adequate safeguard should be provided for the good government of the inarticulate masses of the population * * *"

18. If this is a correct description of the existing state of affairs then the Minorities of Europe cannot be said to have a better case for obtaining guarantees of their rights than the Depressed classes. Many people in the world have fallen low by force of circumstances. But having fallen they are free to rise. The depressed classes, on the other hand, form a solitary case of a people who have remained fallen because their rise is opposed to the religious notions of the majority of their countrymen. Much was made before the Muddiman Committee by certain persons of the resolutions passed by the various Legislative Councils, throwing open wells, dispensaries and dharmshalas to members of depressed classes, and of the circulars issued by Ministers of Education requiring children of the depressed classes to be admitted to schools in common with the rest. But what a mockery such resolutions and circulars are will be apparent to the Commision from the perusal of annexure A to this statement. It will illustrate the attitude of the majority towards the depressed classes as evidenced by incidents reported from time to time in the various newspapers in the country (items No. 1 and 10). From a perusal of these news items it will be realised that the depressed classes cannot be employed in the army, navy and the police, because such employment is opposed to the religious notions of the majority (item No. 8). They cannot be admitted in schools, because their entry is opposed to the religious notions of the majority (item No. 12). They cannot avail themselves of Government dispensaries, because doctors will not let them cause pollution to their persons or to their dispensaries (item No. 2 and 5). They cannot live a cleaner and higher life, because to live above their prescribed station is opposed to the religious notions of the majority (items No. 1 and 6). So rigorous is the enforcement of the social code against the depressed classes that any attempt on the part of the depressed classes to exercise their elementary rights of citizenship only ends in provoking the majority, to practise the worst form of social tyranny known to history (items No. 4, 7 and 11). It will be admitted that when society is itself a tyrant, its means of tyrannising are not restricted to the acts which it may do by the hands of its functionaries and it leaves fewer means of escape, penetrating much more deeply into the details of life, and enslaving the soul itself. Protection against such tyranny is usually to be found in the police power of the State. But, unfortunately, in any struggle in which the depressed classes are on the one side and the upper class of Hindus on the other, the police power is always in league with the tyrant majority (item No. 11), for the simple reason that the depressed classes have no footing whatsoever in the police or in the magistracy of the country.

19. In view of this, it is unfair to the depressed classes to be lulled into the belief that their interests would be safe in the hands of their countrymen, because some Councils have passed resolutions and some of the Ministers have issued circulars favouring the depressed classes. The Sabha desires to caution the Commission against being lured into forming a better opinion of the Hindu majority from its best instances. Pictures of loving exercise of authority on one side, loving submission to it on the other, of superior wisdom ordering all things for the greatest good of the dependants are very gratifying to read. But such pictures would be to the purpose only if any one from the depressed classes denied the existence of good men in the Hindu society. Nobody among the depressed classes doubts that there would be great and universal happiness under the government of a good Hindu. But the fact is that laws and institutions require to be adapted not to good men but to bad. From this point of view, it is safer to grant the minority the necessary protection by the inclusion of guarantee clauses than to leave it unprotected on the fanciful ground that the tyrant majority has in it a few good men sympathetic to the minority. Such guarantees may be looked down upon by persons other than the depressed classes as being unnecessary; but from the standpoint of the depressed classes it is but an essential safeguard. There is such an enormous dread of the Reforms prevalent amongst the depressed classes that they have from the very beginning opposed their introduction. So strong was their feeling against the Reforms that in one of the addresses presented to Mr. Montagu the depressed classes declared "we shall fight to the last drop of our blood, any attempt to transfer the seat of authority in this country from the British hands to the so-called high-class Hindus." Nothing can allay such fears as the system of guarantees can do. Government is based upon faith and not upon reason. If the depressed classes can have no faith in the new constitution it is statesmanship to buy that faith if it can be done so with the concession of guarantees herein demanded.

ANNEXURE A.

ITEM No. 1.

No Uplift for Antyajas.

As a landmark in the rapid progress of Indian social reform, a lecture delivered last month by Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Ananta Krishna Shastri (Professor, Calcutta University) to an audience of Sanatanist (orthodox) Agrawal Marwadis of Bombay in the local Nara-Narayan temple, deserves to be rescued from unmerited oblivion. The subject of the discourse was "The Way to Uplift the Patits" (i.e., "fallen" untouchables), and the chair was graced by Shri Jagadguru Anantacharya Maharaj of the new Vaishnav temple in Bombay. The lecturer proved by citations from the Shastras that the various castes have always been in existence and will continue so to exist till the end of all time. He added that those who talk of uplifting the "Fallen" (Antyajas) are merely talking, and that, in fact, there is no way of uplifting the Antyajas in the sense of getting them admitted into any of the four castes, or taking them out of their present social position.

Orthodox Generosity.

The learned lecturer suggested the only possible way of uplifting the "unupliftable Fallen," namely, generously restoring to them some of their inalienable professions at present encroached upon by unthinking and unorthodox caste people. "In this 20th century," said the Mahamahopadhyaya, "people on getting up in the morning sit down to clean their costly shoes instead of performing their appointed morning ritual. Next they sit down to shave themselves. And instead of cleaning their teeth in the Swadeshi style (i.e., with twigs of babool, etc.), they sit down to rub powder on their teeth with brushes. By doing all these things they deprive Mochis (cobblers), Hajams (barbers), and tooth-stick sellers of their livelihood. Let everyone do his duty according to Dharma and rest content. This is the only way to bring about the uplift of the Antyajas—let those who have deprived these Fallen people of their means of livelihood restore it to them."

Antyajas in India.

But, the patriots will protest, all this happened in British India, not in Indian India. Well, we know what happened to Balais only the other day in a big Central India Native State for wearing gold and silver ornaments and absurdly presuming to behave like touchable caste Hindus. And this is what the Saurashtra reports about the Antyajas in Baroda territory, where the Maharaja himself sympathises so deeply with these unfortunates: "The order to admit Antyaja boys into Gujarati schools is on paper only. In nearly 95 per cent. of the schools the Antyaja children are made to sit outside in the cold, heat or rain, and they are made to fetch cowdung, fuel, droppings, dust, etc. * * * In April, 1927, an Antyaja went to the Damnagar dispensary for medicine. The doctor made him wait for twelve hours and then examined him—from a distance, and gave him medicine—from a distance. This happened in the presence of an Antyaja member of the Baroda Legislative Assembly." And the Pratap of Surat tells us that when a teacher in the Navasari Antyaja Ashram took an ailing boy to the local hospital, the doctor in charge drove them both away with these remarkable words: "Get away! This is not Gandhi Raj but Baroda Sarkar's Raj!"

Untouchable in Jambusar Municipality.

Four Hindus Resign.

A sensation has been caused in Jambusar at the election of an untouchable to the Jambusar Municipality. Four Hindu members have resigned, while the rest have promised not to touch the untouchable member and to bathe if ever they touched him.

(From the Bombay Chronicle.)

KOLABA DEPRESSED CLASS CONFERENCE.

Rowdyism of Upper Class Hindus.

The Times of India in its issue of the 24th gives a statement of the riot at Mahad. But as that statement is incomplete and fails to give a correct idea of what happened it is necessary to give a complete and correct account of the riot.

A Conference of the Depressed Classes of the Kolaba District was held at Mahad on the 19th and 20th instant (i.e., of March, 1927) under the Presidentship of Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, Bar.-at-Law. The attendance of the depressed classes was over 2,500 and great enthusiasm prevailed. But the work of the Conference was severely marred by a riot, the responsibility for which rests entirely upon the upper class Hindu residents of the town of Mahad. On the first day of the Conference, after the President had delivered his address, several upper class Hindus addressed the Conference assuring the depressed classes that they were willing to help them in all ways and urging that the depressed classes should not cultivate hatred of the upper class Hindus. In pursuance of this, the Subjects Committee drafted a resolution, among others laying down what the upper class Hindus should do for the uplift of the depressed classes. In the Subjects Committee attention was drawn by some people to the fact that there was a great difficulty at Mahad for the depressed classes in obtaining water for drinking purposes, and that this difficulty was felt not only by the resident depressed classes of Mahad but also by the depressed classes from villages who resorted to Mahad for private business or for the purposes of Government work. So great was the scarcity that water worth Rs. 15 had to be bought each day to satisfy the needs of the Conference. The Municipality of Mahad had some time ago passed a resolution declaring the tanks in the city to be open to the public, but as it had not placed a board there people feared to resort to them. The Subjects Committee, therefore, decided, after taking the sense of the upper classes who attended the Conference in this matter, that the Conference should go in body to the Chowdar tank and help the depressed classes in establishing their right to take water.

A False Rumour.

When, therefore, the Conference met on the morning of the 20th, and the first resolution which declared what the upper classes should do for the depressed classes was put before the Conference by members of depressed classes, the President requested Messrs. Purushottam Prabhakar Joshi and Govind Narayan Dharya (as representatives of the upper classes) to speak on the resolution. With the exception of one clause in the resolution dealing with inter-marriages they both accepted the resolution. Having thus assured itself that there was general support behind it, the Conference, when the Session was over, went in a body to the said tank. The procession was a most peaceful one and everything passed off quietly. But after about two hours some evil-minded leaders of the town raised a false rumour that the depressed classes were planning to enter the temple of Vireshwar, whereupon a large crowd of riffraffs were collected, all armed with bamboo sticks. The crowd soon became aggressive, and the whole town at once became a surging mass of rowdies, who seemed to be out for the blood of the depressed classes.

Twenty Wounded.

The depressed classes were busy in taking their meal before dispersing to their villages. When a large part of them had left the town the rowdies entered the kitchen where the depressed classes were taking their food. There would have been a regular battle between the two forces, but the depressed classes were held back by their leaders, and thus a far more serious riot was averted. The rowdies, finding no occasion for provocation, began patrolling the main street and assaulting the members of the depressed classes who in stray batches were passing along on their way to their villages and committed trespass in the houses of several depressed-class people and gravely assaulted them. In all the number of wounded among the depressed classes is supposed to be as large as 20. In this the attitude of the depressed classes was as commendable as the attitude of many of the upper classes was unworthy. The depressed classes assembled vastly outnumbered the upper classes. But as the object of their leaders was to do everything in a non-violent and absolutely constitutional manner they set their faces against any aggression on the part of the depressed classes. It speaks a great deal in favour of the depressed classes that, although the provocation given to them was immense, they kept their self-control. The Mahad Conference has shown that the upper classes are not willing to allow the depressed classes to enjoy such elementary civic rights as taking water from public watercourses.

The most reprehensible part of the conduct of the upper-caste Hindus in Mahad and Kolaba District was that messages were sent immediately to the different villages asking the upper-class people there to punish the delegates of the Conference as soon as they returned to their respective villages. In obedience to this mandate assaults were committed on a number of Mahars returning from the Conference either before or after they reached their villages, where the depressed classes have the disadvantage of being overwhelmingly outnumbered by the upper-caste Hindus. The leaders of the depressed classes have appealed to the authorities for protection and the District Officials, including the D. S. P., are making inquiries on the spot. It must, however, be stated that, if the Resident Magistrate had not allowed two precious hours to pass without doing anything, the riot would have probably been averted.

Man's Inhumanity to Man.

(By M. K. Gandhi.)

In another column will be seen an extract from Navajivan of a most disgraceful case of calculated inhumanity of a medical man towards the dying wife of a member of the suppressed class in a Kathiawad village. Sjt. Amritlal Thakkar, who is responsible for giving the details of the case, has withheld the names of the place and parties for fear of the poor suppressed class schoolmaster being further molested by the medical man. I wish, however, that the names will be disclosed. Time must come when the suppressed class people will have to be encouraged by us to dare to suffer further hardships and tyranny. Their sufferings are already too great for any further sufferings to be really felt. Public opinion cannot be roused over grievances that cannot be verified and traced to their sources. I do not know the rules of the Medical Council in Bombay. I know that in other places a medical practitioner who refused to attend before his fees were paid would be answerable to the Council and would be liable to have his name removed from the Council's list and be otherwise subject to disciplinary action. Fees are no doubt exactable; but proper attendance upon patients is the first duty of a medical practitioner. The real inhumanity, however, if the facts stated are true, consists in the practitioner refusing to enter the untouchable's quarters, refusing himself to see the patient, and refusing himself to apply the thermometer. And if the doctrine of untouchability can ever be applied in any circumstances it is certainly applicable to this member of the profession which he has disgraced. But I am hoping that there is some exaggeration in the statement made by Sjt. Thakkar's correspondent, and, if there is none, that the medical practitioner will himself come forth and make ample amends to the society which he has so outraged by his inhuman conduct.

Read, Reflect and Weep.

There is a school for the children of the suppressed classes in a village in Kathiawad. The teacher is a cultured, patriotic man belonging to the Dhedh or Weaver (untouchable) class. He owes his education to the compulsory education policy of His Highness the Gayakwad, and had been doing his little bit for the amelioration of his community. He is a man of cleanly habits and refined manners, so that no one can recognise him as belonging to the untouchable class. But because he had the fortune or misfortune of teaching the children of his own community in a conservative village in Kathiawad everyone regards him as an untouchable. But, unmindful of that, he had been silently working away. There are some moments, however, when the most patient man living under intolerable conditions may give vent to his agony and indignation, which are evident in the following letters from the schoolmaster. Every little sentence in it is surcharged with pathos. I have purposely omitted the names of the village and all the people mentioned in the letter lest the schoolmaster should come into further trouble.

Namskar. My wife was delivered of a child on the 5th instant. On the 7th she was taken ill, had motions, lost her speech, had hard breathing and swelling on the chest, and her ribs were aching painfully. I went to call in Dr. ——, but he said "I will not come to the untouchables' quarters. I will not examine her either." Then I approached the Nagarsheth —— and the Garrsia Durbar ——, and requested them to use their good offices for me. They came, and on the Nagarseth standing surety for me for the payment of Rs. 2 as the doctor's fee, and on condition that the patient would be brought outside the untouchables' quarters, he consented to come. He came, we took out the woman, who had a baby only two days old. Then the doctor gave the thermometer to a Mussalman who gave it to me. I applied the thermometer and then returned it to the Mussalman who gave it to the doctor. It was about eight o'clock, and, having inspected the thermometer in the light of a lamp, he said: "She has pneumonia and suffocation." After this the doctor left and sent medicine. I got linseed from the market and we are applying linseed poultice and giving her the medicine. The doctor would not condescend to examine her, simply looked at her from a distance. Of course, I gave Rs. 2 for his fee. It is a serious illness. Everything is in His hands.

II.

The light in my life has gone out. She passed away at 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Comment is needless. What shall one say about the inhumanity of the doctor who, being an educated man, refused to apply the thermometer except through the medium of a Musalman to purify it, and who treated an ailing woman lying in for two days worse than a dog or a cat? What shall one say of the society that tolerates this inhumanity? One can but reflect and weep.

A. V. THAKKAR.

ITEM No. 6.

(From the Times of India dated 1-4-28 and 10-2-28.)

Tyranny of Hindus.

Rules for Balais.

Mode of life laid down.

Last May, high caste Hindus, viz., Kalotas, Rajputs, and Brahmins, including the patels and putwais of villages Kanaria, Bicholee Hafsi, Bicholi Mardana, and of about 15 other villages in the Indore district, informed the Balais of their respective villages that if they wished to live among them, they must conform to the following rules:—(1) Balais must not wear gold lace bordered pugrees; (2) they must not wear dhoties with coloured or fancy borders; (3) they must convey intimation of the death of any Hindu to relatives of deceased—no matter how far away these relatives may be living; (4) in all Hindu marriages the Balais must play music before the processions, and during the marriages; (5) the Balai women must not wear gold or silver ornaments; they must not wear fancy gowns, or jackets; (6) Balai women must attend all cases of confinement of Hindu women; (7) the Balais must render services without demanding remuneration, and must accept whatever a Hindu is pleased to give; (8) if the Balais do not agree to abide by these terms, they must clear out of the villages.

Balais refuse compliance.

The Balais refused to comply; and the Hindu element proceeded against them. Balais were not allowed to get water from the village wells; they were not allowed to let go their cattle to graze. Balais were prohibited from passing through land owned by a Hindu; so that if the field of a Balai was surrounded by fields owned by Hindus, the Balai could have no access to his own field. The Hindus also let their cattle graze down the fields of Balais. The Balais submitted petitions to the Darbar against these persecutions; but as they could get no timely relief, and the oppression continued, hundreds of Balais, with their wives and children, were obliged to abandon their homes in which their ancestors lived for generations and migrate to adjoining States, viz., to villages in Dhar Dewas, Bhopal, Gwalior, and other States.

Compulsory agreement.

Only a few days ago the Hindus of Reoti village, barely seven miles to north of Indore City, ordered the Balais to sign a stamped agreement in accordance with the rules framed against the Balais by the Hindus of other villages. The Balais refused to comply. It is alleged that some of them were beaten by the Hindus; and one Balai was fastened to a post, and was told that he would be let go on agreeing to sign the agreement. He signed the agreement; and was released. Some Balais from this village ran up to the Prime Minister the next day, i.e., on the 20th December, and made a complaint about the ill-treatment they have received from the Hindu villagers of Reoti. They were sent to the Subha of the district. This officer, with the help of the police, made inquiries at the village, and recommended that action be taken against the Hindus under Sections 342 and 147 and against the Balais under Section 147 Indian Penal Code.

BALAIS LEAVE VILLAGES.

CASTE TYRANNY.

Ignorance of law a handicap.

There has been no improvement in the treatment of the Balais by the Hindu residents of certain villages. Balais, it has already been reported, have been ill-treated by the higher caste Hindus. From the Depalpur Pergana alone, Indore District, a large number of Balais have had to leave their homes and find shelter in adjoining States. The villages from which Balais have been forced to clear out are Badoli, Ahirkheral Piploda, Moorkhera, Pamalpur, Karoda, Chatwada, Newri Pan, Sanauda,, Ajnoti, Khatedi, and Sanavda. Pamalpur village has been altogether deserted, and not a Balai, man, woman, or child is to be found there. Nanda Balai, a resident of one of the above villages, it is alleged, was severely beaten by the Hindus of the village. In one village, the report goes, the Hindus burnt down all the dwellings of the Balais but the offenders have not yet been traced.

Balais are ignorant village folk, who are ignorant of legal procedure and think that if a petition is sent to the Sirkar all that is required will be done for them. They have not the knowledge, or the means and practice, to pursue a complaint to its end; and, as they, it is said in some cases, failed to attend or produce witnesses in support of their allegations, the magistrate had no alternative but to dismiss their complaint.

Orthodoxy Run Mad.

Alleged Barbarous Treat of "Untouchables."

Crime of being Mahars.

Mr. Keshavaji Ranchhodji Vaghela from Ahmedabad has informed Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, President, Bahishkrit Hitkarani Sabha, as follows:—

One, Bapoorao Laxman, and his brother, Kaurao, have been residents of Ahmedabad during the last six years. They used to mix with some people from the Deccan belonging to Maratha caste. Kaurao's two sons, viz., Damoo and Laxuman, used to take part in the Bhajan parties of the Marathas. The latter, however, recently came to know that the brothers Damoo and Laxuman were Mahars by caste and in order to ascertain this, two Mahars employed on the parcel train between Surat and Ahmedabad were specially called to identify Damoo and Laxuman. After it was ascertained that Damoo and Laxuman were Mahars they were called at a Bhajan party at Kalupur, Bhanderi Pole, at midnight on the 11th instant. Asked as to what caste they belonged to, Damoo and Laxuman replied that they were Somvanshis. This reply enraged the Marathas, who freely abused them for having defiled their persons and places. The Mahar brothers were also assaulted by the Maratha. One of the brothers had a gold ring on his person. It was forcibly taken away from him and sold for Rs. 11. Out of this amount Rs. 6 was paid to the Mahars who had been called from Surat to identify the brothers. Damoo and Laxuman entreated the Marathas to allow them to return to their homes, but the latter refused to do so unless a fine Rs. 500 was paid. On the Mahar brothers pleading their inability to pay such a heavy sum, one of the Marathas suggested that the Mahar brothers should be fined only Rs. 125. But then one of the Marathas opposed the proposal for fine saying that they should not be satisfied with fine, but should punish the Mahars severely for their crime of concealing their caste. Having decided upon the course, the Mahar brothers were detained and at about 9 o'clock in the morning they were subjected to barbarous indignities. Their moustaches in the left side and eyebrows on the right side were shaved, their bodies besmeared with soot mixed in oil and also with dirt, garlands made of old shoes were put around their necks, and one of them was asked to hold a broom in his hand and the other to hold a placard on which it was written that the punishment was meted out to the culprits for venturing to touch high caste people. The Mahar brothers were taken in procession consisting of about 75 people, a drum being beaten in the front.

A complaint has been lodged with the police by the said two Mahar brothers. The accused in their statement have admitted that Damoo and Laxuman were treated in the alleged manner, but pleaded that the complainants had willingly agreed to undergo the punishment. Obviously Damoo and Laxuman were helpless when they were abused, assaulted and threatened with severe punishment and actually subjected to barbarous indignities. This case has created a great sensation among the people belonging to the so-called untouchables castes and efforts are being made to give proper legal aid to the complainants.

Police: Enlistment of Mahars.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar: Will Government be pleased to state whether there is any rule prohibiting the enlistment of the depressed classes in the police constabulary force of the Presidency?

The Honourable Mr. J. E. B. Hotson: There is no such rule.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar: Will the Honourable Member please inform me why the Commissioner of Police for the City of Bombay refuses to appoint depressed class members in the police constabulary if there is no restriction?

The Honourable Mr. J. E. B. Hotson: This opens up a very large subject. I can only say that there are practical difficulties which are known to every member of this House, and which stand in the way of the more extensive enlistment of these classes in the police. There is no prohibition against it.

N.B.—The practical difficulties referred to by Mr. Hotson are evidently difficulties arising out of untouchability.

THROUGH INDIAN EYES.

" Chamardas and Mahardas."

How sincere the political lions are when they roar about the disabilities and hardships of the Untouchables, was clearly brought out at the Maharashtra Conference when the question of the removal of untouchability was adroitly shelved. Among the half-dozen or so of protestants against this trick were men belonging to the Swarajya. One of them wrote in that paper an outspoken article, exposing the general Hindu outlook on the thorny problem, which shows much light on what the Maharashtra Conference did; " While speaking to me the other day," says the writer about the Samata Sangha (Social Equality Society) of Poona, a friend of mine said: " Because people like you join them, these Chambhardas and Mahardas (contemptible Chamars and Mahars) become insolent " * * * From this utterance one can realise what a terrible hatred of the Untouchable classes still exists among the upper classes.

Resolutions and Acts.

The sad reformer continues: " Mahatmaji issued a proclamation that untouchability was a blot on Hindu dharma; Swami Shraddhanand and Lala Lajpat Rai have said all along that we shall never be able to win Swaraj if untouchability is not removed from Hindu Society; during the last seven years resolutions for its removal are being adopted by the Congress; but what is the actual result of all these activities? Utterances like the one given above are still coming out of the mouths of highly educated persons! We pass resolutions in the Congress and the Hindu Sabha advocating temple entry of Untouchables and urging that public tanks, wells, etc., should be thrown open to them. But when the time for putting them into practice comes, we contemn the Untouchables, nay, we assault them and then proceed legally against them and send them to jail."

ITEM No. 11.

Resolutions passed at the Depressed Classes Conference held at Dapoli (District Ratnagiri).

1. (a) This Conference expresses indignation at the campaign of persecution carried on by the so-called high caste Hindus in this district against the depressed classes for the refusal on the latter's part to eat the meat of dead animals.

(b) This Conference is extremely grieved to find that the Police officers and Magistrates in the district systematically abuse the depressed-class people instead of giving them protection against the tyranny and injustice to which they are being subjected by the so-called high caste Hindus through impounding the cattle of the former, committing assaults on them and making it impossible for them to obtain the necessaries of life in the bazaars by observing a strict social boycott against them.

(c) This Conference appeals to the Government to take steps for having the usual baluta remuneration paid to the Watandar Mahars who have been deprived of the same by the high caste Hindu villagers owing to the former's refusal to eat the carrion and carry dead animals, beg alms and do other unclean things.

2. (a) Having come to know that in a number of villages it is the Police Patel who countenances the campaign of persecution against the depressed-class people, this Conference requests the Government to take proper steps against such Police Patels.

(b) This Conference requests the Government to appoint in each district a special Police Inspector from amongst the depressed classes for the protection of these classes and to admit recruits from these classes in the police service.

(c) This Conference requests the Government immediately to quarter punitive police under the command of military pensioners belonging to the depressed classes, at the villages of Vadval, Matven, Tulsi, Degaon, Mandangad, Satar, etc., at the expense of the so-called high caste Hindus residing in these villages in view of the fact that owing to harassment and social boycott and open assaults it has become impossible for the depressed classes to live in these villages.

5. This Conference is emphatically of the opinion that no further instalment of self-government be given to India except with proper safeguard for the interests of the depressed classes.

ITEM No. 12.

(From the Bombay Chronicle, dated 20-10-27.)

Municipal Schools (in the City of Bombay).

The Schools Committee has made itself ridiculous by taking fright at the little question of drinking " lotas " (pots). It seems that, in spite of the Corporation's resolution that there should be no caste discrimination in the municipal schools, " depressed " class children are given separate pots for drinking water. A sub-committee of the Schools Committee recommended that all children should be given the same pots. But the members of the School's Committee gravely cogitated over this recommendation and entertained all sorts of fears. Some said that the change would be resented by the caste Hindus; evidently, the resentment of the " low " caste Hindus does not count for much. Professor V. G. Rao said that it was a revolutionary change, and Mr. D. G. Dalvi, himself a well-known social reformer, added to these fears a legal one, that some parents might file a suit against the Committee. Ultimately the Schools Committee referred the question back to the sub-committee, which was tantamount to saying that the latter's recommendation was not acceptable to them.

A Calculated Insult.

The fears mentioned above are absurd, as every boy is expected to wash a pot well before using it, on sanitary and—if he is so minded—on caste grounds. That a pot once used by an " untouchable " boy becomes itself untouchable or unusable by the " high " caste Hindus in spite of its being washed clean, is a calculated insult to the unfortunate " depressed " classes, which we certainly did not expect the Schools Committee to countenance. Mr. Dalvi stated that in view of compulsory education in some Wards parents might file a suit against the Committee " for enforcing an obligation which was by no means a legal one." But nobody is under an obligation to use the common pots in the schools. Those parents who are so over scrupulous may give their own pots to their children and thereby protect their " religion." As for the " depressed " classes the insult to them remains, whether they bring their own pots or betake themselves to other schools where better notions of justice prevail.

The Joint Memorandum of The Depressed India Association, Bombay, and The Servants of Somavamshi Society, Bombay.

"Nothing is settled, that is not rightly settled.
If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong in the World." —ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

SIRS,—

We have been directed by our Associations, of which we have the honour to be the Presidents, to submit to the Commission this Memorandum, which contains an account of our status, in the social, political and economic spheres, and a statement of the concessions which constitute, in our humble opinion, the irreducible minimum which ought to be granted to our community if we are to enjoy a fair measure of that prosperity and economic welfare which we, as human beings, and as subjects of His Imperial Majesty, our beloved King-Emperor, have a right to expect from the hands of the Commissioners.

1. It is not our purpose to explain how, by the mandates of a wicked caste system and the silent workings of centuries of prejudice, we have been reduced to a state of degradation on a par with the beasts of the field, regarded as the untouchables and outcasts of society, and denied the use of roads, wells, entry to temples, and, in fact, the most elementary amenities of civilised life. Thanks to the joint influence of missionary education and British rule, the walls that divided us from the society of our fellow men have been breached, but the progress of their disintegration is slow and laborious and, unless our rulers take our condition seriously in hand and initiate definite steps towards our uplift, we can see no betterment of our position, in any sphere, in the near or the distant future.

2. In the Bombay Presidency we number about three millions by a recent computation; that is to say, one-ninth of the population of the Presidency. If the voice of our people is to be heard with effect in the councils of the nation, our representation therein must be substantial. We plead for nothing more than that, according to the principles of strict fairness and equity, we should have a representation in proportion to our numerical strength. At least one-ninth of the representation of the Legislative Council should be reserved to us, of which half the number may enter by election and half by the system of nomination. This measure of representation, we are confident, will not trespass upon the rights of other communities, nor will it involve the fate of Ministries, but it will serve to make our voice heard in the Council, and, when we are unanimous, will represent a moral force which the Council will find it difficult to ignore. Moreover, such representation must be a natural one; that is to say, our representatives must be men selected from the rank and file of our community. That this principle has not been recognised is apparent when we recall that recently, in Bombay, an Indian Christian and, in Madras, a Brahmin was nominated to represent our people. Such a system of representation runs counter to all principles of democratic government, and constitutes in the particular case of the depressed classes, a menace to our interests.

3. Of equal importance with the question of representation in the Councils is the necessity of granting our people the privilege of separate electorates. The principle of separate electorates was recognised by the late Lord Morley as a vital safeguard for the security and advancement of backward classes and communities, and experience has shown during the last two decades that it has served as a powerful lever to raise our Muslim brethren, who, in consequence, are making rapid headway and coming into line with more advanced sections. We plead that the identical principles, be applied to our community, and that the time has arrived to extend its beneficent utility to our case as well.

4. The urgency of granting us separate electorates to protect and advance our interests is manifest when we come to consider our lot in local bodies like the Municipalities and District Local Boards. For it is these bodies that come into daily and intimate touch with the life of the people, and if the profound social evils which, like so many millstones, grind us to earth are to be radically removed, our voice must be heard and our influence felt in the Municipalities and Local Boards. Then only shall we be spared the indignity of drinking water with the beasts at some running stream outside the village limits and of maintaining our bodily life by the leavings of the caste Hindus. Then, alone, shall we be men entitled to free air and sunshine with the doors of temple and school and office yielding to our loud and insistent knocks. That the picture we have drawn is no exaggeration but a vivid and real one may be proved without any difficulty. To-day, in the district of Gujarat, which boasts of its so-called spirituality as the home of soul-force, the depressed classes are hooted and hissed off the public roads, and, being denied even right of way, have to find it by nullah and stream like the wild denizens of the forest.

5. We submit that the franchise should be extended to all adults in our community without any property or educational qualifications, and should be on as wide a basis as possible. In the present backward state of our people, the necessity of providing property or educational qualifications to enjoy the vote would result in automatically depriving us of the privilege, and keeping us for ever lagging miles behind our fellow countrymen. This right we crave as the only means by which we could secure a hearing in the Local Boards and Councils, and a beginning would thus be made in the direction of redressing our just and age-long wrongs and the first steps towards the amelioration of our unhappy plight would then be taken. The benefit of separate electorates would be entirely lost if the franchise were whittled down to a property qualification. Centuries of oppression and the rigid rules of the tyrannous caste system have made it impossible for our brethren to acquire property and gather knowledge in the schools.

6. In the struggle for existence, which is getting keener every year, our community, already beset with evils, finds its lack of education its greatest handicap. Our percentage of literacy is in the region of 2 per cent. only, after more than a century of British rule in this Presidency. Education under the ægis of the British may be said to have commenced with the year 1815, with the foundation of the Bombay Education Society in 1815. It was the unfortunate policy of Government to restrict the benefits of education to the higher castes, chiefly the Brahmins, and that during this period the depressed classes were not allowed by Government to share in the blessings of education. Though by the year 1854 mass education was the declared policy of Government, it is significant that, even in 1881, there was no student from our community either in the High Schools or in the Colleges of the Presidency. Even from 1882 there has been no improvement worth speaking of, though other backward communities have come into line meanwhile with more advanced communities. A study of the following table will reveal the fact that the state of education of the backward classes is deplorable, and though in the matter of population they rank second, in the matter of education they rank last and lowest, and that the Muslims have, during the 30 years prior to 1924, made such enormous strides as to come within easy reach of the Brahmin and allied classes:—

7. We have set out at some length how the root causes of our present backward state are the wicked and intolerable caste system and our lack of education in regard to which the policy of the British Government is mainly responsible. It now rests with Government to recast and overhaul its whole policy in regard to the education of our community and to take practical and effective steps to placing the cause of education in our midst on a progressive and substantial basis.

8. The first desideratum, we venture to submit, is the provision of annual and recurring grants for the education of the depressed classes. Such grants do exist at present but they are in the nature of meagre doles. An increase of 50 per cent. in the grant is essential. This would result in providing scholarships for promising children to prosecute their studies in the high schools and colleges and in districts where our classes preponderate in furnishing schools for them. We plead that the same efforts should be made in our case as were conspicuous in the case of our Muslim brethren, where special Muslim Inspectors with Deputy and Assistant Inspectors were drafted into the Education Department to pay special attention to the educational needs of their community and advise the Department accordingly.

9. As we are on this subject we should like to refer to the sincere and exemplary efforts made by some of the native States, notably by the Baroda and Kolhapur Durbars and their endeavours to uplift our people compare favourably with the absence of effort made by our British rulers. The State of Baroda, besides embarking upon a bold policy of free and compulsory education, has established four hostels for our people, where students are maintained free of cost of education and maintenance. In British territory there is only one hostel for our people, and this on a restricted and narrow scale of maintenance. The personal interest taken in our people by H.H. SIR SAYAJIRAO GAIKWAR of Baroda was brought prominently to the public eye when a pupil from the depressed classes was sent to England for higher studies at a cost of about Rs. 20,000 to the State. In the Kolhapur State the doors to schools, colleges and public service have been thrown open as widely as possible to our ranks.

10. In the machinery of the Central Government we plead that adequate safeguards be provided for the protection of our interests. It will be an anomaly if, were concessions being granted to us to fulfil our aims and aspiration on the constitutions of the local boards and councils, the scheme of the Central Government should not postulate similar and adequate provision for our political and economic safety. Matters of such vital importance to our community as recruitment to the army, and other matters of grave concern, are subjects in regard to which our representatives would be failing in their duty if they kept silence; but it is equally a matter of urgent necessity that the number of our representatives should be large enough to give sufficient expression to the needs of our classes all over India.

Two representatives from each Presidency, to represent our people, would, we submit, introduce no disturbing element in the composition of the Central Government; a lesser element of representation would only render the voice of our representatives as futile cries in the wilderness.

11. While we are anxious to obtain concessions from Government in order to ameliorate our social, economic and political status, we have no desire to shirk our responsibilities in the matter of sharing in the defence of our country. From the days when our Presidency passed from under the umbrella of the Peshwa to the shelter of the Union Jack, the depressed classes have always found scope for their martial spirit in the ranks of the British Indian regiments, both in the fighting line and in subsidiary occupations connected with regimental needs and requirements. In the Great War, the testimony is unanimous in regard to our proved worth and merit and the generous appreciation of HIS EXCELLENCY LT.-COL. THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR LESLIE ORME WILSON, P.C., G.C.I.E., C.M.G., D.S.O., GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY, was no piece of idle compliment when he addressed our deputation led by our Mr. R. S. Nekaljay in March, 1925, as follows:

"I much appreciate your expressions of loyalty to Government and to the British Crown. From all I have heard about the Mahars I have gathered that they are indeed a loyal and law-abiding community, with a very high standard of honesty, which is perhaps the more surprising in view of the unfavourable conditions in which they have lived for so many centuries. Every year a large proportion of the Government revenue is carried to the Taluka headquarters by the village mahars, and never a single pie is lost, and I have heard from officers who have toured in the districts for years many stories of the honesty and faithfulness of the men of your community. I congratulate you on the efforts you are making to improve your status in the country, and I can assure you that every endeavour you may take in this direction on sound constitutional lines will receive all the support that I am able to give."

Addressing the Bombay Council on 5th November, 1925, on the resolution of our Mr. R. S. Nekaljay, Mr. L. J. Mountford, Commissioner, Central Division, testified to the courage and heroism of our people in the following striking words:—

> "For the benefit of this House I would like for one moment to allude to the past history of the Mahars to show that the call upon such material will meet with good response. In the days of the John Company a very large proportion of its regiments consisted of Mahars. Those of you who have gone to Koregaon, and taken the trouble of seeing the monument there, will remember there are names upon that monument, which signalises one of the greatest and the most glorious feats of arms in the East, and that every name there is that of a Mahar. There was the time when Captain Staunton marched down just after the battle of Kirkee to join Colonel Burr before Poona and stopped at Koregaon. Captain Staunton, with 800 troops, a large majority of whom were Mahars, including some Arabs, who manned the guns, met the troops led by the Peshwa in person; Captain Staunton lost his guns three times, but recaptured them. The Peshwa's troops numbered 25,000, while Captain Staunton's force consisted only of 800 men who, be it said to their credit, kept the Peshwa's troops at bay for a day and a night and eventually routed them. That is the record of the Mahar as a fighting man, which has won the respect of this Government and also of the Government of India and that he will most certainly be called upon, if necessary, to swell the fighting forces of the Empire."

12. In the present backward economic state of our community it is hopeless to contend with other indigenous communities in other fields of service. Accordingly the army for some time to come must provide our people with sufficient occupations to earn their livelihood. Further, as a community, we constitute no menace, from any point of view to Government, which will incur no risk in opening the doors to military employment still wider to our people. We therefore beg to appeal to the Commissioners to recommend that the standard of recruitment from our people to the ranks of the army should be in the region of one-third of the strength of every regiment.

That the singular backwardness of our community in the field of education is responsible for our low economic status can be easily verified by a reference to vital statistics. At a meeting of the Bombay Legislative Council in the year 1925, the following interesting information was made available in answer to a question by Mr. Zunzarrao.

13. From the account of our unhappy plight which we have given in the above paragraphs it would not indeed be surprising if we stated that we are opposed to Indianisation in so far as it is understood by that term greater association of Indians in the services irrespective of better opportunities for the depressed classes. Extension of political power to the caste Hindus proceeding simultaneously with their wider recruitment to the services would result in this, that even the small boons we have enjoyed would be automatically whittled down, for, in the nature of things, no caste Hindu, once he occupies a position of influence, would allow a member of the depressed classes to rise in the social or economic scale, but, on the contrary, would aim to stabilise his condition as a hewer of wood and drawer of water. We have more to hope from the British officer, who, free from communal or caste bias, unfettered by any wicked tradition, is quick to respond to the promptings of his conscience and the dictates of humanity. We realise that, with the passage of time, we cannot hope for ever to rely upon the protecting arm of the British officer, but we do hope that, in the transition period through which the country is passing, every endeavour will be made to encourage us to join the services by promoting recruitment on certain preferential lines. As the benefits of education are grudgingly allowed to us, it is not fair to expect that our young men are able to join the services which require an early age limit. An extension of the age limit to people of our community would be a great encouragement to our young men and constitute an act of fairness which it would be wrong for other communities to complain about. Where candidates of equal qualifications are in the running for an appointment it would be, again, an act of barest justice to grant the boon to a member of the depressed classes.

14. We now conclude this Memorandum upon a note of optimism. We regard the Commissioners as a body of men who have come to this country at great personal sacrifice, with the single and selfless motive of doing their best for the subjects of this part of His Majesty's Empire. We have no doubt but that the ideals that animate them and the motives that inspire them are those that filled the lives of that band of inspired statesmen, Canning, Ripon, Dalhousie, Elphinstone, Morley, Minto, Hardinge and others too numerous to mention who have left behind them a mantle of inspiration for the guidance of succeeding generations of statesmen. We recollect how, on the morrow of a great upheaval, Queen Victoria of beloved memory told the Indian people that the welfare of her Indian fellow subjects was the greatest object of her wish, and that no subject of Her Majesty shall, by reason of his colour, caste or creed, be debarred from filling the highest offices of state to which he is entitled by his ability, honesty and integrity to aspire. We trust, therefore, that the Commissioners will be pleased to enquire into our legitimate grievances and recommend solutions to the Imperial Government on the lines we have suggested in this Memorandum.

We beg to add that representatives of the two Societies or Associations of which this is a joint Memorandum will be ready to give oral evidence before the Commission whenever required.

We have the honour, &c.,

Your obedient Servants,

R. S. NEKALJAY, J.P.,
President,
The Depressed India Association,
Bombay Branch,
Justice of the Peace, Member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation and late Member of Bombay Legislative Council.

POONA.

Dated 23rd October, 1928.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT RAJA NAWAB ALI KHAN) AND OF THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Dr. B. R. AMBEDKAR (a member of the Bombay Committee) and Dr. P. G. SOLANKI (representing the Depressed Classes), called and examined.

1. Chairman: Just to remind my colleagues, the documents we should have before us are Dr. Ambedkar's statement on behalf of the Depressed Classes' Institute of Bombay and the Joint Memorandum of the Depressed Indian Association, Bombay, and the Servants of Somavamshi Society. Dr. Ambedkar has changed his seat, because he is acting for the moment as one of our witnesses. Dr. Ambedkar, of course, we know as a member of the Bombay Committee. I think, Dr. Solanki, you or your Association is responsible for the other document?—(Dr. Solanki): I concur in the document submitted by Dr. Ambedkar.

2. I should like you to begin, Dr. Ambedkar, by helping us as to the sort of number of depressed classes in this Presidency. Can you help us about that?—(Dr. Ambedkar): I find that the depressed class population, as computed in the Memorandum submitted by the Government of Bombay is estimated at 1,478,390, as may be seen from page 3 of their Memorandum.*

3. Let us see. They say, "The depressed classes, which include mostly the Dheds, Mangs, Mahars and Holiyas, number, according to the Census of 1921, 1,478,390 approximately." What do you say about that figure?—As you will see, the figure I have given on page 39 of my Memorandum is about 28 lakhs.

4. You think the number should be about 2,800,000?—Yes.

5. How does the discrepancy arise?—The first thing I should like to say is this, that the figures given by the Government of Bombay are taken, I believe, from the Census of India, 1921, Vol. 8, Bombay Presidency, Part II, the tables starting on page 176, while the figures which I give in my memorandum are from Chapter 1f of Vol. 1 of the Census of India, 1921. These are the figures estimated by the Director of Census, who has collected the figures of the different provinces, and his computations, which I have taken bodily, are given on page 39 of my memorandum, under the heading "Population of the Depressed Classes in India," and show the figures for the different provinces, giving the population of the depressed classes in each. Now, as we see, there is this discrepancy between the two sets of figures. These figures, of course, can never be exact, neither the provincial nor the central figures. In fact, if the Conference will refer to the remarks of the Director of the Census of India, which I commence quoting on page 39 of my memorandum, it will be seen that, after giving the total estimated population of the depressed classes he goes on to say (page 39 of memorandum, in italics), "This, however, must be taken as a low and conservative estimate since it does not include (1) the full strength of the castes and tribes concerned, and (2) the tribal aborigines most recently absorbed in Hinduism, many of whom are considered impure. We may confidently place the numbers of the depressed classes, all of whom are considered impure, at something between 55 and 60 millions in India proper." Then he gives the figures for each province.

6. Would you mind if I just try to clear my own mind, not by reference to precise figures, but by contrasting two conceptions. It is manifest that if some authorities, speaking with the precision of Census returns, give a total like 1,478,000, and other authorities, also speaking with precision, give a figure like 2,800,000, the second authorities must be including people not included by the first?—That is so, and I should, therefore, like to point out to the Conference that the provincial figures do not include certain castes which are, as a matter of fact, untouchable castes.

7. May we put it like this? See if I have it correct, and if I have not please tell me. I have been studying it as well as I can, although I have been looking forward to your help and that of Dr. Solanki. In one sense of the term, by "depressed classes" you might mean untouchables in the sense of persons who are Hindus, but who are denied access to the Hindu temples, might you not?—Yes.

8. In another sense you might include in the "depressed classes" not only those people whom I have described, but also the criminal tribes, the hill tribes and other people who no doubt are very low in the scale, but who are not, perhaps, in the narrower sense untouchables from the point of view of the Hindu hierarchy?—Quite.

9. Is not that a possible view?—That is a possible view.

10. Is not that the real explanation of why in some connections you get a certain figure for the depressed classes, meaning untouchables, persons who are refused admission to the Hindu temples, whereas on the other hand you sometimes get a bigger figure which would include these criminal and hill tribes?—I do not think that is so in this case, because the figures I have given seem to have reference to the depressed classes as distinct from the hill tribes and the criminal tribes.

11. Let me point this out to you. I have before me these three figures. I have got a figure of 1,478,000 odd for untouchables, taken from the Census of 1921, and made up of these Mahars, Dheds and other people. Then I have a long list of criminal tribes and so on, which adds up to 589,000—just over half-a-million. Then I have a third list of aboriginals and hill tribes—Bhils, and people of that sort—and they add up to another million. If you were to add the aboriginal and criminal tribes in with the first figure, you would get a total approximately like the larger figure you give of 2,800,000?—The quotation I reproduce on page 39 of my memorandum from the remarks of the Directors of the Census gives me the impression that his figures are strictly for the depressed classes. My feeling is that the figures computed by the Director of the Census and referred to by him in the paragraph which I quote on page 39 of my memorandum are figures which apply only to the depressed classes.

12. * * * I see that the Director of the Census of India for 1921 says this: "It has been usual in recent years to speak of a certain section of the community as the 'Depressed Classes'—so far as I am aware the term has no final definition, nor is it certain exactly whom it covers." Then he refers to some educational criticisms. That is the passage you mean?—Yes, and "The total population classed according to these lists as depressed amounted to 31 million persons, or 19 per cent. of the Hindu and tribal population of British India." That remark would appear to exclude the tribal people from the depressed classes.

13. I do not know. Anyhow, that is one possible explanation, and I think you agree a possible explanation is that the smaller figure is the figure of untouchables in the sense I have tried to define. I think you agree that is a possible view. It is manifest that for many purposes those interested in trying to promote the advancement and elevation of those who are most depressed may very well include in their survey a wider number of persons, including the criminal and hill tribes. That is a possibility?—It is a possibility.

14. I should like to suggest to you another possible view. I do not know if it qualifies it. On page 39 of your documents you point out, quite accurately, I think, that if you add the provincial figures together you get something like 55 to 60 millions in India proper?—Yes.

15. "India proper" there, I think, would include the Indian States?—Yes, I thought of that, but I would point out one thing. He seems to exclude the Indian States, because he gives a separate figure for Baroda.

16. Perhaps he mentions one or two of the larger ones?—Probably. I thought that would be one qualification of the figures.

17. We do not, of course, want to spend too long on the statistical point, because, after all, whether the right figure to take is 1½ million or 2 millions or 2½ millions it is obvious it is a very large number of people, and they are people who deserve our very special consideration?—One point I wish to mention is this, that the figures from which the provincial figures are computed are in the table which deals only with the principle Indian castes. It is not an exhaustive table, and I find by going over the different castes which are mentioned in this table that it does not give any figures whatsoever for ten castes, which are undoubtedly untouchable castes. They are not included in the principal Indian castes.

18. What I was going to suggest, if it was agreeable to you both, was this. You have called attention to the main considerations with regard to the figures and, without fixing absolutely the right figures, I think it would be well to get rid of this figures point as quickly as possible, and then we can get to the question of considering the position and treatment of these classes; otherwise we may occupy a long time on arithmetic. I have asked what I want to put about it, and I am quite prepared to take it that if you apply a narrower test you may get a figure of 1½ millions, but that with a wider test you will get a figure of between 2 and 3 millions. I accept that from you, as I follow it?—Yes, with this qualification, that the Bombay figures do not include ten of the castes.

Chairman: We want to get to the real point, which is their representation. Is there anyone who wants to occupy time on this statistical point? Are you content, Mr. Rajah, that we should take it the figures are something of that sort?

Rao Bahadur Rajah: Which figures?

Chairman: Do not you think we might proceed with the really important question, which is their representation, leaving it like this, that in the Bombay Presidency the Census of 1921 gives a figure of 1½ millions, but it would appear that those are the depressed classes in the narrower sense I have mentioned, the untouchables from the point of view of religion, but that, as Dr. Ambedkar has pointed out, the official figures really show, if you take a rather wider but perfectly legitimate view, that the true figure may be between 2 and 3 millions. Is not that fair?

Rao Bahadur Rajah: Yes, that is right.

Chairman: Does anybody want to add anything about that?

19. Colonel Lane Fox: On which figure are the two memoranda which we have received based? In each memorandum you ask for special representation for the depressed classes. You ask for adult suffrage in one memorandum, and you ask for special recruitment for the army and navy and so on. It is obvious it is a bigger thing if you ask for it for the aborigines and criminal tribes and so on. Are these privileges asked for the bigger figure or for the smaller?—I ask for them for the depressed classes.

20. For the aborigines and criminal classes also?—No. I do not think it would be possible to allow them the privilege of adult suffrage.

21. But you quote the bigger figure?—I am not accepting altogether the fact that the figure which I have given in my memorandum covers the aborigines and the hill tribes. I still hold to the view that on a fair computation the figure I have given is largely the figure for the depressed classes. I admit only the possibility of the other view.

Chairman: There is only one thing I might add. Sir Arthur Froom may be able to confirm it. I notice the Muddiman Committee,* in the table subjoined to para. 64 of their Report, give the figure at 2,800,000.

22. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Dr. Ambedkar, would you regard "depressed classes" and "untouchables" as synonymous terms?—Yes.

23. In asking for special representation for the depressed classes you confine yourselves to the untouchables?—Yes.

24. You say that some aborigines are not untouchables?—In some parts they may be. I do not propose to speak on their behalf.

25. They are not untouchables. The criminal tribes are not untouchable?—Some of them are.

26. Some, but as a tribe they are not?—The criminal tribes have so little social intercourse with the rest of the Hindus that there is no basis for any definite opinion on that point, but if they did have such intercourse I think they would be regarded as untouchables.

27. There are certain classes which stand midway between touchability and untouchability?—I would rather say they were lower down than the untouchables.

28. No, higher up in the social ladder there is a class which is semi-untouchable?—I cannot say. My point is this, that with respect to the criminal tribes we have no data for forming an opinion as to whether they are untouchable or not, because there is very little intercourse between the main body of Hindus and the criminal tribes.

29. Leave out of account the criminal tribes and aborigines; I am now dealing with the untouchables. Among the untouchables themselves there are degrees; there are certain among them who may be regarded as only semi-untouchable?—(Both witnesses) No.

30. I will give you an example. What is the position of the Chambhar?—(Dr. Ambedkar) He is entirely untouchable.

31. As much as the Mahar?—Yes.

32. You are certain of that?—Yes, if you apply this test of common water, or of entering a temple.

33. No, by untouchability I mean whose touch will pollute a high-caste Hindu?—Well, you can take entering a temple or taking water as a test.

Chairman: After all, we are engaged here primarily in a constitutional and political inquiry. Social customs and deeprooted religious traditions are not things which are likely to be removed between night and morning by any commission; that is obvious enough. It really comes to this, that in one sense the depressed classes, meaning the untouchables, will be those classes who are denied all access to Hindu temples, and who, it is suggested, are deprived very often of the use of wells, of schools, of dharamshalas and things of that sort. In addition to those, speaking politically and constitutionally, we shall all agree there are others, not very advanced in the scale of civilisation, such as Sir Hari Sing Gour has referred to—criminal tribes, hill tribes and so on—who are also inhabitants of India and as such demand our attention.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: The Hindus are divided into four castes. The Sudras cannot get into the temples * * *

Chairman: I think we all appreciate that. However, we are not engaged in making laws for the Hindu religion, but in considering the structure of the constitution of British India, which is a very different thing.

34. Taking that figure, what is it that you want to represent as the proper way in which the constitution of India, and more particularly the constitution of the Bombay Presidency, should deal with these people?—The first thing I would like to submit is that we claim that we must be treated as a distinct minority, separate from the Hindu community. Our minority character has been hitherto concealed by our inclusion in the Hindu community, but as a matter of fact there is really no link between the depressed classes and the Hindu community. The first point, therefore, I would stress before the Conference is that we must be regarded as a distinct and independent minority. Secondly, I should like to submit that the depressed classes minority needs far greater political protection than any other minority in British India, for the simple reason that it is educationally very backward, that it is economically poor, socially enslaved, and suffers from certain grave political disabilities, from which no other community suffers. Then I would submit that, as a matter of demand for our political protection, we claim representation on the same basis as the Mahomedan minority. We claim reserved seats if accompanied by adult franchise.

35. And if there is not adult franchise?—Then we would ask for separate electorates. Further, we would like to have certain safeguards either in the constitution, if it is possible, or else in the way of advice in the Instrument to the Governor regarding the education of the depressed classes and their entry into the public services.

36. May we just ask Dr. Solanki if he agrees in those points?—(Dr. Solanki) I agree with all the points.

37. Then we may take it that that is the view of both you gentlemen?—Yes.

38. Would it be convenient if I asked a question or two on these points as we go? You claim that the depressed class, although included within Hinduism in a sense, should none the less be regarded from the point of view of the constitution as a distinct and separate community from others who are within Hinduism?—(Dr. Ambedkar) Yes.

39. Is that on the ground that in your view the depressed classes cannot expect to have their interests satisfactorily represented by the higher ranks of Hinduism?—That is one ground, but as a matter of fact really we cannot be deemed to be part of the Hindu community.

40. You come, I believe, from an earlier set of inhabitants of this continent?—That is one view, I think.

41. It is supposed—we will not go into details—that you are pre-Aryan?—Well, I do not know. That is a view.

43. I only ask you the question because there are some very distinguished Hindu public men—I do not mention any names—who have undoubtedly exhibited a good deal of interest in the case of the depressed classes. There is no question about that?—Yes, there is a great deal of public talk.

44. I know; but, at any rate, that is your view: you say you must be regarded as a distinct and separate community from the constitutional point of view?—Yes.

45. As regards representation, I notice that whether there is adult franchise, or whether there is not adult franchise, you seem to be abandoning any idea of nomination, you want election?—Yes.

46. Is that the view of both of you?—(Dr. Solanki): Yes.

47. That means, of course, that you have to make a list of voters?—Yes.

48. And you have to make sure that the man who comes to vote is the man on the list, and nobody else?—Yes.

49. Could you give me an estimate at all, Dr. Ambedkar, of what percentage of the population whom you call the depressed classes can read?—(Dr. Ambedkar): In a separate memorandum which I have submitted to the Commission on education in the Bombay Presidency I give the figures.

50. I am afraid it is a very small proportion?—Quite.

51. After all, one of the complaints that are made is that they have not had as free access to schools as more fortunate people?—Quite so.

52. So it would mean, would it not, if it was done by election, that it would almost entirely have to be done by people voting who could not themselves understand the ballot paper?—Yes. That is true of the majority of voters even to-day.

53. True. Now, would you tell me how many reserved seats in the Bombay Presidency you would suggest as proper, assuming adult suffrage for the depressed classes?—In the scheme that I have prepared I say out of 140 we claim 22 seats.

54. What you suggest is that if the total number of members of the Bombay Council, all elected, was 140, then you think that the body for which you wish to speak should have 22 elective seats?—Yes.

55. And supposing, to take your other alternative, there is no adult franchise, then you are asking for separate electorates. Do you still want 22 seats?—Yes.

56. The only other thing I will ask you is this. I think Mr. Rajah probably will be glad to put a few questions himself to bring out the social condition. At present I think in the Bombay Legislative Council there are two members, are there not, who are nominated to represent the depressed classes?—That is so.

57. You yourself being one of them?—Yes.

58. And Dr. Solanki being the other?—Yes.

59. Was that based on the Southborough Committee's Report?—Yes, I believe so.

60. I believe you gave evidence before the Southborough Committee?—Yes.

61. I have been reading your evidence before that Committee, and I was looking to see how many members you said there were of the depressed classes. I think you point out in your memorandum, in a note at the bottom of page 39, that the figure of the depressed classes given by the Southborough Committee for the Bombay Presidency was 577,000?—Yes.

62. I think your view is that that was an error?—Yes, a very large error.

63. Can you tell me, as a matter of fact, how they arrived at it? Do you know at all?—They simply took, I think, a small table with regard to castes which cause pollution.

64. It was taking a still narrower definition of what constituted the depressed classes?—Yes.

65. Mr. Hartshorn: I notice in this note you say, after referring to the figure of the Southborough Committee of 577,000, "According to the authority relied upon by the Southborough Committee, the population of the depressed classes in the Bombay Presidency in 1911 was 2,145,000."—In the Census.

66. That is the authority they relied upon? That was what I wanted to know?—Yes. The authority gave two different figures on two different pages, if I remember correctly. On one page they gave the smaller figure, and they took that up, and as soon as the Report of the Southborough Committee was published we protested against this estimate to the Government of Bombay.

67. Chairman: I think it is quite clear what the 2,100,000 was. It was the result of adding together in the Census of 1921 the figure given for the untouchables, which, as I have said, was 1,478,000, and the figure given for the criminal tribes, which was something like 623,000. Adding those two together, you would get the 2,100,000?—Yes.

68. And it was leaving out the aboriginal and hill tribes. It must have been?—Yes.

69. Mr. Miller: I should like to ask about the position in some of the Indian States. In Baroda and one other State, I think, where some special facilities are shown, are those special facilities anything beyond education facilities?—No, nothing beyond that.

70. Could you obtain service with the State?—I should think it would be very difficult.

71. You are particularly anxious to get appointments in the public service?—Yes, decidedly.

72. Why is that so?—On that point I should like to say this, that our experience so far as the administration of the law is concerned is very bitter. I wish to say most emphatically that in many cases the law is administered to the disadvantage of the depressed-class man. I would like to give a concrete case of what actually happened in one of the districts, without, of course, mentioning names. The Bombay Government annually lets out its forest lands for cultivation to the villages on certain stated terms. Now, we discovered that in the allotment of those forest lands the depressed-class man, who was often a landless labourer or with very little land, and who was clamouring for some sort of economic stability, never came in for a share. The Mamlatdars, who were really in charge of distributing the lands, showed absolute favouritism to the caste Hindu as against the depressed-class man. Last year in one district we organised and sent a deputation to the Assistant Deputy Collector of that district, placing before him our grievances with respect to these forest lands. He issued a circular to the Mamlatdars saying that the applications from the depressed classes should be considered. Now, some of the Mamlatdars, to show they were acting up to the circular, did give some lands to the depressed classes. But we found that they rather fooled us, if I may say so. What they did was, on paper they allotted a very large amount of land to the depressed classes and a very small amount of land to the caste Hindus, but when we came to see actually what was allotted to us we found that the land allotted to the depressed classes was all rocky and unfit for cultivation and the depressed-class people would not take it for anything, and the land allotted to the caste Hindus, though small, was all rich and fertile. Now, I think that is a most flagrant abuse of the administrative power which is entrusted to the officials, and I personally attach far more importance to good administration of law than to mere efficient administration of law.

73. Chairman: I imagine that the application of what you have told us, which is interesting, to our present inquiry is really this—because, of course, it is no part of the function of this Commission to interfere in day-by-day administration?—No.

74. You are using it as an argument to support your view that the depressed classes should have a full representation?—In the services.

75. That is your point?—That is my point. I will give some more instances of what happens in judicial courts actually in this Presidency. I happened to defend a depressed-class man in one of the courts, and, to my great surprise, I found that the man had to stand outside the court behind a little window, outside the wall, and he would not come in simply because, he said, "It is all right so far as you are concerned, but after you have left there will be terrible social ostracism if I enter the court."

76. It was the client who did not want to come in?—Who dare not come in.

77. What sort of social ostracism had he in mind?—The social ostracism would be that if he went back to the village there would be the boycott of the shopkeepers; nobody would sell him grain. The villagers would stop his dues as a village servant. He would not be allowed to come into the village. The depressed-class people always live on the border of the village, not in the centre or in the midst.

78. Your point would be that he was timid about coming into court on this occasion because he thought that afterwards the other people of the village, not his own lot but the others, the caste people, would regard him as having pushed himself in where he should not go?—Certainly—having exceeded the bounds of his social status.

79. That is a single case, is it?—I have had that experience, but I think that the existence of a circular of the Bombay High Court to the effect that the depressed classes must be allowed entry in the courts indicates that that is often the case. There must be some reason for that circular.

80. Mr. Miller: The only other question I want to ask is this. If you got these 22 seats in the Council do you think you could bring forward 22 suitable men?—Yes, I think so.

81. Khan Sahib Abdul Latif: Would you please enlighten the members of the Conference as to the fate of the minorities in the Bombay Council, when the official bloc is withdrawn for certain reasons?—I quite see that the fate of the minorities would be precarious. It has been precarious.

82. Did the honourable Minister belonging to the advanced class show any consideration to the project, or the feelings of Mahomedans, non-Brahmins, or depressed classes?—No, not at all.

83. Do the minor communities stand any chance of getting through any legislation in the Bombay Legislative Council, or get any chance to move it?—Their chances would be almost nil.

98. Sardar Mujumdar: Is it not a fact that different kinds of caste among the depressed classes are known as the depressed classes; that is to say, there are different kinds of castes even among the depressed classes?—Yes, of course.

99. Can you give me approximately the number of those castes?—I think you will find them in the Census, the different castes enumerated as untouchables.

100. Can you give me any idea of the number of different castes?—About a dozen or so. The Census gives it.

101. How many castes are included in the depressed classes in Bombay?—Almost all the castes.

102. Then the members of the different castes are members of your organisation?—Quite; it is a general body inclusive of all the depressed classes.

103. So that among the depressed classes are included all those?—Yes.

104. Have you taken into consideration the claims of the Bhils and Wadias and other persons?—No.

105. What do you say about the protection of those minorities?—I think that they also should be allowed some protection by representation.

106. Do you not think that even among the backward classes there are certain communities, who are in a minority?—Yes.

106A. Then has the present constitution any provision to protect their interests?

Chairman: Are these castes to which you refer refused admission to the Hindu temples?

Sardar Mujumdar: No, they are allowed to go into them.

Chairman: This morning we are really considering the case of untouchables, and persons who are quite outside the Hindu temple scheme. I do not think we can go into the question of the backward classes, who would be admitted to the Hindu temples.

Sardar Mujumdar: What I submit is that there are various minorities even amongst the backward classes. We are not concerned with the question of suitability; we are here to safeguard the interests of all the minorities.

Chairman: Certainly.

Sardar Mujumdar: It was from that point of view that I asked the question.

Chairman: Let me relieve you at once. India is full of minorities, and you have mentioned some of them; but this morning we are considering the body of people called the depressed classes.

Sardar Mujumdar: Very well, sir.

107. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: You have just said that you want representation in proportion to what the Mahomedans get?—Yes.

108. Do you want them because Mahomedans get them? Do you see any justice in that?—I see justice in that. I do not quite accept the principle of representation of minorities according to population, because it seems to me that that implies a conception of the legislature as though it was a museum in which we have only to keep so many specimens of so many communities. A Legislative Council is more than a museum, it is a place where, for instance, social battles have to be fought, privileges have to be destroyed, and rights have to be won. Now, if that is the conception of a Legislative Council, I do not think it at all in the fitness of things to confine the minority to proportional representation according to population, that means you are condemning a minority to be perpetually a minority without the power necessary to influence the actions in the majority.

109. Would you be satisfied if the franchise was reduced to local boards in the rural areas?—Well, I would really insist upon adult suffrage. The lower the franchise the better, on that principle I would accept any lowering, but I certainly would not say I would be content with that.

110. Would you then extend adult suffrage to the aboriginal tribes and to the criminal and hill tribes?—Yes, I think so.

111. You would?—Yes.

112. Or would you like to exclude them and give them nomination and yourselves adult suffrage?—I will say one thing. With regard to the criminal tribes, it might not be a good thing to give them adult suffrage, because by occupation they are a people who have more the interest of their own particular community in their mind, and they are not very particular as regards the means whereby they earn their living; but I do not think there is any harm in giving aborigines the right to vote.

113. They should be given the right to vote, or should their interests be protected by nomination?—They should be protected somehow; I do not much mind how. My feeling is that every man is intelligent enough to understand exactly what he wants. Literacy has not much bearing on this point; a man may be illiterate, nonetheless he may be very intelligent.

114. Do not you think that this separate representation will lead to communal tension? It is stated that communal tension is due to separate representation and separate electorates. Is that your belief?—Even assuming it does lead to tension, I do not see how you can get rid of it. Whether it does lead to tension is questionable, but I do not see in any case how you can get rid of it, having regard to the fact that society is divided into classes and communities.

115. Do not you think it is the root cause of dissension?—I do not think so, but I do say this; as a result of communal representation, the leaders of the communities are less prone to compromise than they would otherwise be. That is my feeling, but I do not think it leads to communal riots, which are due, I think, to something very different.

116. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: Would you not suggest that by taking away the official block, non-officials may be nominated in order?—I do not want nomination.

117. Major Attlee: Are there members of the depressed classes working in industry, in the cotton mills and so on?—All of them. The depressed class men are all labourers.

118. You have not got my point; I am talking of industry. You have members of the depressed classes who work in villages, for the most part in certain occupations. But are there large numbers of the depressed classes engaged in industry?—A very large number.

119. You would have a very large number in a place like Bombay City?—Yes.

120. Do they cease in any degree to be untouchable?—No. I should like to point out this. The depressed-class man is entirely kept out of the weaving department, the most paying department. He can only enter departments like the throstle department and others.

121. Why?—On account of untouchability.

122. When he is working there he is working alongside people of all castes?—Not quite. The departments are discriminated according to castes. One department is entirely manned by the depressed classes; another—say the weaving department—by Mahomedans and caste Hindus.

123. Do they take part in the trade unions?—Yes, they are beginning to do so.

124. With members of the classes above the depressed classes?—Yes.

125. I wanted to get this point from you. You put forward a claim for representation of the depressed classes on the basis of numbers. Now, we have claims put forward on a different basis altogether; on, say, the labour basis. You get a cross-division in that way, because a man can be a depressed-class man and he can also be a labourer?—He is usually, if not always, a labourer.

126. That is rather a play on words, is not it? I am speaking of capital and labour, of labour in big industries, not of the ordinary unorganised labour. I am speaking of organised labour. How are you going to get over the difficulty? If you are going to have representation by social status in one case and by industry in another, you are going to get a cross-division. How will you get over that?—There will be some provision for organised labour, and the majority of the depressed classes are labourers.

127. Mr. Hartshorn: I think, Dr. Ambedkar, you have made it pretty clear that you are in favour of adult suffrage. You say on page 41 of your memorandum, however, "The Sabha would, however, be content if the franchise for the Legislative Council is fixed at the same level as that for the Taluka Local Board in the rural parts and Rs. 3 rental per month in the urban parts of the Presidency." Have you formed any opinion, or are any statistics available to enable us to know to what extent the franchise would be extended on that qualification?—I may tell you that I am myself shaky about that statement. I do not mind admitting that. Such information as I have been able to gather from the depressed classes in the mofussils, however, leads me to believe that the existing taluka local franchise does produce a certain number of voters from the depressed classes.

128. I was not quite thinking of that. Could you tell us the increase in the number of persons who would become voters in the Bombay Presidency if this qualification rather than the present one were adopted?—I do not think I can give you any very definite information on this point.

129. May I revert to a question put to you by Major Attlee. I gather the depressed classes work in the factories in isolation?—In isolation, yes.

130. They have their own shed and their own department?—Their own department; there are no sheds.

131. Whatever it is, they are separated from the other workers in the factory?—I would rather put it in this way, that certain departments are exclusively assigned to the depressed classes and certain departments are departments into which they are not allowed to enter.

132. Certain kinds of occupations are forbidden them?—In the mills, yes.

133. I think you said they are not allowed to go into the weaving department?—Yes.

134. If they became members of the same trade union, would the workers in the weaving department decline to allow them in?—They would decline to allow them in. If I may mention one thing, in the recent Bombay strike this matter was brought up prominently by me. I said to the members of the union that if they did not recognise the right of the depressed classes to work in all the departments, I would rather dissuade the depressed classes from taking part in the strike. They afterwards consented, most reluctantly, to include this as one of their demands, and when they presented this to the mill owners the mill owners very rightly snubbed them and said that if this was an injustice, they certainly were not responsible for it.

135. It is not altogether merely a case of the employers wanting to get cheap labour and confining certain departments to the depressed classes for economic reasons?—No, it is untouchability.

136. Would there be anything of this in the situation? The better-paid Indian, say, declines to allow the untouchable to come into his department for fear the effect of their lower wages would be to depress wages in his department?—No. There is no distinction on the basis of wages.

137. That does not come into it at all?—No, not at all.

138. It is merely a question of untouchability?—Quite so.

139. Mr. Cadogan: They can be members of the trade union?—Yes.

140. Mr. Premchand: Can you give me a strict definition of the classes who will be on a special register of the electorate as the depressed classes?—Castes which cause pollution.

141. Is the principle that the lower the standing of a community, the greater the electoral advantage it should command over others, justifiable?—Yes.

142. If all minorities are granted additional seats, what then will constitute the majority?—If minorities put together make up a majority there is no majority and the question does not arise. There may be class distinctions among the minorities. I can quite conceive the Mahomedans in the Bombay Presidency being divided into two groups, one favouring the capitalists and one the labourers.

143. Is not it true that people who are not politically minded or trained are frequently led astray by professional leaders?—I do not know. I have never been a professional leader, so I cannot say.

144. Would not the extension of the franchise to the large majority of the uneducated section of society be fraught with danger and render it liable to abuse?—No, I do not think so.

145. Can you tell me why it is not possible to admit members of the depressed classes to our present schools and colleges without the necessity for a charge on the revenue of the Province?—Because they are hopelessly neglected under the present system.

146. Why is not it possible to admit members of the depressed classes to our present schools and colleges without the necessity for a charge on the revenues of the Province?—You should ask those who refuse what their reason for refusal is.

147. Refusal of what?—To admit them.

148. To the colleges and schools?—Yes.

149. Do you know the Bombay Municipality has passed a rule now —— ?—And you know also of the protest meeting which was held in Bombay.

150. There may have been a protest by one section, but the Municipality has removed all those restrictions?—It remains to be seen how far they will stick to it at the next election.

151. But they have done it, you know?—Yes.

152. Chairman: Might we know what is the protest meeting to which he refers?—The position is this. Hitherto the Bombay Municipality has had separate schools for the depressed classes in the City of Bombay. Now, under the scheme of compulsory primary education, the Bombay Municipality is compelled to limit the number of schools and bring together the scattered children of the depressed classes into the schools of the caste Hindus as a measure of economy. Naturally, some provision has to be made for water and other amenities for the children who attend. The question arose whether there should be a distinction in the drinking arrangements, whether the untouchables should have separate pots for drinking from the caste Hindus. The Municipality passed a resolution saying "We cannot recognise untouchability in our own schools," and they issued a circular that there should be no distinction as to drinking pots in their schools. This protest meeting was a meeting held under the presidency of an important Hindu leader of Bombay to protest against that kind of uniform arrangement being made, as being against the Hindu religion.

153. Mr. Premchand: Do you know the depressed classes are employed in the weaving departments of the Ahmedabad mills?—I did not know that.

154. I can tell you they are.—There again I should like to say one thing, probably they are employed exclusively. I can quite conceive of a situation where, for instance, so many looms are exclusively handed over to the depressed classes. To-day there is a proposal also in certain mills that the depressed classes should take charge of the whole of the weaving department, that the millowners should hand it over to them, but you cannot have part depressed classes and part caste Hindus.

155. Chairman: The difficulty is the mixture?—Yes.

156. Sir Hari Singh Gour: What is the view of your Institute in regard to the general scheme of constitutional reform? Have you formulated any views at all on the subject?—I may tell you this. The depressed classes as such, of course, are not very much interested in constitutional questions; they are more interested in obtaining the guarantees and protection they require, under whatever form of Government that may come to be. Therefore, I do not think that the depressed classes as such have any definite views as to the form of Provincial Government or the form of the Central Government; but, of course, I have my own individual views as a member of the depressed classes, without these being the views of the depressed classes themselves. It is on that account that nothing is said about the constitution in my Memorandum.

157. I am aware of that, and that is why I asked you that question. What are your personal views?—So far as the Provincial Government is concerned, I am in favour of provincial autonomy.

158. Qualified or unqualified?—I think there might be some safeguards with regard to the transfer of law and order. It is not that I object to the transfer of law and order; I am in favour of the transfer; but still I should like some safeguard. I am not certain to-day what it should be, but there might be with advantage some safeguard in that respect. Barring that, I am in favour (speaking personally) of full provincial autonomy.

159. What about the Central Government?—I think we might start with dyarchy there.

160. As regards adult suffrage, I suppose you are in favour of adult male and female suffrage?—Yes.

161. Do you think that is a practical proposition?—Very practical.

162. Do you think the masses have attained any degree of political consciousness, so as to be able to use that political suffrage with any advantage to their own community?—Speaking only on behalf of the depressed classes, I emphatically maintain that the depressed classes will exercise their vote in a most intelligent manner, speaking for the Bombay Presidency. Having regard to the fact that the canker of untouchability is before their minds every minute of their lives, and having regard to their being alive to the fact that political power is the only solvent of this difficulty, I emphatically maintain that the depressed class voter would be an intelligent voter.

163. Do not you think that, following the example of other countries, those who pay no taxes, having a political existence and possessing political power, will tax those who are already oppressed with heavy taxes?—I think that should be so. I do not see anything wrong in it.

164. You see no wrong in the exploitation of the taxpaying community? Is this your own opinion or the opinion of the Institute which you represent?—My own opinion. The Institute has said nothing about it here.

165. Do you think you reflect the general opinion of your Institute in conveying this view to the Commission?—I think that would be the view of all poor communities.

167. Sir Hari Singh Gour: In answer to the Chairman, you said the depressed classes must be regarded as a distinct community, a community distinct from the Hindu community. Do you apply that only for electoral purposes, or for all purposes?—They are distinct for all purposes, as a matter of fact.

168. Would you class the depressed classes as real Hindus?—I do not care about the nomenclature. It does not matter whether I call myself a Hindu or a non-Hindu, as long as I am outside the pale of the Hindu community.

170. It makes all the difference in the world. * * * If you were outside the pale of Hinduism you would not be subject to Hindu law. You could not, for instance, contract a marriage under the Act 30, of 1923, which has completely abolished all caste so far as the marriage law is concerned between a Hindu and a Mahar, touchable and untouchable. Now, if you go out of that community, out of that social system, and call yourself a non-Hindu, you will be outside the pale of Hindu law to that extent?—It might be.

171. Then by what law would you be governed?—We are governed by the Hindu law, just as, for instance, the Khojas, who are Mahomedans, prefer to be governed by Hindu law so far as the devolution of property is concerned.

172. And you are under the Act 30 of 1923; you are under Hindu law?—I do not know what the depressed classes would think about marriage.

173. Would you kindly turn to your memorandum? You say at page 39, and you also repeated it to-day in answer to my friend Mr. Kikabhai, "the standing of the community must mean its power to protect itself in the social struggle. That power would obviously depend upon the educational and economic status of the community."—Quite.

174. It follows from the recognition of the principle that the lower the standing of a community, the greater electoral advantage it must get over the rest. Do you adduce this last sentence as a logical deduction from the premises, from the previous two sentences?—Yes.

175. You regard that as a logical deduction?—Yes, quite.

176. * * * I wish to draw your attention to the fact that you say: "In addition to the demand for adequate representation, the Sabha feels that it must also demand the inclusion of clauses in the constitution of the country." Now, amongst these clauses you find things like this mentioned: "the right of every depressed class to the appointment of a special inspector of police from amongst themselves"?—Yes.

177. Do you expect that an Act of Parliament should contain a clause to this effect, that the depressed classes in India shall have an inspector of police in every district from amongst themselves?—I really do not see anything strange in that.

178. Supposing there was a provision to that effect relating to all communities (because if you have got certain constitutional guarantees it follows by necessary implication that other communities have an equal right), then you parcel out all the official posts and you parcel out all the other things amongst the various communities, and that is the constitution that you foresee for India?—I do not know that. I am only speaking for the depressed classes. May I just make one thing clear?

179. May I just complete my sentence. That is a contingency that does not arouse any apprehension in your mind?—Just let me explain before you go further. I think we must be very careful in using the word "minority." I do not think simply because a community happens to be a community composed of small numbers it is therefore necessarily a minority for political purposes. A minority which is oppressed, or whose rights are denied or the majority, would be a minority that would be fit for consideration for political purposes.

180. Wherever you have these minorities in other countries, there is provision made, there is sometimes a minister for the protection of minorities. Have you thought about that?—Yes.

181. Supposing we gave you the protection?—The protection might be given in any form, and if I may say so—I am sorry to interrupt you—I do find that the new constitutions that have been framed after the peace for the various European countries composing the bulk of the Slavonic nations very largely embody this principle. I have devoted some special attention to this subject, if you will permit me to say so.

182. Lord Burnham: And carried out?—And made part of the Constitution.

183. And carried out in practice too?—Carried out in practice; and the point is this, that if a minority feels that the guarantee has not been fulfilled, it has the right of appeal to the League of Nations.

* * * * * * * * * * *

186. I am not quarrelling with the principle.—And I may say I am not very particular about the form.

187. If the details of the scheme which you have adumbrated were to be introduced into the constitution of this country, would it not lead to a perpetual class war?—It might, but that would depend upon the attitude of the majority.

188. Therefore you would not, as a sagacious statesman——If you will permit me to say so, all these things, though I insist upon them, I admit to be provisions of a transitory character. I do contemplate, and I do desire, the time when India shall be one; and I believe that a time will come when, for instance, all these things will not be necessary; but all that would depend upon the attitude of the majority towards the minority.

197. Now, you mentioned a case that you conducted on behalf of a member of the depressed class, who, from fear of social ostracism, stood outside near the window. What district was it?—Khandesh district.

198. What court was it?—Magistrate's court.

199. Ordinary Magistrate's court?—The stipendiary Magistrate's court.

200. What caste was the Magistrate?—A Hindu.

201. He did not object to the accused coming into the court?—No, I say the accused himself would not come in.

202. The accused himself was terrorised by the past acts of the Hindus?—Yes.

203. The fear had been engendered in the minds of the depressed classes on account of the oppression of the caste Hindus that he would not get a square deal thereafter if he was to trench upon the limited rights which he had been given by the caste Hindus?—Yes.

* * * * * * * * * * *

204. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I think you will admit, Dr. Ambedkar, that during the last few years there has been a forward movement in the way of removing untouchability and removing all disqualifications from the path of the depressed classes?—Yes.

205. I admit that the reforms have not been commensurate with your desires and mind, but at the same time, we have to recognise that there is a growing feeling that there must be a consolidation of the Hindu people by removing all these barriers that stand between the castes and the non-caste Hindus. You recognise that?—Yes, there are speeches from the platform.

206. There are positive actions?—Speaking for my part of the country, the Bombay Presidency, I would rather hesitate to accept your proposition.

207. Therefore, I will give you examples. Every year, for instance, wherever there is a caste and no-caste society, Hindus hold annual dinners, and they all sit together for the purpose of making one class of people accustomed to the other class of people?—I am not aware of it in this Presidency.

208. I have attended several of them.—In this Presidency?

No, in Nagpur.

209. There is no such movement here?—No.

210. But you admit that there is recognition of the fact that oppression and untouchability must go, and that every effort to suggest anything in that way receives sympathetic consideration from the caste Hindus, and particularly from the Reformers?—I would hesitate, again, to answer that.

Chairman: Would you agree, in order to get this witness's view of the facts, that I should ask two or three question on your line?

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Yes, Sir, certainly.

211. Chairman: Mr. Rajah would be, in many ways the best person to do it, but I wish you would tell us your own view. Compare twenty years ago with now in the Bombay Presidency. How many years, if I may ask, have you been here?—Five or six years.

212. You have, of course, taken an interest in your own community since long before that?—Yes.

213. You can look back twenty years and give us some idea?—Yes.

214. Let me take two or three things. First of all I imagine that there is no change at all so far as regards the admission of the depressed classes to the interior of a Hindu temple. That, of course, is a matter of religious practice and teaching. I do not criticise it, but there is no change at all?—No, there is no change at all in that respect.

215. What I want to know is this. Let us take two or three definite things in this Presidency. In the country districts, you have told us that as a rule the depressed classes, the untouchables, live in a place for themselves. Of course, we have seen it many times. Sometimes they live in a corner of the village, if it happens to be a Hindu village, and sometimes in a hamlet of their own. Now is there any change in the last twenty years as regards their living among the general communities?—No change.

216. We saw some of the villages the other day. We understand some of them can draw water from the river, but I suppose there are other villages that rely on wells?—Even in the case of rivers they can take water only from a portion of the river. A point on the river is appointed for them.

217. That is to say, the depressed classes will draw water at a point lower down than the caste Hindus?—Yes.

218. Now let us take the case of villages that rely on wells. It is not uncommon?—No, not uncommon.

219. I am anxious to know and I hope you will tell me quite frankly, is there in that respect any improvement in the last twenty years?—No.

220. Your attention has been called to the fact that there have been resolutions passed on this subject?—Yes, only resolutions.

221. It is suggested that untouchability sometimes goes to such a length that the actual contact with the man (or sometimes his shadow itself) is regarded socially by those of the higher castes as a pollution?—Yes.

222. Is there an improvement in that respect?—There is an improvement in that respect.

223. I am glad to hear that. That is, whereas 20 years ago a caste Hindu who found himself in close contact with an untouchable would possibly think it his religious duty to purify himself, it is not viewed with so much strictness now; is that correct?—Yes.

224. Then, of course, as compared with twenty years ago I imagine that there are some members of the depressed classes who have in fact risen very much in the professional scale. Twenty years ago were there depressed classes who were practising at the Bar in Bombay?—No.

225. How many members of the depressed classes practise at the Bar now?—I am the only man.

226. I think we were told yesterday that in the list of voters for the Sardars and Inamdars there were two members of the depressed classes?—Only one. His position is different. His jagir was granted by the Peshwas for the services rendered on the battlefield. His title was not given by the British Government.

227. What one notices is that in India there is gradually being introduced the motor bus connecting the town with the village and I see them going along the road. Are those public vehicles open to the depressed classes?—Not in villages. There are a great many villages where the depressed classes are not allowed to travel in these buses.

228. Who prevents them?—The driver would not take them.

229. One would expect the driver to take anybody who pays. Why does he not take them?—Because if he takes them the other people will not come into his car. For instance, the barber here would not shave my head even though I offer him a rupee.

230. Rao Saheb Patil: According to law the driver would be prosecuted if he refuses to take any passenger?—That can be evaded by saying that all seats are booked.

231. Are matters improving in that respect?—Yes, they are improving; but still there are numerous cases where the depressed classes would not be allowed to enter into these buses.

232. Let us take the depressed classes who are employed in the mills in Bombay. Some of them go in trams, I suppose. Do you suggest that they are not allowed to use the trams?—There was a case two years ago where a Bhungi was not allowed to board a tram.

233. When you speak of the case two years ago it suggests to me that it is rather exceptional than a rule?—I have seen, for instance, when I was travelling by the B.B. & C.I. Railway hundreds of cases where the passengers obstructed the depressed classes coming into the compartments.

234. Sir Hari Singh Gour: With regard to the case of the Bhungi which you mentioned, are you sure if he was not properly attired and therefore he was not allowed to get into the tram?—I do not know about that.

235. Before a man gets into the tram he is not asked to which caste he belongs; they only ask him whether he has got the fare, is it not?—But people can easily recognise him.

236. That is on account of his dress?—But he will be dealt with very badly when once he is recognised to belong to the depressed classes.

237. Apart from the question of caste there is also the question of costume?—Yes, but some of the members of the depressed class are very well dressed.

238. In the Bombay Presidency you have no such thing as to consider it a pollution to walk in the shadow of a depressed-class member?—Yes, it exists in some parts of the Konkan and in Kathiawad.

239. It is on the wane?—Yes.

240. With regard to the Ambalal Saralal School in Ahmedabad, has not his sister started the school for depressed classes?—That is the only honourable exception.

241. Is not the school maintained for the depressed classes from public funds?—I do not know that, but I know that that lady is taking interest in the elevation of the depressed classes.

242. Chairman: I understand it is an exceptional case?—Yes, it is quite an exceptional case.

243. Dr. Suhrawardy: In view of the instances of social ostracism and tyranny which you have just stated, do you not think that in a general election members of your community will be frightened out of the polling booths?—Yes, it may happen.

244. Also there is the further apprehension that the high-caste Hindus may refuse to come and participate in the elections where the untouchables go to record their votes?—They might; it is very difficult to say what might happen. We have cases, for instance, where the caste-Hindu members of district boards have left the premises because the depressed-class members have claimed to sit at the table.

245. Do you not think that, in view of this state of affairs, it will be better for you to have a separate electorate because in practice it will mean a separate electorate even if you reserve your seats in a general electorate?—Yes.

246. Rao Bahadur Rajah: With reference to the question put by my friend, Sir Hari Singh Gour, regarding the costume of the depressed classes, did the barber refuse to shave your head because you were not well dressed?—No; it is because I belong to the depressed class.

247. Not on account of the dress you were wearing?—No.

248. With regard to another question put by another member of the Committee, may I ask you whether it is easy for a depressed-class member in a village to file a suit against the owner of a bus because he has refused to take him?—It is not possible.

249. I understand that you have been taking very much interest in the uplift of the depressed classes. What has been your experience during your propaganda as to the help you receive in this work from the higher classes? Do they help you to impress upon the depressed classes the need for greater sanitation, hygiene and such like things?—My experience, unfortunately, is rather very bitter in this matter. The depressed classes have been dubbed to be unfit for association because of certain unclean habits. That is the allegation of the upper classes. That is to say, they eat the meat of the dead animals and they are not clean, and so on. In this Presidency during the last two years I started a campaign to purify the depressed classes, so to say, and to persuade them to give up some of their dirty habits. But, to my great misfortune, I found the whole caste-Hindu population up against me when in a matter like this I expected the utmost co-operation from them. But when I began to analyse the basis of their opposition I found that they insisted upon the depressed-class people doing the unclean things because giving up doing these things meant that the depressed classes were exceeding their social status and rivalling the upper class. For instance, in the Colaba and Ratnagiri districts the whole of the Mahar population have given up the eating of the meat of dead animals, but the tyranny and social oppression that is going on against them is simply unspeakable; there is a complete economic and social boycott. The lands they had been cultivating for years past have been taken away from them by their caste-Hindu landlords. Every sort of pressure, social and economic, has been brought to bear upon the depressed classes in order to compel them to resume their dirty habits. The officials, who are all caste-Hindus, give no protection to the depressed classes, whose condition has really become pitiable, and all this because they sought to give up their dirty habits. Instead of getting co-operation I find that the members of the upper classes are up against me, and they say "these evil habits of the depressed classes are all insignia of their inferiority and they must remain."

250. The other day we heard a witness say that there is not a single depressed class member on the sanitary boards. If what you have said just now with regard to the higher castes is true, is there any good in the depressed class members being on these boards so far as their sanitary improvement is concerned?—I think the depressed class people ought to be represented on every local authority.

251. You told us just now that in the courts in this Presidency witnesses belonging to the depressed classes have no access. I want to be clear on that point. Do you mean to say that the members of the depressed class are not admitted into some of the courts?—Yes.

252. And I understand you to say that in a case the man did not dare go into the court, is that so?—The thing is the depressed class man is looked upon by the caste people as having a particular station in life, he exceeds that station in life when he enters the court, and if he exceeded that station in life they would begin to harass him. The man, if he exceeded the social limits, would subsequently suffer at the hands of the caste people. My protection in that particular case was only temporary protection and he knew it would cease as soon as the case was over.

253. If you had not been there and if he attempted to go into the court, what would have happened to him?—I think the same thing would have happened to me when I tried to enter a temple in Bombay.

254. Coming to medical relief, will you kindly enlighten us as to the kind of medical relief the depressed class men are getting?—They are not allowed entry into the dispensary, unless the case is a very very serious one; such as, for instance, the non-admission would bring the officer's conduct to the notice of the higher authorities. Ordinarily the medicine is dispensed out.

255. Chairman: I suppose you are talking of dispensaries in the mofussil?—Yes, Government dispensaries.

256. They are, of course, in the department of the Minister of Medical Administration?—Yes.

257. I imagine that the regulations of the Minister provide that these dispensaries are open to everybody who goes?—Yes.

258. But you say that in the mofussil in fact it does not work out like that?—No. (Dr. Solanki) The Hindu medical man who is orthodox always takes objection to examine a man belonging to the depressed classes. There have been instances in Gujarat where the men have actually died from the want of medical relief. I know of instances where doctors have actually refused even to touch the patient when he was suffering from pneumonia. The doctor would hand over the thermometer to a Mahomedan who does not know how to hold the thermometer and the Mahomedan would hand over the thermometer to the patient. This is a fact and it has happened.

259. What is important, I think, as I said before and I may repeat it, is to get a true picture. The thing may happen occasionally. I want to know whether what you are describing is quite an exceptional thing due to some particular doctor's objection or whether you think it is an every-day happening?—Doctors who are orthodox do it.

260. The difficulty about this thing is that the objection that is taken by the medical man is an objection based on his own religious views?—Yes.

261. Rao Bahadur Rajah: Have these facts been brought to the notice of the authorities concerned?—(Dr. Ambedkar): Yes.

262. What was the action they took?—The reply the Minister gave was that we had better depend on persuasion; that was the word he used.

Chairman: Would you do this for us, Rao Bahadur? One hears of different aspects of this and I want to know the facts. What is the position about the depressed class children in the ordinary public schools in this province? Would you ask the witness about that for me?

263. Rao Bahadur Rajah: Will you kindly enlighten us as to the attitude of the schoolmasters or the Education Department or the managers of schools towards the children of the depressed classes?—There is a circular issued by Dr. Paranjpye when he was Minister of Education in this Presidency to the effect that children of depressed classes should be admitted in all schools. But our experience is that that circular has not been carried out at all. It is true that in the report of the Director of Public Instruction it is stated that that circular has been carried into effect; but I beg to differ from that view. It is not a correct statement of facts as they exist to-day. There is an incident here at Poona which took place only a few days ago, at Deoo, where the children of the depressed classes were refused admission and when they insisted on it the village proclaimed social boycott against the depressed classes.

264. Chairman: The memorandum refers to that report?—Yes, that is not a correct statement of facts as I said. I beg to differ from that.

265. Rao Bahadur Rajah: I understood from Mr. Griffith that in his view there are reasons why the depressed classes could not be taken into the police department as the duties of the police involved house searches and arrests. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that is true, would there be similar objection to the recruitment of the depressed class members to other subordinate and provincial services?—There ought to be none; but, as a matter of fact, I find that there are so many objections raised.

266. You are a member of the Local Legislative Council?—Yes.

267. What is your experience as regards the attitude of the higher caste members of the local Council towards our community?—One cannot say it is favourable to the depressed classes.

268. What is the attitude of the Government towards the members of our community in your Provinces?—Very apathetic.

269. I suppose you have got honorary bench magistrates' courts in this Presidency. Are there any members of the depressed classes on these boards?—There are none and we are trying to get some on the bench of magistrates, but without effect. Perhaps it might be interesting to the Conference if I read in this connection a letter written by the Collector of the Khandesh district to a member of the depressed classes when he applied for an appointment on the bench. This letter also gives the reasons why he should not be appointed to the place, and it reads thus:—

> "The Collector has every sympathy with the aspirations of the depressed classes and is glad to recognise and appreciate Mr. Medhe's good work in the various fields of public activities; but in his opinion time has not yet come when a member of the depressed classes can be given a seat on the bench of magistrates, and, until the Government makes some pronouncement favourable to the aspiration of the depressed classes in this Presidency he must regretfully express his inability to recommend such an appointment."

This letter is dated 25th September, 1928.

270. I am sure you will agree with me that appointments to these bodies have nothing to do with the progress of the communities?—Nothing.

271. The sole consideration should be whether the individual candidate can discharge his duty with a sense of responsibility?— Yes.

272. Lord Burnham: I understood you to say that of all the methods to protect the interests of the depressed classes, you preferred the universal suffrage?—I would rather say adequate representation in the Legislative Council.

273. I understood you to say you were in favour of universal suffrage?—Yes.

274. If you have not got that you go in for separate electorates? Supposing you cannot get either, are you still in favour of the principle of nomination?—No. I would insist on our representative being elected.

275. If you cannot get the election on the terms proposed, you would prefer adult franchise?—Yes.

276. Chairman: You have spoken of your strong preference for the representation of the depressed classes being secured by the method of election. Are you satisfied, supposing the method was the method of election, that the result would be that you will get elected those who were really the best spokesmen for the depressed classes?—I believe so.

277. You do not feel anxious that influences which were really against the interests of the depressed classes will get to work?—I admit that and that is why I want adult suffrage.

278. You think that the influence will cease because of the adult suffrage?—That will be counterbalanced.

279. Supposing that a member of the depressed classes has the necessary qualification, does he vote in a general constituency?—He does.

280. Taking your case you will have a qualification to vote in some general constituency?—Yes; I vote for the University constituency as also my friend.

281. How does the position stand about the paying of taxes. A suggestion was made that depressed classes do not pay the taxes. Of course, it follows that, as regards the Customs duties and other indirect taxes which may raise the price of the articles, I suppose the depressed classes will have to pay the increased price like anybody else?—Yes. Also the depressed class men, particularly the Mahar community, is always in possession of some land of ordinary tenure or watan tenure at any rate, and they pay what is called the judi, that is the assessment, as anybody else.

282. I suppose that a good many Mahars follow the occupation of waiters in private service?—Yes, very few. But they mainly work in industries in the cities.

283. Take, for instance, a European private house or a club, they employ Mahars?—Yes.

284. Are those people qualified to vote in a general constituency or not?—That will depend on the pitch of franchise.

285. As a rule the waiters would not have any qualification?—Yes, under the existing circumstances.

286. Sardar Mujumdar: Are you aware that saints from the depressed classes are revered by all classes, and high-class persons bow down before them as much as before such saints from higher classes?—There is only one case so far as I know.

287. But do they do so?—Yes, as they do the Mahomedan Pir.

288. Are you aware that untouchability is not observed in the Warkari Panth, i.e., the devotees of the God Vithoba at Pandharpur?—That is entirely incorrect.

289. Do you agree that there is a vast change during the last 25 years in the treatment accorded to the depressed classes, that the educated higher classes are trying to remove this evil of untouchability and mix with them quite freely and that there is a gradual change in the condition of the depressed classes and in the treatment accorded to them by the general educated public?—Yes, it is so, though the sympathy is only in words and is seldom translated into action.

290. Are you aware that in almost all villages the depressed class people are provided with wells meant only for their own use?—No.

291. Are there not such wells?—Not in every village.

292. Who are the depressed classes? Will you please name the castes?—There is the census.

293. Do intermarriages take place between the Mang and the Mahar castes?—No, the caste Hindus have spread their poison to the rest.

294. Do they dine together?—Yes, now-a-days. The movement for consolidation is going on and there is now a case of intermarriage between a Mang and a Mahar.

295. Are there not two Inamdars in my constituency who belong to the depressed classes?—I do not know.

Memorandum submitted by the Bombay Provincial Non-Brahmin Party.

We, the Secretaries, on behalf of the Committee and the members of the Bombay Provincial non-Brahmin Party, have the honour to address you on the subject of Political Reforms within the Province of Bombay. Our proposals refer specially to the Marathi and Kanarese speaking districts.

In accordance with a resolution passed at an annual session of the Bombay Provincial non-Brahmin Party, held at Kalyan, in the District of Thana, on the 15th of July, 1928, for the purpose of preparing a Memorandum to Statutory Commission. A Committee was appointed, with power to co-opt, consisting of the following members:—

(1) The Hon. Mr. B. V. Jadhav, Minister of Agriculture to the Bombay Government.
(2) Rao Bahadur S. T. Kambali, Deputy-President of the Bombay Legislative Council.
(3) Rao Saheb, D. R. Patil, M.L.C. Member of the Provincial Committee appointed to assist Indian Statutory Commission.
(4) Mr. N. E. Nawale, B.A., LL.B., M.L.C.
(5) Mr. S. K. Bole, M.L.C., J.P.
(6) Mr. K. S. Gupte, B.A., LL.B.
(7) Mr. K. M. Jedhe, and
(8) Mr. D. S. Javalkar, Secretaries.

Jedhe Mansion, Poona City,
15th October, 1928.

Non-Brahmin Party.—For the proper appreciation of the growth of the party it is not necessary to trace the relations between the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins from ancient times. It is sufficient to state that, in spite of the advent of the British, the Brahmins in the Deccan retained their political supremacy, and their authority in social and religious matters remains unchallenged. With their wonderful organisation and selfishness they managed in a clever manner to influence the administration of the country. It was to their interest to maintain the caste system, which every sensible man would condemn as a serious hindrance to the social, economic and industrial progress of the country. With all that the British occupation had its advantages, and with the spread of education the Brahmin v. non-Brahmin movement, gradually gained ground. It found expressions in the organisation of the Satya Shodhak-Samaj, a society which has been playing a conspicuous part in the advancement of the non-Brahmin cause. This Samaj was founded by Mahatma Jotirao Phule, of Poona, in 1873, with the object of emancipating the non-Brahmin communities from the state of intellectual, religious and social bondage into which they had been forced by the Brahmin priests. The result of the propaganda on the part of the Satya Samajists was that non-Brahmins became conscious of their social position.

Before the inauguration of the Reforms the non-Brahmin leaders were fighting their way for the social amelioration and the uplift and the religious emancipation of the non-Brahmin communities. Since their introduction the non-Brahmins became alive to their rights in the political fields. They started organising themselves, moved among the masses, agitated amongst them and succeeded in getting some special representation for the principal backward communities. This was a triumph in some measure for the non-Brahmin movement that the principle for which it stood and fought was recognised.

The political platform of the non-Brahmin Party has always been moderate both in views and aspirations. We have been from the very beginning trying to work the Reforms to the best of our abilities. Our aims are directed principally towards social reforms, consisting mainly of the education of the backward communities, and thus of enabling them to take a rightful place in the general advancement of the nation. It may be noted, finally, that we have in all our endeavours borne in mind the ideals, namely, the attainment of Dominion Status by constitutional methods.

The Franchise.—The Committee emphatically aim at adult suffrage as the goal to be attained. In fixing electoral qualifications it has to be remembered that the electorate should be sufficiently large to be considered representative of the Province. If the present position is examined it would appear that the percentage of male voters to the total male population over twenty years of age is 13.40 per cent. The percentage of female voters to the total female population of twenty years of age and over is approximately 0.79. The percentage of voters to the total population over twenty years of age is 7. Can it be said that this condition is satisfactory? It may be urged that the masses are not sufficiently literate, but illiteracy in itself cannot be a ground against widening the franchise. The proper course would be to grant franchise to those who would use it to the best interests of the country. If we examine the previous elections with a view to see if the people have intelligently exercised their votes, we would find that the general electorate has been unmistakably developing a political sense. There has been a marked growth in the sense of responsibility, which is also clear from the fact that the class of members returned has steadily improved, and this fact is the more noticeable when the condition of the various parties is examined. On these grounds the Committee recommend an extension of the franchise for the Provincial Council. A widening of the franchise is specially necessary in the case of agriculturists, who, according to the Census of 1921, form 64 per cent. of the total population, who cultivate an area of 4,29,68,000 acres and pay Rs. 4,67,00,000 as land revenue. The system of franchise should be so devised that the voting ratio of the various communities should be made to correspond with their population.

We propose lowering of franchise in the rural areas so that those who pay assessment to the extent of Rs. 16, and those who cultivate the land as tenants of an equal amount of assessment in districts should have a vote, whereas the qualification to be entitled to vote at present is that either they should be landholders paying land revenue to the extent of Rs. 32 or tenants of land paying a like amount as assessment. In districts such as Ratnagiri and Panch Mahals, where the franchise extends to those who pay land revenue to the extent of Rs. 16 and so on, the franchise should be equally lowered.

The Committee do not propose any change in the case of either the major or the minor municipal boroughs, but in the case of the town of Bombay the Committee are of opinion that the franchise should be lowered so that all those who pay Rs. 5 as rent per month should be held entitled to vote.

The Electorates.—The Committee propose the following electorates, and are prepared to forego the present privilege of the reservation of seats through a mixed electorate to the Mahratta and allied communities in case their suggestions, as given below, are accepted:—

(1) The Brahmins.
(2) The non-Brahmin Hindus.
(3) The Depressed Classes.
(4) The Mahomedans.
(5) The non-Mahomedan and non-Hindu Communities.

(1) The Brahmins.—The preponderance of the Brahmins is nowhere so keenly felt as in the Deccan and Karnatak districts of the Bombay Presidency. Experience has shown that by using various tactics they have managed to capture seats far in excess to their proportion to the entire population. They cannot be said to be the representatives of the masses so long as they maintain their superiority by birth over other communities. The Committee is, therefore, of opinion that the Brahmins as a class should form a separate electorate, while they should be allotted seats in the Council on population basis. The reasons for coming to such a conclusion are given in detail under the next sub-head, namely, the non-Brahmin Hindu Group.

(2) The non-Brahmins.—This term is used here with reference to the Hindus only. The Brahmins have gained immense advantages over their non-Brahmin brethren by their alleged claims to superiority by reason of birth. The non-Brahmins were kept behind for ages by the Brahmins in all spheres of activities and are facing even to-day the political and economic dominance of the Brahmins. The transfer of power to the hands of Indians has made the non-Brahmins alive to the fear that they would be for ever relegated to the backward position. It has been the experience of successive elections that the number of seats occupied by the Brahmins is vastly disproportionate to their numerical strength in the country. The traditional antagonism and the existence of the social cleavage not to speak of the religious differences have made it impossible for the non-Brahmins to have any confidence in their so-called representatives in the Councils, namely, the Brahmins. A reference to the discussion on the recent Joshi Bill, introduced by Mr. S. K. Bole, a non-Brahmin Member, and the present activities of the Brahmins in the name of Hindu Mahasabha, the Brahmin Sabha, etc., are sufficient to convince anyone that adequate representation through a separate electorate for the non-Brahmins ought to be provided for. In placing this proposal, we have in view the present Brahmin v. non-Brahmin tension. We think that if the rights of the non-Brahmins are recognised by giving them a separate electorate they will feel sure in their position to be ready for united action in the development of Indian nationhood.

(3) The Depressed Classes.—It is absolutely essential for the general advancement of the country that the problems of the down-trodden classes who are politically, socially, and economically depressed should be prominently before the Government and the public. Scattered as they are over wide areas, they can be adequately represented only by means of a separate electorate. At present these communities are represented by men nominated by Government. But the arrangement does not satisfy anybody. In these days all communities ought to be represented by elected members. Under the present circumstances it is not possible for these classes to win a seat anywhere, and therefore we recommend that they should have a separate electorate, with seats in proportion to their numerical strength.

(4) The Mahomedans.—Communal representation for the Mahomedans should be retained, because in these days of tension between the Hindus and the Mahomedans any attempt at depriving them of their previous rights in this direction would provoke widespread opposition and would increase communal hatred. It is to be remembered that the recognition of communal interest in the Reforms made the Mahomedans alive to their position. In fact, such a recognition was an important step towards an all-sided progress of that community. The Committee would, however, suggest that the principle of allotting seats on legislative bodies in proportion to the numerical strength of the community in the Province should be adopted in the case of the Mahomedans as in the case of the Brahmins, the non-Brahmins and th depressed classes.

(5) The non-Mahomedans and the non-Hindu Communities.—The Europeans, Anglo-Indians, Indian Christians, Jews, Parsis and such other communities should, in our opinion, form a separate group for electoral purposes. It may be urged that the members of these communities have an easy access to the Councils through channels such as chambers of commerce, etc., but in view of the fact that these communities have large stakes in commercial and industrial concerns, we are of opinion that their political rights should get adequate representation.

The Labourers.—The problem of labourers presents some difficulty in view of the shifting nature of the population. Moreover, it is difficult to define a labourer for the purposes of special franchise. There are five important industrial centres in the Presidency—namely, Bombay, Ahmedabad, Sholapur, Karachi and Hubli. There are over 150,000 labourers employed in cotton industry in the Bombay City alone. There are about 60,000 men engaged in textile works in Ahmedabad, and about 20,000 men in Sholapur. At present these are represented in the Council through nominated members. But in view of the fact that Labour Unions are being formed on organised basis and that they are being recognised by Government the labourers should get representation through members elected by such recognised labour unions.

Reservation of Seats.—This Committee have in another place proposed that the Mahratta and other allied communities of the non-Brahmin group would forego their claims to reserved seats in case their proposals regarding the formation of electorates in groups such as Brahmins, non-Brahmins and so on, be accepted. The one fact very prominently brought out in the last elections and which may be urged in justification of reservation of seats is that in spite of a large majority of Mahrattas and other allied communities in the Ratnagiri, Ahmednagar, the Bombay (North), and the West Khandesh no candidate of the said communities would have got a chance of securing a seat in the open elections, had there been no provision regarding reservation of seats. In case the present position remains unchanged the Committee propose that the following should be the reserved seats for the Mahrattas and allied communities. In addition to this, they urge that there should be proportionate increase in the number of reserved seats in case there be any addition to the number of members of the Council.

Provincial Autonomy.—Judging by the experience in working the Reforms this Committee think that the form of Government known as Dyarchy has not been a success. This failure is due to the inherent defects of the system. The artificial division of subjects into reserved and transferred has led to confusion and the Legislative Councils cannot but get confused. Reservation of some subjects does not inspire confidence in the Ministers, which in its turn is due to the fact that the people seek to identify the Ministers with the reserved side of the Government. The public favour or assail them according as they approve or dislike their attitude towards the reserved questions rather than judge them mainly on the record in dealing with the questions of their own departments. This naturally has an adverse effect on the working of the transferred departments. This Committee therefore recommend that the Dyarchy should be abolished and all departments should be administered by the Ministers.

The Second Chamber.—We do not approve of the principle of having a second chamber. But if it is considered necessary to provide some safeguard to the grant of full responsible Government to the provinces, this committee will not press their objection strongly to the establishment of a second chamber. The Committee do not yet feel called upon to make any recommendations as to the exact powers or composition of this chamber. They would, however, point out that the members of this chamber should in every way be the real representatives of the people.

Nominations.—This Committee recommend that there should be no nominated officials in the Councils, since we think that real responsible Government, Ministerial responsibility, and the growth of parties will not be realised so long as officials as such find a place in the Councils. The opposition tends rather to direct against Government benches than against political party as such.

The Legislative Assembly.—The position of the Bombay Presidency at present in the Assembly is as given below.

Nominated	Officials	2
	Non-Official	1
Non-Mahomedans		7
Mahomedans		4
Europeans		2
Landholders		1

The distribution of seats, as we find at present, is defective on linguistic grounds. The Committee propose that the Thana, Ratnagiri, Kolaba and the seven districts of the Central Division in the Presidency proper, being purely Marathi-speaking districts, should conveniently be divided into three groups, and that each group should be allotted one seat.

The Committee are of opinion that as the Europeans and Mahomedans are given separate representation, the Mahrattas and allied communities should be given two reserved seats and one seat should be allotted to the depressed classes instead of a separate electorate. They further propose the lowering of franchise so that those who pay Rs. 50 as assessment should be entitled to vote.

Conclusion.—Finally, the Committee would emphasise the necessity for your Commission to pay a visit to the districts and to gather first-hand information regarding the condition of the masses. The position of the non-Brahmins in this Province is entirely different to that in any other Province. We sincerely trust the recommendations which you and your colleagues will make, will secure lasting benefit to the future prosperity of this country by giving the people the SWARAJ IN THE FORM OF DOMINION STATUS.

Memorandum submitted to the Indian Statutory Commission by the Secretary of the All India Mahratta League.

Forming a component part of the population of the non-Brahmin communities represented by the Non-Brahmin Party of the Deccan, our aspirations and aims are the same as given in their Memorandum, as there was no necessity of presenting a separate case before the Royal Commission, but the other communities, known as the allied communities to the Mahrattas, have been instigated by some of those who have been opposing the non-Brahmin cause, held a meeting on the 14th October, 1928, and indulged in making wild attacks on the Mahrattas. We learn their representatives are placing their claims before you. Therefore, it is desirable that our demands and aspirations should also be urged. The Maratta League was started soon after the memorable Pronouncement of 1917, and demanded communal electorate. The Joint Parliamentary Committee recognised the disabilities under which we were labouring, and provided for us reserved seats in multiple constituencies. The members of the communities were also allowed to take advantage of the concession and we generously allowed them equal privileges with us. We accepted this decision of the Joint Parliamentary Committee, and merged ourselves in the non-Brahmin Party and did not carry on a separate propaganda, but now we find that, on account of the shortsighted policy of some of their so-called leaders, the allied communities are unjustly attacking us and asking the Royal Commission to deprive the Mahrattas of the concession of reserved seats. We have, therefore, to approach you on behalf of the All India Maratta League.

India's Relations with England.—Our economic interests have been tied together for a period of a century and a half, and these relations got to be solved mutually. Neither party can break off the relations without doing harm to both.

The Status we would like to have.—Like every other word the word "Dominion Status" is also vague, but whatever it may mean we should be perfectly satisfied with "Dominion Status," be a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and work our destiny within the group.

Suggestions we would like to make.—Both the judicial and the executive offices in London which give the final word in their respective departments should be abolished or their connections cut off. That is to say, we would like the Viceroy, who represents the King-Emperor, to be the connecting link between India and England. We do not wish to have any connections with the Secretary of State and the Privy Council any longer.

The Viceroy.—He should be appointed by the Crown. He should have the power of veto and certification. He should be helped by as many Executive Councillors as he would choose to have. Half of them should be appointed by the Central Legislature and the remaining half by the Viceroy, subject to the approval of the Central Legislature.

The Central Legislature.—There should be only one Chamber, which should represent not Provinces or interests, but the people of India regardless of the franchise restrictions applied or put. The Legislative body should be free to pass legislation on any subject pertaining to our own interests (foreign relations, of course, will be controlled by the Imperial Parliament), and India will be consulted from time to time whenever her interests are affected, not only in the British Empire, but in any part of the world. The Central Legislature should not be authorised to legislate any discriminatory Act against any foreigner or any foreign interest. In case if it did so the party concerned should have recourse to the Central High Court and get the legality of the matter settled.

The Expenses of the Central Administration.—The expenses of the Central Administration should be met from independent sources not to be interfered with by the Provincial Governments. Any surplus left from the revenues thus collected should be redistributed in various Provinces according to their population.

Political Divisions of India.—India should be divided on linguistic basis into different Provinces, and these Provinces should be the next political units. At the head of these Provinces will be Governors appointed by the Crown.

The Power and Position of the Governor.—He should not have any power to interfere with any Act of Legislature which is passed by three-fourths of the Members of the House, but he may use his discretion in any other cases where the Act has not received three-fourths of the votes. His colleagues, who are to help him in administering various departments of the Province, should be taken from the Members of the House, whose nomination must be approved by that body.

Provincial Legislature.—The Members of the Provincial Legislature should represent the various social groups in that Province, their number varying according to the numerical strength of these social groups concerned. For example, the voters in the Deccan should be grouped as:—

(1) Brahmins.
(2) Mahrattas.
(3) Untouchables.
(4) The rest.

Purely provincial matters should be controlled by these Provincial Legislatures, the Central Legislature reserving the right to take over any provincial matter to legislate upon whenever it desires to do so.

Social Groups.—It is our honest opinion that it is better to describe conditions rather than discuss theories. Caste system may be good or bad. Castes are facts, unpallatable they may be. The Hindu Society is divided into various hereditary groupings. The members of these various groupings have been from time immemorial working up their destiny within that particular group and none other. It may be all right to divide society into economic units called "classes" as in the rest of the world, but the conditions prevailing in India do not exist outside India. Therefore, we are forced to utilise that which has been handed over to us from generation to generation and to-day we are not of opinion that we can get rid of the arrangement by mere wishful thinking. We have had these groups with us and we think that these groups are liable to stay with us for many more years yet to come. This is not the place to discuss the merits or the demerits of the system involved. We want to take the actuality into consideration. There is the caste system and the individual has to go up or down with his own caste. There is no escape from it. Therefore, it is our honest conviction that the members in these Provincial Legislatures and, to a certain extent, in the Central Legislature, should represent these various social groups.

Whom do we represent?—Realising how much work the members of the Commission have to do, we will not tax them by quoting dry historical facts, which are available in any book on Indian History. We are Mahrattas and belong to the Kshatriya class. We are known as Mahrattas, meaning an independent social group in the Mahrathi-speaking districts. The word Kunbi sometimes is meanly used in reference to us. We are engaged in agricultural pursuits. We belong to a martial race. Our ancestors at one time were the masters of this country. Some British historians admit that they did not receive or conquer India from the Moghuls but from the Mahrattas. Our people have fought almost on every front during the Great War. The great part of the Indian Army is recruited from our community. The British people need not question our loyalty. We have served the Empire in every field to the best of our ability and borne the brunt during the war times more than many communities put together. We are a separate social unit. We are a martial people. We would like to preserve our identity. We would like to work out our destiny together. Therefore we request the British public to preserve and nourish this unity. We want communal representation. Our group should be represented in the Provincial Legislature and the Central Legislature according to the strength of our population and the sacrifices we have undergone. We care not for charity. We want justice.

The Army and Navy.—We believe that India should have an adequate Navy manned by her martial races for defensive purposes. She should spend enough money to achieve this state at the earliest possible date. In the meantime she should contribute a substantial sum to the Imperial Treasury for the protection she receives from the British Navy. As to the Army, its standard should be set up and sumptuously kept by the high military authorities. We would leave the ratio of the British troops to the Indian troops to be divided by the experts. However, we do believe that the martial spirit of the Indian Army should not be denatured by the inclusion of such communities who have never done any fighting. The Mahratta recruits should form a substantial part in the Indian Army, and our Mahratta boys should have Mahratta officers in proportion to their strength. For this the Government of India should create an Indian Sandhurst to give training to these cadets with cadets from other martial communities. We are afraid that the morale of the Indian Army is liable to be lowered by taking in officers from communities which may be intellectually superior but which utterly lack the most badly needed martial spirit.

Reserved Seats.—In the District of Satara 1,026,259 people reside, out of which 726,031 are Mahrattas. The total number of voters is 21,533, out of which the Mahratta voters number 15,236. Under such so-called favourable circumstances, the Mahrattas of the said district have been able to send only one representative of their own to the Provincial Legislature at the three successive elections. The reasons are quite obvious for this state of affairs. Ours is a backward community and does not know how to protect itself from local politicians belonging to other groups, who parade most of the time in sheep's clothing to achieve their unscrupulous ends. In order to put a stop to this exploitation by others, we ask in the interests of our community for reserved seats. In case the communal representation does not get sufficient hearing, we should like to propose a substitute. We comprise one-fifth of the population of this province and one-thirtieth of the total population of this country. Therefore, we should have at least twenty reserved seats in the Provincial Legislature (the membership of the House being 114 and five seats in the Central Legislature (the membership being 145). If the membership of these houses is changed, we propose a change in the number of our reserved seats in the same proportion.

The Voting Qualifications.—Though the universal adult suffrage is our goal we realise that it cannot be achieved within the next few years. But people should not be deprived of their primary rights by putting in economic barriers in their way at the time of voting. The average income of a Mahratta is extremely low and naturally his tax-paying capacity is also very low. But according to present arrangements the franchise is entangled with a high tax-paying capacity. Under the present circumstances, it is impossible for our people to meet these requirements, and so they have to lose their natural rights. Therefore, we suggest that whatever economical qualifications may be put in the way of the voter they should not be any higher than one-fourth of the present assessment which has to be paid by a potential voter.

Concluding Remarks.—The present atmosphere is saturated with communal misunderstanding. Each group is struggling for its existence and wants to preserve its age-long identity, and we cannot be blamed for using the same tactics. We stand for communal representation and the least which we can expect is the reservation of seats in the proportion to the population. Fortunately, or unfortunately, our relations with some of the communities in Maharashtra are none too bright. We want to live and let live. We want to preserve our historic unity. The backwardness of our community forces us to ask the British public and you, Sirs, their representatives, to grant us due political aid either in the form of communal representation or reserve seats to preserve the identity of an important social unit.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT RAJA NAWAB ALI KHAN) AND OF THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. N. E. NAWALE, B.A., LL.B., M.L.C., and Mr. K. S. GUPTE, B.A., LL.B. (Bombay Provincial Non-Brahmin Party).

1. Chairman: I think you gentlemen have come in support of the Memorandum from the Bombay Provincial non-Brahmin Party, and I believe you, Mr. Nawale, are the member for the non-Mahomedan rural constituency of Ahmednagar district?—Yes, Sir. (Mr. Nawale) I am.

2. Perhaps it will be convenient if I address my questions to you, Mr. Nawale, but your colleague will be at liberty to interpose and add what he wishes if he thinks it necessary. Is that convenient to you?—Yes.

3. We have your Memorandum,* and we see from the first page of it that you come before us in support of this Memorandum from the members of the Bombay Provincial non-Brahmin Party, and that your proposals refer especially to the Marathi and Kanarese speaking districts?—Yes.

5. I will just call your attention and that of the Conference first of all to page 62 of your document, where you have set out very conveniently the present position in this Presidency as regards the proportion of the population that enjoys the franchise for the Provincial Council.

* * * * * * * * * * *

14. Then that is how it stands. Leaving out the children and confining it to adults, you may take it that at present of the males something like 13 out of every 100 have a vote, and of the women something like one woman in every 200 has a vote?—Yes.

15. What is your view, speaking for those you represent, about that?—We do not think it is a sufficient proportion.

16. Would you like to see it increased?—Yes; more people should be enfranchised.

17. That would involve either the adoption of complete universal suffrage or else the lowering of the franchise qualification?—Yes.

18. If I look at page 62 of your Memorandum I see that what you are suggesting really is not universal suffrage but a lowering of the franchise qualification?—Exactly.

19. My colleagues will find it on page 64. I see you say, near the top of page 64, "a widening of the franchise is especially necessary in the case of agriculturists"?—Yes.

20. You point out that they form 64 per cent. of the total population?—Yes.

21. And, of course, pay a very considerable part of the revenue?—Yes.

22. Let me see if I have got it right in my mind. In this Presidency you distinguish, do you not, between the qualification for the franchise in urban areas and the qualification in rural areas?—Yes.

* * * * * * * * * * *

29. Let us deal, first of all, with the urban constituencies. Is the view which you represent one which suggests that the qualifications should be lowered?—I do not think there is any necessity for lowering the franchise in the urban constituencies. I see no reason for doing so, except in the City of Bombay, where labour ought to get more votes.

30. You think the qualification of Rs. 120 annual rental value in the City of Bombay is too high?—Yes, it is too high.

31. What do you suggest it should be reduced to?—Rs. 60 a year.

34. You have told us, of course, that you are speaking more particularly for the southern parts of the Presidency?—Yes.

35. I dare say you have not specially considered the case of Sind?—No, we have not considered that.

37. Now let us take the existing qualification in rural constituencies, so that we may appreciate your suggestion there. As things are now in rural constituencies is the main qualification this: the ownership or occupancy as a tenant of land paying an assessment of Rs. 32 annually?—Yes.

38. I understand that when one speaks of land paying an assessment of Rs. 32 that is the minimum amount that is paid by way of land tax?—Yes.

39. It does not mean the land is valued at that figure, but its net profits are whatever they may be, and the proportion of net profits to be taken to represent the land tax is to be Rs. 32?—Yes.

40. What is your suggestion as regards that qualification?—That franchise ought to be lowered in the rural constituencies and brought from Rs. 32 to Rs. 16.

41. Halving it?—Yes.

42. Have you been able to form any estimate at all as to the number of new voters who would be introduced if that was done?—In the whole of the Bombay Presidency?

43. It may very likely be a matter for an expert estimate, but obviously it would considerably increase the number?—Yes. I can speak for the district from which I come, Ahmednagar district.

44. What do you say about your own district?—I think at least 9,000 voters would be added in the rural constituency.

45. Is that one of the reserved Mahratta seats?—Yes.

46. How many constituents have you got on the present roll?—Roughly speaking, about 17,000.

* * * * * * * * * * *

48. And if the test was reduced from Rs. 32 to Rs. 16? You would get about 9,000 more?—Yes.

49. Making 26,000?—Yes.

50. Tell me this about it. When one says, in a district such as your rural constituency, that a man has a vote if he owns or occupies as a tenant a piece of land of this assessment, I suppose you may have a case where the owner of the land is also the actual occupier?—Yes.

51. The actual cultivator?—Yes.

52. He owns and occupies and uses his own bit of land. Does that often happen?—Yes.

53. In that case, he being the owner and occupier, he has the vote?—Yes.

54. Nobody else has the vote in respect of that bit of land?—That is so.

* p. 62.

55. You also have the case where the owner, though he owns the land, does not himself till the soil or himself occupy it?—There are cases like that.

56. He lets it to a tenant?—Yes.

57. In that case, if the land satisfies the Rs. 32 assessment test, is it the owner who has the vote or the tenant who has the vote, or have they each of them a vote?—Both of them have got votes.

58. Which is the commoner case? Take your constituency. Is the commoner case that the ryot, the man who holds from Government, has let to a tenant, or that he cultivates his own ground?—The commoner case is that he cultivates his own ground.

59. The Government tenant as a rule is the actual cultivator?—Yes, except in irrigated tracts.

60. You are speaking of the dry areas?—Yes.

61. I suppose there are cases, are not there, where a man may own a large piece of land and he may let portions of his land to a number of tenants?—Yes.

62. What happens then? Suppose there is a ryot who owns an area which is divided into ten separate farms; each of his ten tenants will have a vote if each separate farm is assessed at Rs. 32?—Yes, each will have a vote as well as the owner himself.

63. Will the owner have one vote or ten?—The owner will have one.

64. That is what I wanted to get. Your system is complicated, and I may tell you that so is ours; there are not many Members of Parliament who could tell you accurately every qualification for an elector. I could not myself.

65. Major Attlee: If a man has a Rs. 32 holding and he is an owner-occupier, he gets a vote for that?—Yes.

66. But if that man lets out the land in ten portions to ten other people is the Rs. 32 holding sufficient to give a vote to each of those ten men?—No, if you vote as an occupier you must occupy an area which is assessed at, at least, Rs. 32.

67. Chairman: One sees the effect, more or less, if that is done. I think the next thing you deal with (at the bottom of page 62 of your document) is a suggestion for a rearrangement of the constituencies from the point of view of reservation of seats, and so on. I will read the passage at the bottom of page 62 and then ask you a question about it: "The Committee propose the following electorates, and are prepared to forego the present privilege of the reservation of seats through a mixed electorate to the Mahratta and allied communities in case their suggestions, as given below, are accepted: (1) The Brahmins. (2) The non-Brahmin Hindus. (3) The depressed classes. (4) The Mahomedans. (5) The non-Mahomedan and non-Hindu communities." That realy is the kernel of your proposal as regards the redistribution of seats?—Yes.

68. Is that the general view of the non-Brahmin Party?—Yes, it is.

69. Or are you speaking as an individual?—No, we are here on behalf of the party.

70. The Committee have put forward that suggestion?—Yes.

71. Let us be sure we understand it. First of all you say you are "prepared to forego the present privilege of the reservation of seats * * * to the Mahratta and allied communities." That refers to the fact, I understand, that in this Presidency there are seven non-Mahomedan general constituencies in which the provision is made that at least one member must belong to the Mahratta caste or allied communities?—Yes, that is so at present.

72. I think I was told the other day (correct me if I am wrong) that that would not include a Rajput?—At present the "allied communities" would not include that; they are not included, according to the list.

73. Although Rajputs and Mahrattas are both Kshatriyas?—Yes.

74. You are prepared, you say, to give up the idea of the reservation of these seven seats if the condition which you suggest is fulfilled?—Yes, if the non-Brahmins are given a separate electorate.

75. Let me see if I understand the condition rightly. The condition really seems almost to amount to this: it seems to amount to abolishing general electorates altogether?—Yes, it will amount to that.

76. It does amount to that?—It amounts to that, yes.

77. It is a suggestion, really, to abolish general electorates altogether. It is a proposal, if I follow rightly, that the Brahmins should vote together for their own Brahmin members?—Yes.

78. In other words, that no Brahmin shall be a member for any constituency except a Brahmin separate constituency?—Yes.

79. Then there are the non-Brahmin Hindus, who do the same?—Yes.

80. Then that the depressed classes shall do the same, and the Mahomedans shall do the same, and then your non-Mahomedan and non-Brahmin communities—that would include the Parsis?—Yes.

81. So your suggestion is that all general electorates in this Presidency should be abolished?—Yes.

82. And that the elected members of the Council should each and all of them be elected by a separate constituency of their own community?—Yes.

83. Treating the Brahmins as a distinct community by themselves?—Yes.

84. It would be a very big change, would it not?—Of course, it would be a big change, no doubt.

85. Why do you propose this? What is there which makes you think it is a suggestion which the Conference should consider?—The main reason is this, that the Brahmins, though their proportion is very small, predominated everywhere in local self-governing bodies and in the Council also, up till now. The last Reforms only gave us seven seats; otherwise we had no representatives as such of our own in the Council.

86. While you are mentioning that, how many members are there of your party in the present Legislative Council?—In the non-Brahmin party as such?

87. Yes.—We are 14 at present.

88. So you see, though seven seats were reserved for the Mahratta, you have, in fact, under the present system, a non-Brahmin party in the Legislature of 14?—Yes. We have other members who also joined us, those who did not come in as reserved members.

89. Your reason really is that the Brahmin, though his caste is, of course, a minority of the Hindu community taken as a whole, none the less has a very large part in representation in public affairs?—In public bodies, yes. (Mr. Gupte): Their interests do not always coincide with the interests of the non-Brahmins. They claim superiority by their birth, and they are the priests, and, therefore, they want to predominate over other communities, over the masses.

90. Can you tell me how many Brahmins there are who are elected members of the present Bombay Legislature?—(Mr. Nawale): To speak of Deccan and Karnatak, there are about six.

91. When you gave me the figure of 14 just now when you spoke of the non-Brahmin party, were you still confining yourself to the Deccan and the Karnatak?—Yes.

92. Of course, as things are in this part of the world, you form a non-Brahmin party, and no doubt it is largely consolidated by the fact that it is opposed to the Brahmins?—Yes. It is opposed to the Brahmins, but we have our own constructive programme, too.

93. But do you think that under your plan all the non-Brahmins will agree, or do not you think it will lead to a proposal now that there should be a list of different castes, each of whom should elect its members?—No. This is a demand of the united non-Brahmins. Of course, there may be some members who disagree with the party as such. It would be impossible to give each caste a separate electorate, and we, too, have not asked like that.

94. Major Attlee: Why do you say that you would not have a proper representation if you did not have separate constituencies? You have got a big majority of the votes. There is a list in the big book, I think? —We have not got the big book here.

95. I will give you an instance. In Nasik there are 21,000 electors, of whom 15,500, roughly, are Mahrattas?—Yes.

96. Will you explain why Mahrattas cannot get in at election time?—Yes, the reason is obvious and very simple. There is hardly any doubt that we have a great number of voters in these constituencies; but majority of voters in these rural constituencies are under the influence of sowcars, Bramin priests and Brahmin Government officials.

97. Chairman: One of the words means moneylenders?—Yes.

98. Any Government officials who may be Brahmins?—Yes, everywhere we have Brahmin officials.

99. Major Attlee: You say moneylenders. Are the moneylenders Brahmins?—No. They belong to the advanced communities.

100. Chairman: What are the advanced communities besides the Brahmins?—The Banias and the Gujrathis who are moneylenders in the Deccan, for example.

101. Major Attlee: Then your point is not so much the Brahmin as such, but that your electors as a whole are likely to be influenced by persons in positions of authority, whether it is economic or political or social, or whatever it may be?—But I can assure you that it is the Brahmin priests and officials and the sowcars frequently.

102. How does that work?—The Brahmins are the pleaders of the sowcars and the sowcar is ultimately influenced by the Brahmin officer.

103. In your own community of the non-Brahmins, are not there people wielding influence? I suppose some are richer than others; some are better educated than others?—A very small percentage of them are educated.

104. You see, the point you make is that the ignorant voter is liable to be made to vote by people of influence?—Yes.

105. You try to get rid of that by a separate constituency for non-Brahmins?—Yes.

106. Are you sure that you will not have influences of the same sort wielded by Brahmins even in a non-Brahmin constituency?—No, not such a baneful influence as is working at present under the Brahmin dominance.

107. Now I want to ask you about the question of the franchise which we were talking about in the Bombay City?—Yes.

108. You proposed a reduction there?—Yes.

109. What is the ordinary rent paid by a mill-hand in Bombay City?—Ordinarily they pay five or six rupees.

110. You would enfranchise them by your proposal? —Yes, poor people as they are.

111. You do not propose to enfranchise the labourer in the village, the daily labourer? You have, I suppose, in the village some landless labourers, have you not?—Yes.

112. Would you enfranchise them?—Labourers in the villages, you mean?

113. Yes.—No, they are agriculturists. In the Deccan a petty agriculturist works in his fields for some months, and then he turns out a labourer himself.

114. Does he own sufficient land to give him a vote under your proposal?—Many of them do not.

115. What sort of proportion of them?—I should say that at least at present 40 per cent. of them have not land enough to give them a vote at present.

116. And, under your proposal, what proportion would they be?—I cannot give the exact proportion, unless I work out figures. But even if the franchise is lowered and brought down to Rs. 16 still a large number would be left out.

117. I do not know what proportion that would be of the total number. Your proposal shows, I think, that you have already 17,000 electors in Ahmednagar district?—Yes.

118. Your proposal adds 9,000?—Yes.

119. That makes 26,000 out of a population of nearly 700,000?—Yes.

120. Now, that leaves a very large proportion of adults without votes. Who would those be? What classes would thus be left out of the vote under your proposal?—Agriculturists mostly.

121. And why should not they have the vote?—I would be glad if they could be enfranchised, and even if the franchise were lowered to eight or six rupees; but as the proposal of the party stands, I must stick to it. These are our demands at present, that the franchise should be brought down to 16 rupees. Our ultimate object is, as we have stated in the memorandum, that there should be adult suffrage.

122. You have stated that the ordinary ryot was liable to be under the influence of the moneylender? —Yes.

123. I suppose that would apply still more to the ryots with very little land who are labourers most of their time? They are poorer still?—If there is a separate non-Brahmin constituency, then, of course, they can utilise their right of representating themselves by their own candidates. They can choose their own candidates.

124. But the men in the villages who own very little land, and who are mostly labourers, work for the ordinary farmer, do they not?—Yes.

125. And the suggestions you have made will not give those people the vote?—Yes, they would not get the vote.

126. Will they be represented by the people for whom they work?—No, not necessarily so. Now these classes are taking to education, and an educated man from amongst themselves can represent them. He need not be their landlord, he need not be their direct superior or man of influence over them. The candidate may be an individual man sprung up from the masses, and he can represent them.

127. Yes, but you are enfranchising as the voters the farmer class?—Yes.

128. And, therefore, the tendency will be, other things being equal, to return people in the interests of the farmer?—Yes.

129. What I am putting to you is that if the landless man or the man who owns very little land is not enfranchised, he will not have any representation as against the farmers' interest, will he?—Yes, that may be so; that is inevitable.

130. One other point. You have, as a matter of fact, beyond the reserved seats returned a certain number of members of your community for the unreserved seats?—Yes, we have.

131. Something like half of your present representation is by people returned for the unreserved seats; seven reserved and seven unreserved, I think you said?—Yes.

132. How is it that if the influence were so strong as you have said to support your claim for reserved seats, you manage to get these other seven returned for the non-reserved seats?—In those unreserved constituencies the electorate is rather enlightened, and the Brahmin influence and other influences which I have mentioned are not so strongly felt in those areas. (Mr. Gupte): And sometimes the personality of the candidate wins for him the seat.

133. Chairman: You have a colleague in the representation of Ahmednagar, have you not?—(Mr. Nawale): Yes, I have a colleague.

134. Is the other member also a Mahratta?—Yes.

135. That is an instance of what Major Attlee puts? —No. He came in only because one non-Mahratta member who was elected with me was disqualified.

136. Major Attlee: The point remains, of course, does it not, that half of your members in the Legislature are returned for non-reserved seats?—Yes, but

I have already said that the conditions in those non-reserved areas very much differ from those in the reserved areas.

137. There may be one case where the other candidate was unseated on petition, or disqualified, but the broad fact remains that you have managed to get representation, if not in seven, at least in six cases?—I think I must make one thing clear. The seven seats are reserved not for the non-Brahmins for whom we have come here to speak, but they are given to Mahrattas and allied castes. The non-Brahmins are not composed of Mahrattas and allied castes alone; there are other communities, too, and these seats belong to Mahrattas and allied castes as such; so these seven have come in on the vote of the Mahratta and allied castes, and not on the general ticket of the non-Brahmins as such.

138. You draw a distinction, then?—No, I do not want to draw a distinction. I was asked about 14 and 7 seats. It was said that seven have come in without the reserved ticket; that is why I am explaining these things.

139. Yes; but the broad principle on which your party is founded is non-Brahmin?—Yes; but the Council party is formed after members are elected.

140. And therefore you have, as a matter of fact, an effective return of 14 non-Brahmins, although there are seven seats that are specially reserved, the other seven have got in in open competition against Brahmins?—I don't wonder for that. In fact, in the non-reserved areas, the returns are not satisfactory to non-Brahmins. In Satara, for instance, with a majority of non-Brahmin votes, we have been able to get only one seat out of three seats. That is not good.

141. How do you reconcile that with the statement on page 63, which says that "in spite of a large majority of Mahrattas and other allied communities in the Ratnagiri, Ahmednagar, the Bombay (North) and the West Khandesh, no candidate of the said communities would have a chance of securing a seat in the open elections"?—Yes. I have already referred to that point. The Brahmins and the higher castes influence the masses, who are educationally backward, and, therefore, we were given seven reserved seats. The rest were left to the general electorate. But for reservation, our candidates would not have been elected in those areas at all.

142. Would you say that the disabilities of the people for whom you speak, the non-Brahmins generally, are due to ignorance, lack of education, and so on—things which are gradually passing away?—Gradually they are taking to education nowadays. We want to have compulsory education in our districts now, and if we get that soon there will be a great awakening amongst the masses.

143. Would you say that the necessity for reserved seats was less now than at the time when the Reforms were introduced?—No, I do not think the time has yet come for abolishing the reserved seats. That will be indirectly denying representation to millions of poorer masses.

144. Do you think it is better?—It would be better to provide for them for at least ten years to come. (Mr. Gupte): In the days of non-co-operation certain Mahrattas had a chance of coming in, but now that moment is going, and we are afraid that non-Brahmins hereafter will be deprived from getting a chance by the higher classes unless the seats are reserved.

145. Colonel Lane-Fox: You will see this is rather a startling proposal of yours, is it not? It is not exactly democratic?—(Mr. Nawale): The proposal on page 63 you mean?

146. No, the proposal for abolishing the general electorate?—It may sound so, but we cannot help it.

147. It is not a very democratic proposal, is it?—We are forced to put it like that because the conditions are very strange. In India conditions are so strange that what is democratic in other countries may be undemocratic here, and what looks apparently undemocratic here may really be very just and democratic.

148. I want you to tell me what they are? You vote by secret ballot?—Yes.

149. And you say that a large number of votes are captured by the Brahmins?—Yes.

150. Because people are afraid not to vote for them?—Yes.

151. How are the Brahmins to find out which way the man votes?—When the returning officer counts the votes naturally they get the various votes from the constituency.

152. But if the system is working satisfactorily nobody ought to know how the vote is given?—He does not know exactly what person has voted for him, but he knows where the majority of votes come from. There are agents and canvassers who canvass for him. The voters are influenced, and they tell the canvasser or the agent.

153. Why need they tell him?—The influence works and the agents are informed that such and such a person is voting for such and such a candidate.

154. But the system should be, and is intended to be, that a man could go into the polling booth and vote for whoever he likes?—He exercises that right, but afterwards he tells the agent for the candidate for whom he has voted, and his vote, too, is much influenced before he has approach to the polling booth.

155. There is no reason why he should?—They are ignorant. They are actually brought in carts and conveyances that are prohibited.

156. If that is the condition at present a lowering of the franchise will make it worse if you get more illiterate men voting?—They will get political education and more enfranchising would be much in the interest of the backward non-Brahmin candidates.

157. Is not the better plan for you to educate your electors to vote according to their conscience?—This is going on now day by day, but they are not at present thoroughly educated to exercise their vote properly and freely. Wider franchise will create awakening among the masses.

158. Why, instead of asking for these separate elections, do not you agitate among your people and tell them not to tell anybody how they vote?—We are doing so, and we are creating an awakening amongst these masses, but the system must also help us. The system must be so arranged as to awaken the masses to their political sense.

159. And will not that, in time, give you a better result than all these separate electorates?—After ten years I do not think there will be any necessity for reserved seats, but with things as they stand now there is a great need for reservation of seats; otherwise these masses would not have any representation on the Council at all. The process of awakening is just begun, and if you stop reservation at this stage, the process, instead of making any further advance, will be stopped.

160. Chairman: Then do you take the view that the adoption of a system of reserved seats tends to create a situation in which reserved seats will not be necessary?—Yes, that is my conviction. (Mr. Gupte): Perhaps when the backward classes are developed there will be no necessity to have reserved seats. (Mr. Nawale): We have compulsory schemes under consideration, and when they are applied the people will be educated, and they will know something of politics and something of public life. A time will then come to abolish reservation.

161. Mr. Cadogan: What is your own experience in Ahmednagar? It is a two-member seat. Who headed the poll?—Last time, Mr. Feroda.

162. Was he a Brahmin or a non-Brahmin?—He was a Marwari Jain, a merchant community.

163. Chairman: We may summarise it in this way. I see from this book that, while there are 13,615 Mahrattas in your constituency, you would not have been returned if it had not been for the reserved seats?—Yes.

Mr. Cadogan: That is what I wanted to know.

164. Chairman: And, in fact, you did get, out of the 13,615 Mahratta votes, 2,385 votes?—Yes.

165. Sardar Mujumdar: What sub-communities, in your opinion, constitute the Brahmin community?—The Government have defined that, I think. I do not know what the Brahmin communities are.

166. I mean the Brahmin community as classified by Government?—I am not aware of what classes they consist.

167. Do you include the Gaud Saraswat Brahmins, Chandraseniya-Kayastha-Prabhus, Pathare-Prabhus, and Daivajna Brahmins in the Brahmin community?—The Gaud Saraswat Brahmins come in the Brahmins, but some of the others are different communities altogether. They are non-Brahmin communities, for at least election purposes.

168. They are not classed as Brahmins by Government?—I am not concerned with what Government has classed and what Government has not classed.

169. And you also do not know?—No.

170. That they are Brahmins?—I do not know that. I would have the Prabhus as non-Brahmins, for election purposes.

171. But I want the situation as laid down by Government?—I am not aware what Government has laid down. (Mr. Gupte): At present the Brahmins are incorporated with the Prabhus and other communities, because there are many communities amongst the Brahmins. We want to form our separate electorates on the principle that those who claim superiority by birth, those who belong to the priesthood class, should be styled Brahmins, and the rest non-Brahmins.

172. What proportion does the Brahmin community hold to the total population of the Deccan and Karnatak?—I have not worked out that figure, but the proportion must, of course, be very small.

173. What is the percentage of literacy among the Brahmins?—I have not worked it out. You could find it out from the Census reports. It is extremely high, obviously.

174. What is the percentage of Government posts held by the Brahmin community and the communities which are not, strictly speaking, Brahmins, but which are equally advanced in literacy with the Brahmin community, as, for example, the Kayastha-Prabhus?—I do not carry these figures in my pocket, but 80 per cent. of these posts are monopolised by Brahmins alone; I can say that from my experience going about the country.

175. Were any restrictions put upon the so-called backward classes in the matter of education since the advent of British rule? If not, why did not they educate themselves?—There are many difficulties in the way of the non-Brahmins.

176. Will you name some of them?—In the way of educating themselves the non-Brahmins have many difficulties. There have been invariably Brahmin teachers working under the District Local Boards up till now, and they did not educate the non-Brahmin boys properly. Now-a-days a gradual change is noticeable, since non-Brahmins took control of local boards.

177. Do you mean the non-Brahmin boys are prevented from receiving proper education by the Brahmins?—No, I do not say they are prevented, but they are neglected in the classes. In fact, out of every thousand non-Brahmin boys who attend the primary school in a village you get hardly one who reaches the matriculation examination of the university. That means you have neglected at least 999 boys out of every thousand, who are thrown away as waste.

178. Is it or is it not a fact that communities which are not Brahmin, but which have educated themselves, hold a greater proportion of Government posts?—I do not think so. The monopoly is decidedly of the Brahmins, which is simply vicious.

179. Do you know that among the Brahmins there are Grihasthas and priests, and the former constitute an overwhelming majority of the Brahmin community?—As far as the non-Brahmin community is concerned, it does not matter whether Brahmins are priests or not; whether they are priests or not, so far as the non-Brahmin community is concerned they are unitedly against them.

180. You do not think there is a difference?—They sink their differences when confronted with non-Brahmins. As far as we non-Brahmins are concerned, there is no difference between a Brahmin who is a priest and one who is not a priest.

181. Do you know that the Grihasthas have never cared to assert any social or theocratic right? Nay, that they consider it derogatory to follow the priestly profession?—No, I am not aware of any such thing. I cannot say what the Brahmin Grihasthas and the Brahmin priests do among themselves.

182. Do you know that a priest performs religious rites and ceremonies only at the invitation of the houseowner?—Well, they have got their tyrannical ways of exacting money. That is why Mr. Bole, the labour member of the non-Brahmin community, had to bring in his Joshi Bill in the Council to deprive the Brahmin priests of their tyrannical priestly emoluments.

183. Do you know that some communities have their own priests, and the Brahmin priests have never cared to displace them?—That has only started now-a-days, and on a very small scale too.

184. Do the Lingites have their own priests?—I do not know.

185. Do you know the exact difference between a vedokta rite and puranokta rite? Is not it a fact that the puranokta rite is only a simplified form of the vedokta rite?—I do not think that is so; the puranokta rite is something meant for the non-Brahmins, I suppose.

186. What was the profession largely followed by the Mahratta community before British rule?—They were warriors and agriculturists.

187. Do you know that there was, in the olden times, the fullest scope for the realisation of the ambition of the said community?—Yes, there was in the strict Mahratta rule.

188. Has that state of things prevailed since the advent of British rule?—No, our youths are denied the right of getting military commissions.

189. Do you know that the Mahratta community and other allied communities are mainly martial races and that they acted as such until the advent of British rule?—Yes.

190. Do you know that the Brahmin community in Mahrashtra is also martial in spirit, and that the Deccani Brahmins are not admitted in the Indian Army?—I do not think so. I do not think there is any provision of that sort.

191. Do you consider it as fair to shut out a whole community from one important department of administration?—They are not shut out, they did not offer their services in the last Great War to show their martial spirit.

192. Do you know that, except for the Kolhapur State, all other Mahratta States were the creation of Bajirao Mahratta I, a Brahmin?—I do not think so. Instead of any State being created by Brahmins, the Brahmin States have been created by Mahrattas.

Chairman: I am very much interested in this; I love learning history; but do you think we must go so much into this? Political rights cannot be made to depend entirely on these things, though they may be useful things to bear in mind.

193. Sardar Mujumdar: Do you think that for the efficient working of the Provincial Legislative Councils it is desirable to apply some test for educational qualifications for a candidate, inasmuch as the proceedings of the State Councils are conducted in English?—A test for qualifications?

194. Some sort of test of qualification?—You mean, to become a member of these bodies?

195. Yes.—Which? The Legislative Council or the local self-governing bodies?

196. The Council and also the local self-governing bodies?—As far as the views expressed in the non-

Brahmin Party's memorandum are concerned, I am bound to say no such qualification should be imposed.

* * * * * * * * * * *

198. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: Would you suggest a universal lowering of the franchise in Bombay City, or is it only to apply to the working classes?—If it is lowered for everyone I have no objection, but if it is not going to be lowered for everybody it should be lowered for the labourers, at least.

199. Do you ask for it for the labourers or for all?—We have asked for it for the labourers.

200. Dr. Ambedkar: Do you wish to discriminate between the labouring population and the non-labouring, or do you say the basis of franchise should be the same all through?—All through. (Mr. Gupte): For labourers we have a different programme; there should be labour unions, and through the labour unions they can act.

201. Rao Saheb Patil: Mr. Nawale, according to the memorandum of your party, you want to have five electorates?—Yes.

202. Now, supposing we do not have a separate electorate for the Brahmins, I think you will be satisfied with the present non-Mahomedan constituency if you have reserved seats as at present?—Yes, but we want seats to be given to us in proportion to our population.

203. Your object in having the separate constituency for the non-Brahmins is that their interests shall be protected?—That is all.

204. So may I take it that in the interests of the backward classes the basis of representation should be the population basis?—Yes, it should be the population basis.

205. If you have the population basis, you will be quite satisfied with your representation, so long as you have reserved seats as well?—Yes, I will be satisfied if adequate number of seats proportionate to our population are reserved for us.

206. In such a case you will not mind if the non-Brahmins do not have a separate electorate; you will not press for that?—In what case?

207. If you get satisfactory representation according to the population basis with reserved seats, then you would like to have the Brahmins with you?—There would be no harm in having the Brahmins with us in that case. If we get seats proportionate to our population reserved in this Presidency, then we may not have these separate electorates except for the depressed classes.

208. I do not ask you about those; they will take care of themselves. You think that in the interests of the backward classes, the franchise should be necessarily lowered?—Yes, it should be lowered.

209. In what way will backward classes be benefited thereby? Can you give me some idea?—They can put up their own candidates, and exercise the right of voting in favour of their own candidate. At present they are not properly enfranchised, and the votes of those who have got them are taken over by the Brahmin candidate or by candidates who have got influence over these voters. For the effective return of non-Brahmins to councils the franchise of the rural voters must be lowered.

210. I do not want to go into the controversy of Brahmin and non-Brahmin, and I do not want to go into those questions which have already been put to you, but if the franchise is lowered, would your interests be better safeguarded?—Yes, with adequate reservation of seats.

212. Rao Saheb Patil: Do not you think, in view of the number of voters in the towns, that the candidate there, especially if he belongs to the advanced classes, is able to canvass for votes much more easily? He can canvass much more easily, because the voters are in a compact area.

213. It is easier for him, because the voters are all in one place?—Yes.

214. Whereas, in the case of a rural constituency, a candidate who has to get votes from the rural voters has to go from place to place?—He has to wander from hut to hut; he has to pass over hills and valleys and cross rivers where there are no roads, even.

215. Would you like to have different constituencies, rural and urban, as is the case in the Central Provinces?—I should very much approve of that scheme, if the constituency were split up into two distinct parts, rural and urban.

216. But in that case you would like to have one more seat for the rural constituency?—The rural should have two and the urban only one.

217. Take the case of Satara. Would you like to have three seats for the rural constituency there and one for the urban?—Yes.

218. So that from that point of view you have no objection to an increase in the number of members of the Legislative Council?—I am in favour of increasing the number of members of the Legislative Council, without that the backward non-Brahmin communities would not get adequate representation.

219. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: You have just said that there should be separate rural and urban constituencies, and you have described the trials and tribulations a candidate undergoes on account of the mixture of these constituencies. Now, do you want the separation of urban and rural on account of the candidate's convenience or because you think the rural interests are neglected by the candidate coming from urban areas?—Both. I do not think that the urban candidate can or will properly represent the interests of the rural voters, as the two interests at present clash with each other.

220. Therefore it is on account of the interest of the rural voters that you recommend this change?—Primarily it is in the interest of the rural voters, but, of course, there are some other reasons.

221. Primarily it is for the interests of the rural masses?—Yes.

222. In that case, if the rural and urban constituencies are divided, would you advise a lowering of the franchise?—Yes. I am in favour of lowering the franchise in the case of rural voters from Rs. 32 to Rs. 16.

223. In spite of the separation, you think a lowering of the franchise will be necessary?—Yes.

224. In reply to Major Attlee, you said that in addition to the seven seats which are reserved, seven more non-Brahmins had been returned. Do you think they are included in the Mahrattas and allied communities?—No, they are different castes altogether. Because they are non-Brahmins they have joined with us, but they are not Mahrattas or allied caste peoples.

225. You have asked for separate electorates for Mahrattas and allied castes joined together, and you would perhaps like separate electorates for the other non-Brahmin castes also?—I shall not be sorry if the non-Mahratta non-Brahmins are given a separate scheme of reservation of seats; in fact, I shall be glad of it.

226. I want to know your view as regards the tenant having the vote: do you mean the permanent tenant or the temporary tenant?—The tenant who is found to be the tenant when the lease is prepared.

227. Will you give the franchise to the permanent tenant or to the tenant at will?—I think to qualify himself as a voter a man has to stay there for a certain number of months; a residential qualification is necessary.

Chairman: I think it would be well to ask the gentlemen who represent the body called the All-India Mahratta League to come in and listen to this evidence. I appreciate that the point of view of the two bodies is not quite the same, but I think it might be useful if they came in to listen, and, if it is desired, members of the Conference might ask additional explanations from them..

* * * * * * * * * *

228. Sir Hari Singh Gour: It is clear from the trend of your evidence that you wish to strengthen rural representation in the Local Council?—Yes, because they pay a major portion of the revenues directly and indirectly.

229. And you wish to leave the urban representation as far as possible unchanged?—Unchanged as far as the voting population is concerned.

230. Do you realise what would be the effect, if your proposals were applied, upon the constitution of the Local Council? Do you think it will increase in brain power and efficiency?—I think you can get proper candidates even from the backward communities nowadays to represent them in the Council.

231. I suppose your objective, as it is the objective of every member of the Council, is that the best brains should be utilised for the public service?—Not necessarily. I am opposed to that idea. If you utilise the best brains without giving representation to the masses and allowing them to have proper and adequate direct representation in the Council, then, of course, there will be more mischief than good.

Mr. GANGAJIRAO MUKUNDRAO KALBHOR and Mr. K. S. GHORPADE, B.Sc., here entered the Conference Room.

Chairman: Gentlemen, I have asked you to come in because, although in some respects your Memorandum does not follow quite the same lines, still we are discussing a general subject on which I shall be very glad to have your presence. We have all read the Memorandum which you submit, the Memorandum of the All-India Mahratta League.* Sir Hari Singh Gour is asking some questions more particularly of the gentlemen who are already here. If you will follow the questions it may be that you would like at times to add a remark. I will tell you the question which has just been put. Sir Hari Singh Gour asked whether it was not desirable to utilise the best brains of the country in administration and in Government, even though that meant drawing disproportionately from some particular section (he was referring, no doubt, to the Brahmins), and I understood the witness to say that he did not himself think that was the true principle, and he was going to explain why.

Witness (Mr. Nawale): Yes, I just want to explain further. Before the Montagu-Chelmsford spirit was introduced we had these "best brains," and they used to be our representatives in the Councils; but that was the worst sort of representation of the masses. We have our own seats in the last scheme, and now we have greater representation of these masses. What we are trying now to do is to have greater direct representation of these masses in the Council.

232. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I understand your theory is that you would sacrifice the best brains in favour of the class principle?—I would.

233. Do you think it would be advisable to give votes to all literate persons who have passed the fourth standard?—There is hardly any education amongst the masses.

234. Merely literate persons not possessing the requisite property qualification have at present no votes?—I have not worked out that figure, how many literate persons have not a vote.

235. There must be some?—There might be some.

236. Very well; would you give them votes or not, because it would encourage and promote education and literacy?—That would be advocating manhood suffrage. I do not think a man possessing no property qualification should be given the vote.

237. My point is that, if you wish really to develop the political institutions of this country, you want to encourage literacy and education?—Yes.

238. In order to encourage literacy and education, give a vote to all literate adults?—No, that would be a wrong sort of way of creating more literacy and more awakening and consciousness amongst the masses. You give them direct representation. There are people available now amongst these backward classes who are fairly educated to represent them.

239. I am not dealing with that. I am to give them votes, according to you. All those persons will be enfranchised, that is to say, the backward classes and the people you have in mind?—Yes.

240. But in addition to those persons, I am suggesting whether you are not in favour of a literate vote as such, with a view to advancing the political education of the people, and to develop the self-governing institutions in the country?—No, I do not think so.

241. You have said this, if you will kindly turn to your memorandum at page 62, and I will draw your attention to page 63. I just want an explanation about this on page 62. You are prepared to forego the privilege of reserved seats for Mahrattas?—Yes.

242. But on page 63 I think your language is susceptible of an interpretation that because there is a very large number of Mahrattas, and though they failed to get the seats, you are still in favour of a reservation of seats in favour of the Mahrattas: is that so?—Yes.

243. Have I understood you correctly? In other words, while in the abstract at page 62 you are prepared to forego reservation, yet as a practical politician you find at page 63 that, as matter of fact, though the reservation of seats is foregone, the Mahratta interests will suffer, and therefore you are in favour of the reservation of some seats for your community for the Mahrattas?—Yes.

244. Chairman: Would you excuse me? It is not quite the way I understand it. I think the witness's view is, as he explained some time ago to me, that, provided that general electorates were abolished, and you had a series of separate electorates, he would be prepared to see the reservation of seats go; otherwise not?—That is so.

245. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I will draw your attention to page 66. If that is not your view, it certainly seems to be the view of the Mahratta League. The Mahratta League say: "We should have at least twenty reserved seats in the Provincial Legislature * * * and five seats in the Central Legislature."—(Mr. Ghorpade): According to population.

246. That is to say, the Mahratta League demand special reserved seats not qua non-Brahmins but qua Mahrattas?—(Mr. Nawale): We are not concerned with that.

247. I ask your opinion about it. There is a demand on behalf of the Mahratta League that they should have a certain number of seats, 20 reserved seats in the Provincial Council and five in the Central Legislature?—Yes. Well, I do not think that there is any need for reservation of any special seats for Mahrattas alone. We are here to advocate the cause of the non-Brahmins as such.

248. Then you do not agree with the demand of the Mahratta League?—No. Let me make myself more plain. The demand of Mahrattas comes before the Commission simply because certain communities have split up from the non-Brahmin Party, and they are now trying to have special seats for themselves; but that was really a bad move. I was sorry for that, personally, and this memorandum is an answer to that move. If these differences are removed, then the non-Brahmin Party has been united, and we are here to put forward the view of the united non-Brahmin Party as such.

249. You say you see no signs of the consolidation of the Brahmins and the non-Brahmin Party: you see no sign whatever of the political awakening having taken the turn of consolidating these people of India; consequently you want certain treatment in the matter of reserved seats?— Yes.

250. I, therefore, ask you, will you not give the same latitude and the same freedom to your non-Mahratta colleagues? How can you deny them the right of asking for reserved seats if you wish also reserved seats for your community?—I have already answered that question to an honourable member here. I am sorry if seats are reserved only for us.

251. I am not asking you that. I ask you, as a sagacious statesman, as a politician with the best interests of the country at heart, do you advocate the splitting up of the general electorates into communities and sub-communities and sub-sub-communities for the purpose of exercising the right of franchise?—No, I do not want sub-divisions and sub-castes and all those things.

252. Do not you think that the results of your representation would terminate in it?—No, I do not think so. We do not want any sub-division more than the five which we have tabulated here.

253. Let me give you an example. You have, at pages 62-3, classified the non-Brahmins and non-Hindu communities?—Yes.

254. Take the case of the Europeans, the Anglo-Indians and the Parsis?—Yes.

255. You have lumped them together in a single community?—Yes.

256. And you deny the Parsis the right of separate representation for themselves on the same terms as you demand the right of representation, and the same in the case of Europeans and Anglo-Indians?—But you see that the non-Brahmin Hindus, electorate No. 2, which we have tabulated on page 62, includes some 25 or 30 communities grouped together; more than 40, I should say.

257. So that, whereas the Parsis and Europeans, who only comprise about 300,000 people, are given a separate vote, Mr. Nawle has lumped together about 25 or 30 communities, distinct ethnologically and otherwise, into a single group. You have told us that at the present moment the Brahmins are exercising a dominating influence in the general elections?—Yes.

258. What assurance can you give the Commission that if your seats are separated into two different classes, or more than two different classes, the Brahmin pleaders who advise and have great influence over the general electorates will not still exercise the same influence over the non-Brahmins, and put in undesirable non-Brahmin candidates in the Provincial Legislatures?—That will be the lesser evil.

259. You recognise that as an evil?—They will try to create all sorts of difficulties.

260. Chairman: I understand your answer to the first question is that you take your risk of that?—Yes.

261. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You recognise that the risk is there?—Yes, but it will occur less and less as the voters become enfranchised and get some sort of education. They will get their own rights, and will know the best way to exercise those rights.

262. Do not you think it is a dangerous thing to begin education by making legislation in the first instance? Do not you think it would be a better political education to begin at the bottom of the ladder?—You mean the voter?

263. Yes; give the masses political education by commencing to educate them from the bottom of the ladder.—No, I do not think so. Giving them the vote is beginning to educate them in a way.

264. Dr. Suhrawardy: If you get adequate representation on population basis in a separate electorate, would you still press for manhood suffrage or the further lowering of the franchise?—I would at this stage go in for the further lowering of the franchise.

265. Why do you want it if you get adequate representation on population basis in a separate electorate, because I understand that the whole object of you, gentlemen, representing the minorities who ask for lowering of the franchise or for manhood suffrage, is to get adequate number of voters to counterbalance or outweigh the voting strength of the majority communities?—Yes, that is our idea.

266. In a separate electorate that question does not arise?—I think a great injustice is being done at present in denying to a certain number of people belonging to the backward and minority communities the right of voting. Rs. 32 limit is too high and it should be brought down to Rs. 16 at least.

267. So is it on the abstract question of justice and equity that you want that everyone should be enfranchised, or on the grounds of expediency and necessity that though you get separate electorates for yourself and also reservation of seats still you feel to be in a position of insecurity?—The latter.

268. Therefore you want adult suffrage in order to counterbalance or outweigh the voting strength of the majority community?—The point is this. Even if we get a separate electorate the voters at present are under the influence of the advanced classes such as the Brahmins and Sowcars. That is why we want the lowering of the franchise.

269. But if you still lower the franchise the ignorant and illiterate people will still be under the influence of the advanced classes. By lowering the franchise you increase the domain of the priestly classes and the very evil which you want to safeguard against will be intensified?—I do not think so, because it will create a sort of awakening amongst the masses and they will know their rights.

270. So it is only for the educative value that you recommend this?—Our idea is that the electorate should be as representative as possible.

271. In order to protect yourselves against the domain of Brahmins and other advanced classes you want to lower the franchise? My experience is that the lower the franchise is the people will be more under the influence of priests who invoke the sacred thread and gods and get the votes?—Not necessarily.

272. Sir Arthur Froom: There is one point arising out of a question put to you by the Chairman on which I am not quite clear. Would you agree that it is a reasonable calculation to estimate that the rents of houses and buildings in Bombay are twice what they are in Karachi?—I have not studied the conditions in Karachi, but I think that statement is true.

273. And perhaps they are three times as high in Bombay as they are in other mofussil towns?—Yes.

274. That being so, why do you suggest that for qualifications for voting, rents in Bombay should be reduced to the basis of Rs. 60, and you do not suggest that they should be reduced in Karachi or in other cities?—I do not say that the voting qualifications in Karachi and other places should not be reduced.

275. I thought you did not wish any lowering of the franchise except in Bombay, where you thought that the qualification should be reduced to a rent of Rs. 60 per annum?—Particularly in Bombay we want the franchise to be lowered. I do not have any objection to the lowering of the franchise in other places.

276. Chairman: But in your memorandum on page 62 you say, "The Committee do not propose any change in the case of either the major or the minor municipal boroughs, but in the case of the town of Bombay the Committee are of opinion that the franchise should be lowered so that all those who pay Rs. 5 as rent per month should be held entitled to vote." I gather you say that really you have not considered the Karachi case?—We have not considered the case of Karachi. We had only limited our attention to Bombay.

277. Sir Arthur Froom: I wanted to know whether you had any special consideration for Bombay in recommending a lower franchise as compared with other cities. Have you any particular object in view?—There are many labouring classes in Bombay who come from the Deccan and other agricultural districts.

278. You think the lowering of franchise in Bombay to a rental of Rs. 5 a month, or, in other words, Rs. 60 a year would bring in everybody who lives in Bombay?—Of course, that would enfranchise a large number of people.

279. Everybody in Bombay, I suppose, pays a rental of Rs. 5?

Dr. Ambedkar: The rent of the Bombay Improvement Trust chawls built before the war is less than Rs. 5. It may be Rs. 4.

280. Sir Arthur Froom: There is only one other point on which I should like to get your opinion. You have given in this book your views on the future constitution of the Provincial Government. Have you any views on the future constitution of the Central Government? Do you think it should change or remain as it is?—Yes, we have some suggestions, though those suggestions are not embodied in this Memorandum. We think that Dominion Status ought to be given to India as a whole and the Provinces should be made autonomous.

281. Lord Burnham: Why are those views not embodied in this book?—We were considering there only the conditions of the Deccan and Karnatic. But we are authorised to state that, with regard to the Central Government, Dominion Status should be given and the Provinces should be made autonomous.

Mr. GANGAJIRAO MUKUNDRAO KALBHOR and Mr. GHORPADO, B.Sc., called and examined (on behalf of the All-India Mahratta League).

282. Chairman: I understand from your Memorandum that your view is rather that you would not like to see the seats reserved for Mahrattas given up?—(Mr. Kalbhor): Yes.

283. You wish to retain reservation of seats for Mahrattas?—Yes.

284. I think that you suggest that the number of seats reserved to Mahrattas should be increased?—Yes.

285. To what number do you want it to be increased?—It should be increased according to the population of the Mahrattas.

286. Do you mean to say that you have got to find out the total strength of the population and then increase the number of seats of the Mahrattas in the same proportion?—Yes.

287. I think you are a member of the Legislative Council, representing the Poona district rural?—Yes. I was member of the Legislative Council for the last six years.

288. Mr. Ghorpade is a landowner?—Yes, from the Satara district.

289. Do I understand that you suggest that you should group the communities here and have communal electorates for Brahmins, for Mahrattas, for untouchables and for the rest?—Yes.

290. That is following the same general scheme as we have already examined this morning. I think there is no other distinct point which you would like to mention. These are your main points?—Yes.

291. Rao Sahib Patil: I think you would not have submitted a Memorandum to the Statutory Commission had there been no agitation on the part of the non-Mahrattas for separate seats?—Yes.

292. So if the non-Mahrattas have no objection to unite with the Mahrattas in promoting the interests of the backward classes, you have no objection to have a general constituency?—I have no objection; but the existing number of seats should be increased, so that the Mahrattas will get proper representation on the Legislative Council.

293. May I take it that you want to have an adequate representation of the backward classes in proportion to their population?—Yes.

294. And if you get that adequate representation for the Mahrattas and allied castes you are quite satisfied?—Yes.

295. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I see from your Memorandum that you want to abolish the Privy Council?—(Mr. Ghorpade): Yes.

296. You want to establish a Central High Court, by which you mean a Supreme Court?—Yes.

297. You do not want to have bi-cameral legislature. You want to abolish the Council of State?—Yes.

298. And you want the Viceroy to have the power of veto and certification?—Yes.

299. Having abolished the bi-cameral legislature, you say that the Central Legislature should not be authorised to legislate any discriminatory act against any foreigner or any foreign interest. Under the existing Government of India Act the Central Legislature has got the power to legislate for all persons and places. Now, do you want to put a curb on this power of the Legislature?—Yes, as far as discriminatory legislation is concerned.

300. Then who will legislate in respect of the excluded subjects?—The Central Legislative body should be authorised to pass all legislation. But if a foreigner thinks that his interests are in danger then he should have the right to appeal to the Central High Court and test the legality of that particular legislation.

301. Therefore, you want to give the Central Legislature plenary power subject to an appeal to the supreme tribunal; that is what you mean?—Yes.

302. You have stated here that the surpluses of the Central Government should be redistributed amongst the provinces. But what about the general taxpayer? Would you not give relief to the general taxpayer who contributes to the central revenue? Supposing he has been more than normally taxed and there is a surplus, you will certainly like a reduction of taxation, will you not?—I do not want that the general taxpayer in one Province should be benefited.

303. If the general taxpayer pays more than what the Central Government is entitled to, is it not fair to pay him back the excess or the surplus which has been extracted from him rather than redistribute it among the provinces?—I do not follow you.

304. I suppose the first charge on the surplus must be the general taxpayer. The Central Government, when they have got surpluses, must consider whether the people have not been overtaxed, and consequently the reduction of taxation should be the first question that they must consider when they have surpluses, and they should not automatically redistribute them among the provinces?—The taxpayer, of course, will be the main person who will be recipient of the surplus. Whether it is given through the provinces or in any other way it would make little difference so long as the taxpayer gets the relief.

305. Major Attlee: You wish that India should be divided on a linguistic basis. Have you made any detailed proposal for the part you are inhabiting?—The Mahratta-speaking part is divided into many groups even in British India, leaving aside the native States for the moment. I should like that all these parts in British India should be grouped into one.

306. You mean part of the Central Provinces and part of the Bombay Presidency should be combined?—Yes.

307. Has your organisation considered that question in detail, with regard to finances and so on?—No, we have not.

308. Just a general vague idea?—Yes, in a way it is vague.

A Note by the Honourable Mr. A. M. K. DEHLVI, Barrister-at-Law (President, Bombay Legislative Council), to the Statutory Commission, on Separate Electorates and Reservation of Seats.

Nothing in this note should be construed to imply that I am not entirely at one with the all-India demand for complete autonomy and responsible government; and I understand the great object of the Commission is to inquire, in terms of the Government of India Act and the Royal Proclamation of 1919, as to what steps towards further reforms be taken. That mainly involves the question of the introduction of greater element of responsibility in Government, and the truly representative character in legislation, making the executive responsible to the popularly elected legislature; and, further, giving to the legislature full powers which characterise modern constitutions. I, however, am strongly of opinion that nothing in this direction can be achieved in the best interest of India and the Crown unless and until —never for a moment losing sight of the enormity and diversity of interests, some of which, unfortunately, may remain eternally conflicting—the communal question receives the utmost statesmanlike considerations which the situation in India demands. In fact, the Indian problem, and, if I may say so, the problem for the Commission to solve, is the problem of the minority—and, indeed, the major minority, I mean the Muslim minority. I am not going counter to the legitimate demand for full responsible government when I state that political development of the country should and can only be on lines which, while ensuring the administration of India by Indians, and for Indians, would not allow any one section of Indian citzens to exploit the other, and trample under foot their just and legitimate rights. I think I am right in thinking that any constitution framed without regard to this all-important factor, allowing for a contingency of the kind I refer to to arise, would be against all accepted canons of democracy and representative government. For, is it not an accepted principle that the legisature must reflect in its composition the political temperature of the country for the time being. And for that reason alone, if not for any other reasons, every interest and every section or community must necessarily have equal opportunity and equal franchise with reference to the economic condition of every community. Circumstances and conditions prevailing in India do not permit of applying political theories which might be in consonance with, and might therefore find favour in certain circles, the conditions prevailing in the place of their origin. They will generally be found to have little bearing or reference to life and conditions in this huge continent of ours. It should also be conceded that political principles are evolved out of practical life and varying conditions prevalent in different countries. Unfortunately, the social and political conditions in this country, the deplorable communal mistrust and tension of feeling, with its not infrequent tragic outburst and developments, make it the first duty of the Commission to examine the situation and make special provision for it, without being biased by preconceived political theories and ideals.

Now, among the minority communities, Muslims, as I have stated, form the major and the most important minority. Their widely different cultures, religious beliefs and interests require effective safeguards. Together with a careful study of their history (and even in recent times before the advent of the British in India), and traditions as a nation, must be studied and examined, their economic conditions, their indebtedness, their acknowledged backwardness in education, their utter want of organisation, the communal differences, and, above all, the fact that practically trade, commerce, banking and the press of the whole country is controlled, owned and influenced by the majority community. Referring to the press, I may appropriately state here that in this Presidency, excluding Sind, there are about 181 papers controlled by the majority community and only 23 by the Muslim community, the figures of Sind being 32 Hindu and 11 Muslim papers, although the latter is the majority community there. A further classification of these figures will be found interesting. The Presidency proper is divided into three divisions comprising about 20 districts. The total area in square miles of these three divisions is very nearly double that of the whole of Sind; namely, 77,035 square miles. The Northern Division has an area of roughly 14,000 square miles; the Central 38,000 square miles; while the Southern has 25,000 square miles. The population in the Northern Division is about 37 lakhs, in the Central 60 lakhs, and in the Southern 49 lakhs.

To begin with, there is no Muslim paper published in English. Out of the 23 Muslim papers, vernacular or anglo-vernacular, 12 are published in Bombay City, and the remaining 11 go to the credit of the various districts, namely, about four to the Northern Division, about six to the Central Division, and one to the Southern Division; whereas, the Hindu figures stand in prominence as follows:—

46 in the City of Bombay;
47 in the Northern Division;
54 in the Central Division;
34 in the Southern Division;

a large number of them being in English and practically all the vernacular languages.

These factors make safeguards for the Muslims absolutely necessary. If you ask me what those safeguards should be, I may mention a few as indispensable:—

(1) Provision in the fundamental laws of the country;
(2) Adequate and effective voice to the Muslims in the matter of change of constitution;
(3) Unhampered opportunity and facility to send their true representatives to the Legislatures who would voice the true opinions and feelings of the Muslim community.

And for the purposes of the above safeguard (3), the Muslims must claim and maintain, especially in the light of the drawbacks and handicaps specified above, under which the community is suffering terribly, separate representation and separate electorates, until and unless at some future period conditions in the country and experience justify alteration of this safeguard.

Much has been said and magnified in behalf of some far-reaching advantages of joint or mixed electorates. But I must confess that I have seen nothing convincing advanced to justify the change suggested, except that it would result in the ultimate annihilation of the Muslim individuality. Although for practical purposes the Muslims, as compared to other castes and creeds may be called a community, but if the conditions prevailing even on the Continent of Europe, of a conglomeration of smaller communities than ours, which stand out as full-fledged nations in their own right, are a reality, the Muslims in India are a nation by culture and tradition (second to none in the world) and even number, having a population of over 70 millions, which, I think, is bigger than that of Great Britain and that of France, and has an advantage even over the entire German nation. To deny that would be tantamount to denying the existence of a nation. And, as such, while co-existing with other major communities or nations, the Muslims can legitimately claim to maintain their distinct individuality in the matter of representation in the Legislatures and can in no way harm the general interests of the country. For, otherwise, we are right in our fear that we will have no representation at all, or hardly any, in Provinces where we are in a miserable minority. Moreover, mixed or joint electorates, wherever they have been tried so far, have been not only not encouraging, but justify our dread of them. I will quote specific examples to prove the case. Let us peep into the elections of the District Local Boards, for instance, in Bengal in 1927-28, where the Muslims are in a majority, and the election is joint and the suffrage is not adult, yet the Muslim majority is reduced in the elections to minority or equality.

Dacca:—

These figures will instantly show as to what will be the results of elections if the electorates were mixed or joint in this Presidency, where the Muslim population is, roughly, 8 or 9 per cent., excluding Sind. Even if Sind is not excluded, the elections and conditions prevailing there cannot affect us. The Muslim gain there cannot be an argument to the Muslim loss here. What they might gain there in Sind, like in the Punjab and Bengal, is no matter of gift to them. It is only what they are entitled to.

Again, without a separate electorate, the Muslim who might be sent as representatives of their community could in no sense represent the true opinions of that community, for the simple reason that their opinion will be governed by the majority of electors, who will be Hindus; who, in turn, will undoubtedly choose such Muslims as will reflect their opinions. What might happen, in case there is no separate electorate, can best be illustrated by the results of election for the Delhi constituency for 1927 for the Legislative Assembly. There was a tacit understanding that the Delhi seat would go by turn to a Hindu and a Muslim. It was the turn of a Muslim in 1927, and the candidate who offered himself was a Nationalist and a Swarajist nominee. That, however, did not prevent his elimination by the majority community, who voted on communal lines and elected a Hindu. If the Muslims, or, for the matter of that, any other minority community, do not secure any, or their legitimate representation, then, whatever else happens, the Government certainly cannot, by any logic, be said to be a representative Government and a responsible Government; that which is not representative must be admitted to be much more injurious than that which is not responsible. Even the Nehru Report admits that this right of proper participation cannot, in justice or logic, be denied to any part or section of the country. In this connection I cannot quote a more convincing instance than that of the great Nationalist leader, Pundit Moti Lal Nehru, with due deference to his high ideals and aspirations. It is a telling example of the attitude, not of the leader of a Hindu communalist group, but, as I have said, of the Nationalist Swarajist group, in the Assembly. On the occasion when the question of the introduction of reforms in the North-West Frontier Province came up it may be noted that the Pundit, while he had voted with his following for the introduction of reforms in Ajmer-Merwara, asked his party not to vote on the motion for introduction of reforms in the North-West Frontier Province on, what I cannot help saying, the flimsy ground that his party, standing for complete Swaraj, could not compromise its position by asking for the Frontier reforms. This instance, is, indeed, very instructive and illustrative of the dangers which minority interests may have to face.

The condition of other minorities, although they are claimed as Hindu minorities, proves the Muslim claim for separate electorates even the more forcibly. These Hindu minority communities in the South, I understand, are not allowed even to walk on the same road and drink water out of the same well. And, what is more inconceivable and appalling is that they are not allowed even to enter a British court, although they be parties to litigation. Evidence is given by them by shouting it out from outside the court. This is denying a right of citizenship, which is guaranteed by the British Government, to communities who are included in the generic term "Hindu." The position and the situation can be more easily imagined than described when the question of Muslims is considered. The natural anxiety of the Muslim for definite statutory safeguards at this great psychological juncture cannot in justice be turned down from any standpoint.

The greatest aim of joint or mixed electorates is said to be the merging of the various peoples which inhabit India into one nation, in spite of the admission in the Nehru Report that the Muslims esteem separate electorates to be a "valued privilege." If that great aim of creating a complete and harmonious nationhood in India were to be achieved by such a simple method and by a stroke of the pen, attempts of great apostles of the Greater Religion, like Buddha, Ramanuja, Nanak and Kabir, who came to expel bigotry and establish unity and brotherhood of man would not have failed even in the partial and the possible achievement of kneading the various Hindu sections into one nation. The problem of the minorities and the major Muslim minority is fully acknowledged also in the carefully considered and ably written document universally known as the Nehru Report. Referring to the problem of the minority, the Report acknowledges in one part that, although it does not desire to exaggerate it, it cannot get over the fact that "it has to be faced," and that all that the Report has done towards its solution is, after all, an "attempt," and it earnestly calls for "additions to" or "substitutions for" its recommendations in that behalf, to settle the problem of the minorities. It is further admitted that the recommendations of the Report can only have weight to the extent to which they may be "acceptable to all the principal parties concerned." It is conceded in the Report that the "only methods of giving a feeling of security are "safeguards and guarantees." The time, therefore, has not arrived when separate electorates or other such safeguards for the Muslim minority can be discarded without wantonly undermining the interests of such a major minority, and thereby creating eternal troubles for the future, rather than eliminating them. I, therefore, do not agree to the introduction of mixed electorates.

The next important question to be considered is the representation of the Muslim and other minorities, first, in the Provincial Legislatures, and, secondly, in the Central. That is to say, the question of reservation of Muslim seats in these two legislatures. The Nehru Report, which, I must confess, is a fair guide on the questions of inquiry before the Commission, deals with the whole question in Chapter III under five heads, four of which are:—

(1) Reservation of seats on population basis, both for majorities and minorities;
(2) Part reservation for majorities with freedom to contest other seats;
(3) Proportional representation;
(4) No reservation, but special safeguards in the constitution for educational and economic advance of backward communities.

The Report is not opposed to (2), except that it does not agree to applying it to Bengal and the Punjab, which is the crux of the whole question. As to (3), the Report opines that under the present circumstances in India it will not work, and recognises that difficulty as a considerable one. And as to (4), the Report admits that a unanimous acceptance of the proposal is not possible. And, as to (1), the recommendation is that in provinces other than Bengal and the Punjab, there should be reservation of seats for Muslim minorities on population basis with the right to contest additional seats, the same right being given to non-Muslims in the North-West Frontier and Baluchistan Provinces.

Take, first, the question of reservation of seats in provincial legislatures. The Lucknow Pact of 1916, which was adopted in principle and many details also by the Southborough Committee, has given certain number of seats to the various provinces. Referring to the Mahomedans, it provides for them in para. 4 of that Pact (giving Bombay one-third of the elected Indian members), because the Pact held that "adequate provision should be made for the representation of important minorities and the Mahomedans by election through special electorates on the provincial legislative councils." The conditions which weighed with the All-India leaders to accept and make that recommendation, as well as the grounds which convinced the framers of the existing constitution obtain in the country to a much greater degree to-day than they did then. For, one must blush to acknowledge the unfortunate and the most deplorable state of feelings rampant throughout the length and breadth of this great continent, between the two major communities, which has resulted in nothing short of mutual distrust and suspicion, and I think to a degree justifiable on either side. While meeting a pressing expediency the recommendation made and carried out did not at all deprive the Hindu community of its majority position.

One, therefore, cannot conscientiously suggest a safe departure from the present system of the Muslim representation and the reservation of seats in the provincial councils, although one cannot overlook the fact that the Punjab and Bengal have their special grievance in this connection.

The Nehru Report, while recommending reservation of seats for the Muslims on population basis—perhaps by way of a sop to make up for the weakness of the recommendation—presumes to compensate the Muslims by giving them a right to contest more than the number of seats reserved for them in proportion to their population. But what can this so-called concession amount to, in case of a community the percentage of which only ranges between 14 and 5 in the various provinces, and which is, further, so hopelessly diffused over the whole of each province, with the one single exception of a part of U. P.? The results can be easily imagined under these circumstances. The chances of securing a seat beyond the reserved number will, indeed, be nil. The case of the Mahomedans of the Presidency proper, whose proportion of population is about 8 or 9 per cent., becomes an important expediency for the examination of the Commission, particularly when Sind is excluded from consideration.

Now, to the question of reservation of seats in the Central Legislature. It is at present one-third of the total strength of the Assembly. The Nehru recommendation is one-fourth to the proportion of the population. The population is a little over one-fourth. So the margin of contention is very slight, although the one-third makes a world of difference as a safeguard to the minority, which, after all, does remain a minority even in the strength of one-third, and, therefore, does not harm the majority. But the one-third of the Muslims in the Central Legislature is an indispensable necessity, particularly if in the alteration of the constitution or other important subjects, and, in short, if in the distribution of power the Central Legislature secures a lion's share. I do not think this demand can be seriously contended, when such a contention will rightly lay a charge against eminent leaders of both sides of violating moral and legal obligations. It is a matter of no little surprise to find that the great leader of the Nationalist Swarajist Party, namely, Pundit Motilal Nehru, should have discarded considerations in this respect which he had, on more than one occasion, advocated in the history of this demand. Perhaps it is just as well that I showed how he has done so. That was settled and agreed to on all hands by a resolution in the Indian National Congress at its session held at Madras in December, 1927. As a matter of fact, even before that, in the Indian National Congress session of 1926 at Gauhati, its working committee was called upon to take immediate steps, in consultation with leaders on both sides, and submit proposals on questions of differences between the two communities. Consequent upon this, the Muslim leaders assembled at Delhi in March, 1927, and accepted the proposals negotiated with them for the reservation of one-third of the total number of seats in the Central Legislature. They also issued a manifesto to that effect. This Muslim manifesto was received with general satisfaction by all parties in the country. As a matter of fact, the one-third proportion was the original suggestion of the President of the Hindu Mahasabha made at its sitting in 1924. In short, when the All-India Congress Committee considered this question, a resolution to that effect was moved by Pundit Motilal Nehru himself, when he is reported to have said:—

> "Personally I am of the opinion that nothing better could have been proposed under the circumstances."

Dr. Moonje, also the President of the Hindu Mahasabha, "in the capacity of a representative of the Hindus," declared "I have no objection to the resolution." And Mr. Kelkar, another leader, while supporting the resolution, said his "conscience was clear in the matter." Mr. Jayakar "very willingly" accepted and supported the resolution. Dr. Ansari, in an interview in the Bombay Chronicle of 27th May, 1927, characterised it as "very honest and equitable." The agreement, therefore, of the one-third proportion was arrived at with the fullest consent and approval of all parties, and was as solemn as it was binding on all the parties. It is, therefore, now breaking of solemn pledges to go back upon it. Finally, the Indian National Congress formally confirmed the agreement at Madras, the Sikh members associating themselves with it.

Rightly or wrongly, as I have said—and that does not take away from the stern facts as they stand to-day in the country—the Mussulman minority in general entertains grave doubts about the political sense of responsibility of the huge majority, which commands all the power that can arise out of wealth, number, organisation and education, which, unfortunately, the minority community lacks and will lack for a long time to come. I, therefore, join with the Muslim demand for the reservation of one-third representation in the Central Legislature.

Franchise.—Under the present Government, both for Provincial and Central Legislatures, the voting qualifications are determined by age, education and ownership of property, and thus the great masses, who form the major portion of India's population, are barred from taking any part in the constitution of the Government. To make the future Government of a more representative character it is essential that the general adult franchise should be adopted, and, if the present circumstances do not allow this, the property qualifications should at least be so relaxed as to cover a fairly large portion of the population to make the representation real in spirit. So far as Labour is concerned, every member of a registered trade union should be given the right of voting for Provincial and Central Legislatures. The "Achhoot" (untouchables) organisations should also be favoured with this right. The tenant should also be given a vote when his landlord has got one. Women aged 35, and those educated up to a certain standard and not less than 22 years of age should also be given the right of voting.

Electorate.—Joint electorate should be introduced with multiple transferable vote, but the allotment of seats should be fixed according to the proportion of the census of each community. One-fourth of the total seats should be reserved for labour (half by nomination to be made by labour organisations) and the other half by election in special constituencies created for the purpose. The daily increase and representative character of labour and the great part it is playing for the economic welfare of the country requires that it should be given hand in the administration of the country, so as to remove all possibilities of having any future trouble of Capital and Labour.

With this view in mind it is suggested that one-fourth of the total seats of Provincial and Central Legislatures should be allotted to the various interests under the main head "Labour," half of them to be elected by the members of the registered trade union by means of special constituencies created for this purpose and the other half to be nominated by the Government in consultation with labour organisations, whether registered or not.

It may not be out of place to mention here that the special constituencies at present maintained under heads Landlords, Industries, Chamber of Commerce, and like are always represented by Capital, and, as such, should be altogether abolished, because Capital has all the chances of being represented in the general constituencies, while Labour has no such chance.

Labour Ministry.—The potentialities of labour are being recognised all over the world; it is essential that its interests should be adequately safeguarded by the appointment of a separate Labour Minister in each Province, so to be nominated by the Governor along with other Ministers having the unanimous support and confidence of all the Legislatures, whether elected or nominated. He should be in charge of all matters relating to the welfare of labour, peasantry and untouchables, their education, health and sanitation, and should see to the proper operation of all laws touching the interest of Labour, such as the Trade Union Act, Workmen's Compensation Act, The Trades Dispute Act, Women Welfare Act, Factories Act, Unemployment Act, Old Age Pensions Act, etc., and should from time to time introduce in Councils such enactments as are deemed necessary for uplifting the cause of labour, peasantry and untouchables. In the Central Government a Labour Member should discharge all such functions in All-India subjects.

Indian States.—There should be Labour Commissioners appointed by H.E. the Viceroy and the Governor-General in Council to co-operate with the Agent to the Governor-General for Native States with a view to see that all enactments made in British India about the welfare of labour, etc., are brought into operation in the native States.

Central Government.—The subjects which are now being dealt with by the Central Government, like railways, posts and telegraphs, Customs and marines, should be represented by Labour Members in the Central Legislature elected by the labour employed in such departments through their registered trade unions. Special constituencies should be created for this purpose, and in case this is not feasible at present such members should be nominated on the recommendations of registered trade unions.

Court of Arbitration.—In each Province a Court of Arbitration should be appointed with a tribunal consisting of three representatives of the Labour, three of the Capital, two from the Government, and two from the public. They should elect their President from amongst themselves. In case of disputes between Labour and Capital not being settled within two months' time the tribunal shall have the right of interfering in the matter and giving a final award on the case binding on all parties.

Labour Employed by Government.—Employees should be given equal partnership in the management, control, direction and finance of the department concerned through their representatives nominated by their registered trade unions.

Free Education.—It should be made obligatory on employers to open day and night schools and colleges, at their own expense, according to the requirements of the labour. Such schools should give technical training of the industry in which the labour is employed. Such education should be compulsory and free of charge for labour classes.

Stability of Service.— No such agreement made by the Secretary of State for India on one side and the employees on the other should be valid if it provides any term or terms regarding the discharge or dismissal of any employee on any pretence of a month's notice or incapability, except that he is convicted for fraud, etc., by a competent court of law.

Living Wage.—Living wage should be ascertained by the Labour Minister and no one should be paid less than such wage.

Minimum Wage.—There should be some proportion fixed between the minimum and maximum wage.

Old Age Pension.—Government or local bodies should be compelled by legislation to make arrangements for payment of an old age pension to those who are above 60 years of age.

Peasantry.—The waste lands under Government, even after irrigation, should not be sold but given gratis or on nominal value to those only who pledge to cultivate such lands personally for their own benefit, and such agriculturists should be provided by Government with improved agricultural implements on co-operative basis.

Secretary of State.—Office of the Secretary of State should be abolished and the India should have direct dealing with the Parliament through Colonial Office.

Upper House.—No upper house should be created.

Local Bodies.—The revenues of the local bodies should be supplanted by as much good grant as possible to cope with the expenses of health, sanitation, education, etc.

Provincial Government.—There should be no "Reserved Subjects" in Provincial Governments, and Provincial autonomy should be granted, with the formation of Government on Federal system.

* The Board has since been registered under the name of the "Central Labour Federation, Punjab."

Executive.—Executives should be responsible to the Legislature. All Budget demands should be votable. Governor-General in Council should be the head of the Executives without any power of veto in matters dealt with by the Legislatures, excepting those matters which relate to foreign affairs and defence of India. No contribution should be made from Provincial Governments to the Central Government.

Judiciary.—Judiciary should be separated from the Executive.

Nationalisation of Industry.—All heavy industries should be nationalised.

Indianisation of Services.—All services should be Indianised, and only technical experts are to be imported from foreign countries when such are not available here.

Oral Evidence.—Mr. M. A. Khan will appear to give oral evidence before the Commission if necessary.

Lahore, dated 1st June, 1928.

LAHORE.

Dated 3rd November, 1928.

PRESENT:

ALL MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT COLONEL LANE-FOX), OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND AND RAJA NAWAB ALI KHAN), AND OF THE PUNJAB PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Central Labour Board, Punjab (Mr. M. A. KHAN, President, and Messrs. S. D. HASSAN and M. D. AKHTAR).

325. Chairman: You say, Mr. Khan, that your memorandum is on behalf of the Central Labour Board, Punjab, Lahore. What I should like you to tell us first of all is how do you come to be a separate body such as you are? When did it happen, and what did happen? Whom do you represent besides yourself?—We represent the General Workers' Union, North-Western Railway, registered under the Indian Trades Unions Act.

326. Is there no other body representing the organised labour of the North-Western Railway but yours?—The Board represents, in addition to this body, the Tonga Workers' Union, registered under the Indian Trades Unions Act, and the Motor Drivers' Union, also registered under the Indian Trades Unions Act.

327. So your Board claims to represent three unions?—These are the registered bodies, sir. There is one other union, the Mechanical Engineers' Union; that is also registered under the Indian Trades Unions Act.

328. Is the Central Labour Board itself registered? —The documents have been filed since the last four months.

329. That is not quite an answer to my question. I am asking whether the Central Labour Board itself is registered?—No, sir. It is under the process of registration.

330. You have applied for registration?—Yes, sir; we have applied for registration.

331. Mr. Hartshorn: May I ask you, Mr. Khan, whether the Central Labour Board is affiliated to the All-India Trade Union Congress?—No, sir.

332. Does the Central Labour Board confine its activities entirely to the industrial side of labour, or is it in any way associated with the political movement?—No, sir, it is purely a trade union.

333. And you are not affiliated to the Trade Union Congress?—No, sir. None of the unions in this Board is affiliated to the Trade Union Congress.

334. Have you as officials of this union submitted the contents of this memorandum that you have submitted to the Commission to the membership of your trade union?—Yes, sir. It is in this way, that we who are the chief workers of different unions combined ourselves into this body and we have submitted this memorandum in consultation with our bodies as well.

335. You say that you submitted this document to the membership?—Yes, sir, with the consent of our members.

336. They considered it and they approved?—Yes, sir.

337. And they approved of the propositions contained in this document?—Yes.

338. I notice your first paragraph deals with the franchise, and you say that the village masses are barred from taking any part in Government because of the high franchise, and therefore you suggest that in order that representation should be made effective the franchise should be lowered?—Yes, sir.

339. Either it should be made universal, or, if that is not practicable, you say it should be lowered?—Yes.

340. What you refer to here is: "To cover a fairly large portion of the population, to make the representation real in spirit." What qualification do you think would bring about that result?—Every member of a registered trade union, every member of an "Achhoot" (Untouchables) organisation, every member who is a tenant himself, every member——

341 Excuse me. Apart from all these special considerations, you say that the property qualifications should be lowered. And what I would like to know is have you any particular property qualification in view, or what is the figure that you think would accomplish the end you have in view?—That is in the case of property owners, the property qualifications should be lowered.

342. To what point?—I think it should be lowered at least to half of the present one. But in the case of trade unions and the "Achhoot" organisations and tenants, every one as a member of these organisations should have a right of voting as such.

343. You contend that membership of a trade union should in itself constitute a right to vote?—Yes, sir. As the bodies are registered now, a register is maintained and they are properly on the register. So they may be allowed to vote just as the managing directors and company shareholders were previously allowed votes in industrial constituencies simply because they were members of certain companies. So we request that hereafter proper members shown in the register may be given a chance of voting.

344. Could you give the figure of membership of the Central Labour Board?—I should say, sir, that the proper registered membership at present would not be more than eighteen to twenty thousand.

345. And that is not confined to Lahore, that is, to the Punjab?—At present it is mostly confined to Lahore. In the case of the labour union the members belong to out-stations also, viz., Ambala, Ludhiana, Karachi, Peshawar, and certain other stations.

346. Apart from the railway workers, are there any other trade unions' members outside of Lahore?—There are organisations, sir, but they are not registered. They are under the process of registration, and I expect by the time the Reforms come there may be a good number of unions outside Lahore.

347. In any case you contend that membership of trade unions should carry with it the right of the franchise?—That is my request.

348. Chairman: I am not quite clear about that point. Do you mean that instead of a member or members being nominated as at present they should be elected, and that they should be elected by the members of trade unions? Is that what you mean?—Yes, Sir; that is what I requested, that special constituencies for trade unions may be created in the reformed Government.

349. Mr. Hartshorn: That comes under the next paragraph. But dealing with the franchise you say that "So far as labour is concerned, every member of a registered trade union should be given the right of voting for Provincial and Central Legislatures"?—Quite so, Sir.

350. On the question of franchise I understand your position is that, if a member belongs to a trade union, regardless of whether he is qualified under the ordinary regulations or not, he, as a member of the trade union, should have a vote?—Yes, that is what I mean.

351. Chairman: In a general constituency?—In every constituency. That is in connection with the lowering of the franchise and in case adult franchise is not granted.

352. Mr. Hartshorn: In the next paragraph you say, "Joint electorate should be introduced with multiple transferrable vote, but the allotment of seats should be fixed according to the proportion of the census of each community." What do you mean there by "each community"?—At present there is a division of Muslims, Hindus and so on, and what I say is that each of these communities should have its number of seats in proportion to its population according to the census, so that there may be no difficulty in ascertaining what each community wants. If Muslims are 56 per cent. of the population, let them have 56 per cent. of the seats and so on.

353. If each community has to have representation in proportion to its population, where are you going to get the seats you are asking to be reserved for labour?—Labour is a body which comprises every community and I think we should have a certain quota from that fixed up for each community.

354. You are suggesting that as far as labour is concerned, whatever is decided of any council, labour should have 25 per cent. of the representation?—Yes. Labour comprises in my view, three things—untouchables, labouring classes and tenants—and I suggest that 5 per cent. of the seats should go for untouchables, 7½ per cent. for tenants, and 12½ per cent. for labour.

355. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: You mean agricultural tenants?—Yes.

356. Mr. Hartshorn: You say 25 per cent. of the seats should be reserved for labour, half of which should be appointed by nomination?—If for these three classes special constituencies cannot be created, a certain number of them should be nominated on the recommendation of the organisations of these people.

357. Can you tell us the membership of the trade unions of India?—So far as the registered trade unions in India are concerned, the number does not exceed four or five lakhs. But if we also take the unregistered organisations into consideration, the number will be about a million. There are three and a-half lakhs of textile workers in the Bombay Presidency and there are jute workers in Calcutta, petroleum workers in Burma and mine workers in Dhanbad, etc. There is, again, the postal union which is a very big union, and in addition the railwaymen's union.

358. The figure contained in the report made by representatives of the British Trade Union Congress who came out some time ago is quite different?—Quite so. That does not include all the men.

359. They say that the membership of the Trade Union Congress is about 150,000, but that there are possibly 100,000 outside; that is very different from what you gave?—I think there are more outside. Recently we know that 1½ lakhs out of 3 lakhs of workers went on strike in Bombay.

360. I see that you propose that there should be in each Provincial Government a Minister for Labour?—Yes.

361. And you suggest that, in addition to the working of the Trade Union Act, Workmen's Compensation Act, and so on, the Minister of Labour should be responsible for the education, health and sanitation and a number of other things?—Yes.

362. Do you think you are not proposing to give one minister a pretty big job?—I think the ministers at present are given more work than this.

363. I see that you are advocating a Court of Arbitration, a living wage and a number of other very desirable things. But is there anything in the constitution at present which stands in the way of these reforms being accomplished if the people of India so desire? In other words, is it necessary that there should be any change in the constitution to bring about these reforms, or is it rather only necessary that there should be a change in the public opinion and the determination of the Indian people to accomplish these things at present?—I think the present Government will not do all these things. The present Government is not capable of doing these things.

364. What I mean is, have they not the power? Provided the Indian people determine it should be so, is it necessary to have any change in the constitution to bring about these reforms?—Yes, a change is needed. The present councils are composed of bourgeois and landlords and people of capitalistic views.

365. Chairman: Your view, I understand, is this: that if the franchise was lowered then these improvements which you mention here in general terms are more likely to be brought about because you think there will be a change in the political opinion of the elected members?—That will come about after twenty years even if you lower the franchise to-day. You know very well the history of England. When the franchise was lowered votes were sold for a bottle of whisky.

366. I hope that you will find it well to keep to your own subject, because we perhaps know more about England than you do. I was asking you a question about India. I was asking you whether your real meaning was not this, that you think that, unless the franchise is lowered, the political views expressed in the Punjab Council will not be favourable to those changes which you advocate, and so you want to have the franchise lowered?—That may be possible; but I want a safeguard in this direction to be recommended in your report.

367. Do you want the British Parliament to legislate?—I want the British Parliament to lay emphasis on this point and ask the Indian Government to look to these things.

368. Mr. Hartshorn: Do I understand you to say that it is necessary to call attention to the desirability of bringing about these reforms?—Yes.

369. Chairman: Have you any connection with the North-Western Railway Workmen's Union? Is it one union or two?—There are four unions, one is the audit portion, the second is the General Workers' Union, and the North-Western Railway Union is split into two.

370. When did the split occur which caused you to break off?—We split from the North-Western Railway Union in March, 1928.

371. Then it comes to this, the union you are speaking for came into existence in March of this year?—Yes.

372. Was there not a trade union of the North-Western Railway workers before March?—We all belonged to one body before March.

373. Does the other union, the older union, still exist?—Yes, it has already split into two again.

374. That makes three?—Yes.

375. How many workmen, wage earners, are there employed in the North-Western Railway works here in Lahore?—About 15,000.

376. How many of the 15,000 belong to your particular union?—Loco shops 1,500, carriage shops 1,000, sheds 250, interlocking 60.

377. It looks as though the number is something in the neighbourhood of 3,000?—Yes, in Lahore it is about 3,500.

378. The reason why I asked you is this, we gave out notice that anybody who sent us a Memorandum claiming to be representative must set out in the Memorandum how many people he represented and your Memorandum does not do it?—I am sorry we omitted it.

379. Major Attlee: Do you represent any particular section of the railway union, the less skilled workers or the skilled workers?—I represent the manual workers.

380. You do not represent the drivers?—I represent the drivers, as also the workmen, mechanics and engineers; but we do not represent the clerical staff at present, and that is for the reason that the recognition has been withheld by the authorities, and no sooner we get it they will also join.

381. Tell me how many members of your union have got votes for the Legislative Council?—I think it may be about 1 or 2 per cent. at the most.

382. How many of them have got votes for the Municipality of Lahore?—All of them.

383. Have you ever had a representative in the Lahore Municipality?—No, Sir.

384. Have you run a candidate?—I stood as a candidate, but the railway officers set up a candidate (a contractor) against me, and all the railway labour voted for him after having good meals.

385. How many members are there in the Motor Drivers' Union?—There are about 1,200 members.

386. Are they all in Lahore?—Mostly in Lahore.

387. Is your union centralised? Have you got branches outside?—We have got branches; one at Amritsar, one at Jullundur, at Ludhiana, at Saharanpur, Sukkur, Lyallpur and other stations, and there are branches at Karachi and Ghaziabad also.

388. Are these branches affiliated to the Central Labour Board?—Yes.

389. The Labour Board is a federal body and represents large unions?—Yes.

390. How many delegates represent each union on the Board? Is there any rule on the matter?—Yes, we have rules. Unions representing more than five thousand members have five seats and the others having a lesser number are given one seat each.

391. Are these delegates who represent the unions on the Board elected?—The unions send them down.

392. I want to know the form that the election takes place. Is that election done with the ballot paper?—No. Voting is done by show of hands.

393. Have your members had experience of voting?—Not yet.

394. Lord Strathcona: Among your members do many speak or read English?—Very few.

395. You told us that this document was referred to all the members and approved by them. How was it referred to them?—We translated in Urdu the demands contained in this Memoradum, which was drafted in our body and passed by the Central Board under a resolution.

396. Was the printed document referred to the members in Urdu?—It was written out in Urdu and copies were given to each member of the Board, who had to read them out and get their sanction.

397. Can you send for the use of the Conference an Urdu copy?—We have not got any; we never got it printed in Urdu, we got it printed only in English.

398. It was explained verbally to all your members?—We read the translated copy in Urdu; it was also published in vernacular papers and in Khawar, our own organ.

399. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: You have got at present at any rate one nominated member, in the Legislative Council, for Labour?—Yes.

400. I want to know whether any touch is maintained between the member who represents Labour and your board with regard to these matters?—Since he has been employed by the Nawab of Kazipur he is out of touch now, but previously he was in touch.

401. What are the scales of pay, if you can tell us, of drivers in the North-Western Railway?—Indian drivers have different scales of pay as compared with Europeans.

402. The average?—The average pay of an Indian driver is Rs. 45-50 a month.

403. Are there any European drivers who are members of your organisation?—Yes, we have some Europeans.

404. What is their pay?—Their rate of pay comes to about Rs. 350 to Rs. 400 a month on an average, including all emoluments.

405. With regard to the skilled workers in the workshop, mistries and other people, what would be the average pay of a mistry who is put over the heads of a few workmen in the workshop?—About Rs. 4 a day for twenty-six days in a month.

406. Are you aware that anybody who, in the city of Lahore for our present purposes, pays a rent of Rs. 8 per mensem for his dwelling-house or a portion of a house is entitled to become a voter for the Council?—Yes.

407. Do you mean to say that none of these persons, the European drivers and the Indian mistries and others, pays a house rent to the extent of Rs. 8?—I have already stated that their number is small; it is not more than 2 per cent.

408. What does an ordinary workman in the railway workshop get?—There are only very few who get more than Rs. 30 a month.

409. What is the average rent for two or three rooms rented by an ordinary labourer or workman in Lahore?—Eighty per cent. of the labourers in Lahore cannot afford to have a house on a rent of more than Rs. 3 or Rs 4 a month.

410. I understand that if the qualification were reduced to about Rs. 3 rental per mensem, almost every one of your members will be entitled to a vote?—I think if it were to be reduced to Rs. 2, as in the case of municipalities, every member will have a vote.

411. If it is reduced to Rs. 3 almost every member will have a vote?—Yes, nearly every member.

412. Mr. Owen Roberts: You said a European engine driver gets Rs. 350 to Rs. 400, including all emoluments, and you also said that an Indian driver gets Rs. 50?—The average is about Rs. 50.

413. What does he get, including all emoluments?—If we take all the Indian drivers together, the average will come to Rs. 50.

414. All the Europeans taken together the average is about Rs. 250?—Yes.

415. Are you aware of the number of labourers employed in agriculture?—I am not in a position to give you any definite idea about that.

416. You have no idea what proportion your union in the matter of labour represents to the total labour of the Punjab?—You mean the industrial labour or physical labour?

417. The principal labour is agriculture?—No, Sir. We have taken only industrial labour.

418. So you have excluded agriculture from your view?—I do not entirely exclude them because, after all, they are a class for which I have great sympathy and my organisation, too, covers them.

419. This memorandum is not submitted on behalf of that class?—No.

420. Dr. Narang: All the three gentlemen who form your deputation are Mahomedans?—Yes.

421. Have you not got Hindus and Sikhs in your organisation?—We have. But, unfortunately, we could not get them together since we were given notice only at one o'clock yesterday to form a deputation.

422. What is the percentage of non-Mahomedan membership in your union?—About 20 per cent.

423. Is it because you have asked for representation according to population that no Sikh or Hindu has joined your deputation to support this memorandum?—I think it is only fair that every community should have representation according to its population.

424. I do not want to know what your opinion is. I want to know whether it is not a fact that the non-Mahomedan members have not joined you because you are asking for representation in the Council in proportion to population?—No, it is not a fact.

425. What are the qualifications for membership of your union?—Any employee of the railway who is in the subordinate cadre can become a member.

426. No conditions of payment of any subscription?—Yes, he has to pay admission fee and subscription that is laid down in the rules.

427. You have mentioned about the multiple transferable vote. Do you understand what it means?—What I understand by that is this: In the case of a joint electorate, election is to be made both by Hindus and Mahomedans together. Supposing you have a constituency in which ten members are standing for election of whom two Hindus and two Mahomedans are to be elected. Now the man who has four votes in his hand may give all of them in favour of Hindus or in favour of Mahomedans or two for Hindus and two for Mahomedans, or divide them by giving one to each. After those votes are counted the four top men will be taken, two from Hindus and two from Mahomedans, that is the number allotted for each community.

428. You have mentioned on page 80 of your memorandum that you want industries to be nationalised?—Yes.

429. Do you not want the land also to be nationalised, to become the property of the State to be given to people who are fit to cultivate it?—Ultimately we will require that.

430. Why not now?—Do it now, if you want.

431. I see you have said in this memorandum that "The waste lands under Government, even after irrigation, should not be sold, but given gratis * * * ." You say you want industries to be nationalised wholesale, but for land you want to wait?—I will not mind if land is nationalised; I will be glad if it is done.

432. But why do you not like to add it here in your memorandum?—We are representing industrial labour.

433. Is not agriculture an industry in your definition? Can you carry on agriculture without land?—I have already answered that we represent only industrial labour.

434. Does not industrial labour include agricultural labourers?—It does, but at present we do not represent agriculture.

435. You lay emphasis on health, sanitation and education in your memorandum at the bottom of page 79. Would you insist on education being made free to relieve the burden of the labourer?—I will lay this burden on the employer.

436. Would you like it to be compulsory?—Yes, up to the primary stage and free throughout.

437. You have said that the employers should open schools at their own expense. Supposing the Government were to do it and make education free and also compulsory up to the primary stage, will it not meet the requirements?—I am here to express the view of labour; in this respect we have already stated in the memorandum what we feel in the matter.

438. Supposing I have got a small factory in which there are about fifty labourers. Your view is that I should open schools and colleges for such a small number of people and that the State should be relieved of this duty?—In that case you can join with another employer. What does the State mean?—They take money from you. Instead of the State doing it why can you yourself not do it?

439. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Do you know how many Sikh members are on your Central Board?—None.

440. Was a special meeting of all the members of your board called for considering this valuable memorandum that you have submitted to the Conference?—Whatever members we had on our board they were called together and they considered it.

441. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: What does an ordinary motor-driver earn per mensem on an average?—I should think it is about Rs. 35-40.

442. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You said this Central Board was started, if I understood you rightly, in March, 1925, but it has not been yet registered.—The papers for registration are with the registrar for the last four months.

443. Chairman: Why were the papers for registration sent only four months back?—The Trade Unions Act was applied to this province only at the end of 1927, sir.

444. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Have you got any rules for the guidance of your board?—We have.

445. Have you got a copy of rules?—I am sorry, I have not brought it.

446. Is it in print?—Yes.

447. When was it printed?—Just before we filed the papers for registration with the registrar.

448. Is it because, under the Trade Unions Act you have to send the rules to the registrar before the union could be registered, that you have framed the rules?—No. We had rules previously, but they were revised and printed before submission to the registrar.

449. You are a paid member, Mr. Khan?—I am not paid by the Labour Board, but I am paid by the General Workers' Union, North-Western Railway.

450. What is your designation?—General Secretary.

451. For how long have you been general secretary?—I am the general secretary of the union since its inception, from 1920, I am in the railway labour field as a general secretary of different organisations who have been changing their names.

452. So you have been changing the names from time to time and one cannot identify any organisation. As regards this Central Board, do you hold any meetings?—We hold meetings once a month.

453. How many meetings have you so far held?—Since we filed the papers with the registrar we have held about six or seven meetings.

454. Do you keep proceedings of these meetings in a minute book?—Yes.

455. Are the proceedings circulated to the members of the Labour Board for information?—No; if they want they read them.

456. How many attend these meetings?—Usually seven or eight.

457. Now I wish to ask you, Mr. Khan, who are these seven or eight members who attend?—Out of these seven, five or six are representatives of trade unions and the remaining are those who sympathise with labour.

458. That is to say, out of the seven members who have attended your meetings two of them are merely sympathisers and only five or six belong to real trade unions. Will you please tell me when this draft memorandum was submitted to this Labour Board? Was it at a meeting attended by five men?—I have already explained that we circulated the memorandum amongst the masses, it was read before different meetings and was published in vernacular papers before the Board submitted it to the Conference.

459. Let us go step by step. Seven members were present at the meeting, of whom five members represented trade unions and two were sympathisers. The next step you took was to circulate it to the unions. How many copies were circulated?—One copy of Urdu manuscript was given to each of them.

460. How many copies went out?—Ten copies were circulated.

461. Can you tell me how many members read this?—I have already stated that it was explained to the members in open meetings of these trade unions.

462. You yourself have said that five members attended the meeting. Out of the five, three of you are here and there are only two more missing now? —This is not a union but a board.

463. Have you got any funds to keep this Board going?—We get from all the unions a certain fee according to our regulations.

464. How much money have you got?—We have got Rs. 40 or Rs. 50 in the bank.

465. When was it paid last?—That came to the bank in the month of March.

466. How much out of that Rs. 40 have you spent? —Rs. 40 is the balance. We got Rs. 200 in March.

467. Is it a fact that you got Rs. 200 by levying subscriptions from various people?—Yes, from different organisations and also by donations.

468. Do you keep accounts?—Yes, because we have to send them to the registrar.

469. Have you got the accounts here?—I have not got any accounts here. We will have to send them to the auditor.

Memorandum submitted by PANDIT NANAK CHAND, B.A. (Punjab), M.A. (Oxon.), Barrister-at-Law, Advocate, High Court of Judicature at Lahore; Member, the Punjab Legislative Council (Hoshiarpur, non-Muhammedan Rural); Secretary and Whip of the National Reform Party of the Punjab Council; Fellow of the University of the Punjab; and President, Punjab National Democratic League, Lahore.

CHAPTER I.

The Punjab Problem.

The Punjab offers a very complex and complicated problem to the political thinker and statesman. Politicians outside the Punjab have called this Province the Ulster of India, a communal Province, and various other names have been given to it. The Punjab Council has been condemned as a reactionary body inasmuch as, according to these politicians, it has betrayed India by co-operating with the Simon Commission. Certain politicians have gone so far as to dub the members of the Council as traitors, job-seekers, and place-hunters. These attacks notwithstanding, the members of the Punjab Council have stood firm in their resolve to place full material before the Commission for their consideration in the firm conviction that thereby they are rendering real service to their own Province in particular and to India in general. The fact of the matter is that the formula of the politicians for reconciling the conflict of interests between the majorities and minorities does not apply to Punjab conditions. The Punjab contains three powerful religious communities, namely, the Mahomedans, the Hindus and the Sikhs. Moreover, here in the Punjab are statute-created privileged castes enjoying favours based upon birth. Here in the Punjab you find the Government bent upon conferring still greater privileges upon these favoured classes. The Punjab, therefore, presents problems which do not exist in other provinces. The politicians in India and the Government of this country have alike shown little keenness to study them in all their bearings. It is all the more necessary, therefore, that we who, on account of our closer connection, are in a better position to get at the reality make an humble effort to understand the Punjab problem and place our study of the situation before the Commission and the people at large.

1. The Punjab is the home of three religious communities, as stated already. The Mahomedans are in a majority. They are 55 per cent. of the total population. They are rich and powerful and not a backward community as the Mahomedans in some other provinces are considered to be. They are the largest owners of land and are strong, virile and communally better organised than the other communities. The introduction of the communal principle in our present constitution has further strengthened their position and has whetted their communal appetite for establishing the rule of their own community in all spheres of public life, whether political, economic or educational.

Next in numerical strength come the Hindus, who form about 32 per cent. of the total population. You cannot afford to ignore them. In spite of the repeated efforts of the dominant community to stifle them, they have succeeded in making their voice heard in the Council and other spheres of public activity.

The Sikhs, though only 11 per cent. of the population, have shown what religious zeal, enthusiasm and tenacity of purpose can accomplish. They successfully carried on a very powerful and well-organised propaganda for securing reform in their religious institutions. Their remarkable spirit of sacrifice and infinite capacity for suffering have extorted admiration from even their enemies. They are not prepared to submit to the domination of any religious community in the Punjab, especially when it is remembered that they were the rulers of the land only a few decades ago. They have, though in a minority, boldly proclaimed themselves against the principle of communal or religious representation, but when the Mahomedans claim majority of seats in the Council and services on the population basis the Sikhs, on their part, claim the recognised right of the minorities to special concession for excessive representation. The demands of the Mahomedans, therefore, become impossible of reconciliation with the claims of the Sikhs.

2. Then there is the problem created by the Punjab Alienation of Land Act—an Act which is peculiar to this Province. This Act has divided the people of this Province on caste lines—a division that has since been gathering strength daily. It is a serious problem of a novel nature, demanding speedy solution.

3. The Punjab is almost a frontier province, and the policy of conceding any advanced measure of self-government or full responsible government must be very carefully considered and adopted with due safeguards. The problem of defence, therefore, needs most careful consideration. The policy of the Indian politicians and of the Government of India in conceding the system of religious representation to the Mahomedans of the Punjab has a direct bearing on the question of defence. The districts of the Punjab beyond the Ravi, stretching up to Afghanistan, contain population predominantly Mahomedan. Beyond these frontiers are Mahomedan independent States—Afghanistan, Persia, Arabia, and Turkey—fully alive to the situation in India, and always ready to take advantage of the political and religious disturbances in this Province. The question whether the communities, especially the Mahomedans, should be given further opportunity to organise themselves on a religious basis has, therefore, a very important bearing on the defence problem.

Under the circumstances explained above, it becomes extremely necessary to study the actual working of the reforms in the Punjab and to observe carefully the effect of the system of communal representation on the life of the Province, especially with reference to the life of the Hindu minority.

CHAPTER II.

Communal Representation and the Minorities.

The acceptance of the principle of communal representation and its application to our present constitution has led to communal tension and communal riots. I contend that the creation of communal electorates and the working of reforms on communal lines in the Punjab has been mainly responsible for Hindu and Muslim riots, resulting in destruction of property and loss of human lives, and further it has, in the Punjab, substituted British Cum Mahomedan rule in place of British rule.

Communal Representation Cannot be Claimed by Majorities.

It is recognised on all hands that the principle of communal representation was devised for the protection of minorities, and, indeed, it is admitted by the authors of the Montford Reforms that the majorities cannot claim communal representation. Under the Minto-Morley Reforms this principle of communal representation was not extended to the Punjab Council, and a perusal of the Montford Report shows that it would not have been applied to the Punjab had there been no Congress-League Pact, i.e., the Lucknow Pact of 1916.

Evils of Communal Representation.

The authors of the Montford Reforms have very forcibly pointed out the evils resulting from communal representation. They state, "Division by creed and classes means the creation of political camps organised against each other, and teaches men to think as partisans and not as citizens, and it is difficult to see how the change from this system to national representation is to occur."

It is certain that the illustrious statesmen responsible for the reforms would not have accepted this principle had their hands not been forced by the Congress and League Pact of 1916, and had not the Government of India backed up the demand of the Muslims for separate representation. The working of the reforms in the Punjab has fully justified the nervousness of Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford. The history of the Punjab for the last seven years amply shows that the worst fears of the authors of the present reforms have been fully realised in this regard.

Communal Electorates and their Results.

The creation of communal electorates under the present reforms is a baneful feature. The separation of the three communities in the Punjab into three water-tight compartments has divided the Province into three hostile groups. At the time of the three elections held so far there has always been a strong desire on the part of the candidates and their supporters to give communal colour to their speeches and election manifestos. This state of affairs has brought into prominence communal leaders who, in order to gain political importance and wield political power, inflame the religious passions of the ignorant voters and incite the people to murders and murderous assaults.

The communal newspapers, which owe their existence to the reforms, in order to secure extensive circulation and in order to make themselves popular with their respective communities, have been violently anti-national and hopelessly communal. The creation of communal electorates, therefore, has been instrumental in bringing to the forefront communal leaders and communal newspapers whose activities have threatened the peaceful and orderly life of this Province.

The Muslim Ministers Promote Communalism.

The Council, thus elected on the basis of religious divisions, has provided a fruitful soil for sowing the seeds of communal hatred and bitterness. It was in 1921 that Sir Fazl-i-Hussain was chosen to represent the Musalmans in the Cabinet, and L. Harkishan Lal to represent the Hindus, while the Sikhs were represented by S. Sunder Singh Majithia, who was then made the Revenue Member. Mahatma Gandhi, at this time, was successfully leading the non-co-operation movement, in which the Hindus, Musalmans and the Sikhs joined. It is clear that the Muslim Minister wanted a party for his support, and he set about to form one.

Muslim Minister Extends the Principle of Communal Representation beyond its Original Scope.

Sir Fazl-i-Hussain entered upon a policy of creating communal divisions in the Council. The principle of communal representation was extended beyond the limits originally intended to (a) the Public Services, (b) Municipalities, (c) Schools and Colleges. Public posts under the control of the Minister were filled by his Muslim nominees, and the non-Muslims already in Government service were superseded. In municipalities separate communal electorates were created, and it was sought to give preponderance to the Mussalmans in as many departments and municipal committees as possible. Admissions to schools and colleges were regulated on the basis of the candidate's religion.

Bitter Protests against his Doings.

This led to bitter protests from other communities against the policy of the Minister. In the first Council a vote of censure was moved against him, in which the Hindus and Sikhs joined. Hartals were organised by the Hindus to give expression to their feeling of resentment. On his reappointment as Minister, in the second Council, the Sikhs and Hindus, by way of protest, walked out of the Council Chamber at the time when the Governor came to deliver his opening speech. As a mark of extreme dissatisfaction with the action of the Muslim Minister in increasing the seats allotted to the Mahomedans in the Lahore Municipality, the Hindus boycotted the Committee for six years, notwithstanding the repeated efforts of the Government to break the boycott. In some other towns of the Punjab, also, the Municipalities were boycotted for similar reasons.

The Government Attitude Helpful to the Minister.

In all his activities, which had for their aim the benefiting of the Mahomedans at the expense of the Hindus, the Minister had the full approval of the Government. It was mainly with the assistance of the solid official bloc that Sir Fazl-i-Hussain succeeded in carrying his policy. The pages of the Government reports bear testimony to the fact that the Government was not wholly disinterested in strengthening the Mahomedan Minister's position. After Sir Fazl-i-Hussain, his successor, R. S. Ch. Chhotu Ram (at present a nominee of the Muslims on the Punjab Simon Committee and the leader of the Muslim Party, otherwise known as the Nationalist-Unionist Party) continued the policy of his predecessor, and was also instrumental in introducing further caste distinctions. The third Minister, M. Feroz Khan Noon, cannot afford to dispense with the help of the Muslim bloc, and, therefore, he also is compelled to follow a pro-Muslim communal policy, as is evidenced by his recent political activities in the matter of election to the Simon Committee and at the Mahomedan Educational Conference, held at Jullundur this year (May, 1928), where the actions of his colleague, the Hindu Minister, were criticised and condemned.

No Joint Responsibility in the Cabinet.

Under the circumstances there could not possibly be any joint responsibility of the Ministers. The Ministers of the minority communities either must submit to their Muslim colleague and help in injuring their own communities or must resign and make way for another Muslim Minister. The fact is that the responsibility of the Ministers has been individual and divided.

Council Mainly Divided on Communal Lines.

I have already referred to the efforts of Sir Fazl-i-Hussain to divide the Council on communal lines. The constitution of the Council and the Minister's policy, to befriend the Mahomedans, are mainly responsible for creating these divisions on religious lines. The Government Report of the Reforms Enquiry Committee, 1924, has the following remarks at page 10:—

> "The main criticism which is made against the departments administered as transferred subjects is that the Ministry of Education (Sir Fazl-i-Hussain) has subordinated the interests of his department to the support of the communal interests of the Mahomedans. It was not unreasonable that the Minister should attempt to secure definite opportunities to the community which constitutes his chief support in the Council."

Sir Fazl-i-Hussain succeeded in breaking the Hindu and Muslim alliance in the first Council and in organising the Mussalmans into a separate camp. In the Administration Report of 1921-22, page 28, we read:—

> "The composition of the House lends itself to the domination of the Mahomedan vote and we find that non-official Mahomedan members, with few exceptions, steadfastly support the Minister for Education (Mian Fazl-i-Hussain). This tendency is to some extent influenced by the question of communal representation, a subject which obtained considerable prominence in the proceedings of the Council."

In the second Council Sir Fazl-i-Hussain's party was definitely organised on communal lines, and included in its ranks all the Muslim members of the Council. In the Punjab Administration Report of 1923-24, we find, at page 2, under the heading "Growth of Party System":—

> "The Mahomedans in the Council were organised into a practically solid party of 35."

Parties in the Present Council.

In the third Council the division of the parties is also mainly on communal lines.

(1) The Mahomedan Party, consisting practically of all the Muslim members, calls itself the Nationalist-Unionist Party, and sometimes is termed by the Government as the Rural Party. With the exception of two Hindus, who in all matters vote and side with Mussalmans, there are no other communities represented in this party.

(2) The Hindu Party calls itself the National Reform Party, and is sometimes termed by its opponents as the Urban Party, though the majority of its members represent rural constituencies. This party has consistently opposed communal representation, and its programme is resolutely to oppose any further extension of this pernicious principle.

(3) The third party is the party of Sikh councillors.

(4) The fourth party, the Congress, Khilafat and Akali Party, calls itself the Nationalist Party. This party in almost all questions, and the Muslim Party in the majority of questions, form the opposition in the present Council. The so-called Nationalist Party comprises five Mahomedans, seven Sikhs, and two Hindus; but a study of the Council reports will show that on all communal questions the members move resolutions, deliver speeches and ask questions and vote as Hindus, Mussalmans and Sikhs. I am ready to substantiate this statement of mine by actual instances from the authorised reports of the Punjab debates.

Party System Impossible.

Thus it will be clear, that no such party system as prevails in countries where representative institutions flourish exists in this Province. Nor is there the slightest likelihood that such a system will ever come into existence so long as communal representation and separate religious electorates continue.

The activities of the majority of members in the Council or outside it have been largely influenced by communal feelings and considerations. The atmosphere in the Punjab has been steadily going from bad to worse and innocent people have suffered because of this atmosphere. Since the introduction of the Reforms, frequent communal riots have disfigured the history of this Province.

Council Weak and Inefficient.

The Council thus divided on communal lines has been weak and inefficient. It has failed to take advantage of the opportunities opened out to it by the Reforms. The members have not been able to bring forward and carry through any beneficial legislation. Attempts have been made by the dominant community to sow the seeds of dissension between the minorities and to promote ill-will among the various classes and castes.

Officials Exploit these Differences.

The Government's share in this strife has been most unhappy. The official members have not failed to take advantage of this division, and in order to carry their demands, sometimes with the help of Muslims and sometimes with that of non-Muslims, have exploited these divisions. The members, whether Hindu or Muslim, whether rural or urban, have condemned such activities of the officials in no uncertain terms. R. S. Chaudhri Chhotu Ram on the 29th February, 1928, in his speech on the general discussion of the Budget, said: "While Government is prepared to ridicule the proposals put forward by non-official members, while it stoutly opposes any motion that is made by members in the interests of smallholders, Government itself is not prepared to put forward any alternative suggestion which might go to ameliorate the lot of the poor zamindar. So the situation seems to be hopeless. The Council in the first instance does not possess full powers, and in the second instance it is weak and divided (hear, hear). Government takes advantage of the weakness and divided character of the Council and it can afford to ridicule any suggestion, however reasonable and however just (hear, hear)." Members of other parties have also used similar expressions on more than one occasion.

This unhappy state of affairs can only be ended if the system of communal representation is abandoned, if the division by religious communities finds no place in the new constitution. There is no justification for retaining this system in the Punjab where the minorities, i.e., the Hindus, the Sikhs and the Christians in the clearest possible terms have condemned it and earnestly seek its abolition.

CHAPTER III.

Rural Party v. Urban Party.

I have already stated that the Council is mainly divided on communal lines, but it is claimed by Government that communal divisions are giving way to divisions based upon economic interests, and that there has come into being the Rural Party as opposed to the Urban Party. This claim on the part of Government is without foundation. It represents their desire rather than the actual facts. I contend there are no such parties as rural and urban, and further that no such division is possible under the existing conditions.

There are seven Hindus, five Muslims and one Sikh, representing 13 urban constituencies, and if you add to this number the member representing "Industries" there are 14 members in all. These 14 members have never formed a party as against the other members representing agricultural or rural interests. Moreover, such a party could not possibly work effectively either in supporting or opposing the Government.

Government's Aim to Create Parties on the Basis of Caste.

The real object of the efforts on the part of the Government and the Mahomedan Minister has been to divide the Council (in reality to divide the Hindus and the Sikhs) on caste lines, in other words, on the basis of privileged castes created by the Alienation of Land Act, and non-privileged castes on whom disabilities regarding the purchase of land have been imposed by this Act.

Government's Desire Intelligible.

The desire of the Government to give an economic and political aspect to the parties is intelligible. Muslim and non-Muslim disputes have tended to lower the prestige of the Government. They have led to very violent disturbances. Life and property have become unsafe. Government which prizes prestige so much has been the sufferer along with the minority communities. The idea is steadily gaining ground that Government is unable to take efficient steps to prevent riots, and loss of human lives and destruction of property which come in their train. Therefore, it has been anxious to see the Council divided on the so-called Rural or Urban lines. The Punjab Alienation of Land Act, which is described in Government reports as the "Magna Charta of the Zamindars," furnishes to the Government a ready instrument for giving effect to these wishes.

Government's Efforts to Creat a Rural Party.

In the second Council, therefore, the Government took the initial step to carry out its desire. It appointed, first, Chaudhri Lal Chand, an "Agriculturist" and a lawyer belonging to one of the privileged castes, to fill the post of the Hindu Minister, though he had only a following of four members. And when Chaudhri Lal Chand was unseated his place was given to Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram with the same small following of four members. These appointments were sought to be justified on the ground of the two Chaudhries representing "Rural" interests, though both were lawyers by profession, and are in every sense of the term "Urban." This marks the beginning of a definite attempt on the part of the Government to create the so-called rural party in the Punjab Council. The appointment of Ch. Chhotu Ram as Minister could not be justified on any constitutional principle and I contend that the real object was to divide the Hindus and the Sikhs on caste lines, as these communities were not in the good books of the Government at that time. Ch. Chhotu Ram and his followers tried their utmost to play the part marked out for them. Debates which were carried on in the Council by the so-called Zamindars and the resolutions which were moved by these Hindu "Rurals" failed, however, to change the established division of the Council on communal lines. The Administration Report for the years 1924-25 recognises this fact in these words—"communal differences were more strongly emphasised and formed the basis of the most of the questions asked in the Council."

In the third elections, Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram's party suffered heavy defeats. He lost the rural constituencies of Gurgaon and Rohtak; and had the melancholy satisfaction of leading a single follower, Ch. Duli Chand (representing rural Karnal) who won his election by a very narrow majority of 77 votes. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram's pro-Muslim policy as a Minister was largely responsible for his reverses. This also shows that the mass of voters is not influenced by this division of people into "Rural" and "Urban" which it is the earnest desire of the Government to see flourishing. The ex-Hindu Minister, however, became an ally and a leader of the Muslim party and has since been nominated by the Mahomedans to the Simon Committee. R. S. Chaudhri Chhotu Ram and his followers retain the goodwill of the Muslim party, because they are engaged in the "happy" pastime of dividing the Hindus on the basis of caste.

As an instance I quote the following from Ch. Duli Chand's speech in the Punjab Council delivered on March, 1928: "I therefore take this opportunity to propose that the lands reserved for sale should be divided into parts to be sold separately to Muslims, Sikhs, Christians and Hindus. The proposed division should be made on the basis of population of the different communities mentioned above. The portion set apart for the Hindus should be further divided into two parts to be sold separately to the agriculturists comprising Gujars, Ahirs, Jats, Rors and Rajputs, etc., and non-agriculturists comprising Banias, Aroras, Khatries and such other tribes of moneylenders."

Conclusion.

Comment on this is superfluous. I most emphatically state that there is no party division which may be styled as Urban and Rural, and agriculturists and non-agriculturists or zamindars and non-zamindars are terms which have been wrongly applied to describe the conflicts of privileged with non-privileged castes created under the Land Alienation Act. While admitting that these conflicts are not so frequent as conflicts between Muslims and non-Muslims, I dare say that if the British Parliament is sincere in its desire to put India on the path to National Democratic rule it must by legislation make the granting of privileges on the basis of a person's caste or birth impossible.

CHAPTER IV.

Communal Representation in Services and its Attendant Evils.

The policy pursued by the Punjab Government in making appointments to the public services has been the subject of debates in the Punjab Legislative Council. The Mahomedan demand now is that all posts under the Government should be filled according to the population of the communities and further that the zamindars, i.e., the agricultural privileged castes, should be recruited to the extent of 80 or 90 per cent. Thus posts are sought to be filled not only on religious basis but on caste basis as well.

The Punjab Government, even before the introduction of the present Reforms, had given indications of its desire to make concessions to the Muslims. With the introduction of the Reforms the communal principle has been applied to an extent which cannot be justified on any ground.

The part played by Sir Fazl-i-Hussain (the first Education Minister) in this matter has already been referred to. The protests against his policy proved of no avail. The Government, too, has been giving way to the demands made by the Muslim members and the Muslim press. In the Punjab a regular campaign is being carried on against those departments where the number of Muslims is less than 55 per cent. The High Court and the University have become the regular subject of debates in the Council and outside the Council. A most unwholesome and dangerous propaganda has been and is being carried on.

In departments where the Muslims are in a majority they continue to be in a majority, and in other departments efforts are being made by the Government to give them the preponderance for which they clamour.

The Government has further accepted the principle of filling up posts on caste basis and the so-called zamindar castes are loud and insistent that they should get a lion's share of the public posts. Government has been giving way steadily. These concessions instead, of allaying the thirst of the favoured communities, have made them still more vociferous, and a state of things has been created which is most deplorable.

Efficiency being Sacrificed.

(i) Efficiency and merit have been sacrificed and corruption and incapacity in the public services are on the increase. In new departments the Hindus, especially the non-agriculturist castes, are excluded. Their exclusion from the department of Co-operative Societies has resulted in the employment of dishonest and inexperienced men of the privileged castes. Even the Government has been obliged to point out this danger to the efficiency of services. Extracts from the recent report of Co-operative Societies were given by Rai Bahadur Lala Dhanpat Rai in his speech in the Council in February, 1928, which may well be reproduced here. Rai Bahadur Lala Dhanpat Rai said: "As regards the causes of dishonesty, I will draw your attention to page 12 of this Report, where the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, says:—

"He will, of course, endeavour to persuade, but argument may fail, especially where a bank defends an incompetent employee on communal grounds. Directors are deplorably unwilling to employ non-agriculturists, though the bania is the best of all bank managers."

The Honorable Minister Sardar Jegindar Singh endorses these remarks in the following words:—

"The prejudice of certain directors against the employment of non-agriculturists as manager and accountants is unfortunate and has doubtless been one of the chief causes of the frauds and irregularities noticed in the Report."

(ii) Communal Bias in the Administration is Increasing.

It has been repeatedly asserted that the subordinate police in times of riots sympathise with their co-religionists and instances could be quoted where distinctions of religion have been made in the levying of the Punitive Police Tax by the administration.

Communal Bias Invading the Judiciary.

(iii) Communal bias is invading the administration of justice in the subordinate judiciary. Complaints have been made more than once that this evil is raising its head. In a debate held in the Punjab Council on the motion of a Muslim member for the recruitment of subordinate judges on the population basis, protests were made by the Hindus and the Sikhs against such a policy. The Government member who spoke on behalf of the Government admitted the force of the protests and made some very pertinent remarks. He said: "Sir, I venture to remind the House that the Government is a government for all, not for a class (hear, hear), if we recruit according to communal percentages by communities, an idea, a very terrible idea, will get about, in the service—(A Voice: It has got there already)—that a man is in the service not primarily to serve the Government but because he belongs to a community and that in his actions in the service his chief occupation should be service to that particular community."

But the deplorable results are already there. Government servants have started considering themselves the servants of their particular communities. It is the beginning of a state of affairs too terrible to contemplate.

Riots Instigated by Educated Men.

(iv) Riots, murders and murderous assaults are instigated by the dissatisfied educated men in order to make the Hindus agree to Muslim demands. Sh. Faiz Mohamed (representing the Mahomedan rural constituency of Dera Ghazi Khan) very frankly and candidly stated that educated men were the instigators of these diabolical crimes. He said in his speech in the Punjab Council, made in March, 1928: "If the Government is anxious to do away with the present communal tension, as I am sure the Government is, the only way to achieve this object is to give each community its share in the administration of the Province, including the administration of justice. Nothing short of it will give the country and the Province permanent peace * * * I can say on the strength of my personal experience that these riots and disturbances are fomented by the dissatisfied educated men. Ignorant masses do not commit riots of their own accord. As a matter of fact they are incited to these riots by the educated. I mean the dissatisfied educated."

It has been stated in the Council more than once, and in the Mohamedan Press very often, that riots will continue so long as Muslim demands are not accepted.

There can be no limits to these demands. Communal appetite when once awakened can never be satisfied. The desire for domination is loud, insistent and keen. Government's weak policy has been responsible for increase in communal crime.

The members—representatives of minority communities—have more than once begged the Government to change its policy and rule out religious and caste considerations altogether while making appointments. But all to no avail. The desire to conciliate the Mohamedans persists and no matter whether the Mohamedans are in a minority in any province or in a majority, they must be propitiated at the cost of efficiency and fitness and also at the cost of the lives of the innocent people killed in communal disturbances.

The problem presented to the Commission for solution requires a real remedy. The minorities, whether Hindu or Mohamedan can only be protected if public posts, especially of trust and responsibility, are filled strictly on the basis of merit and efficiency, and by ruling out considerations of caste and religion.

CHAPTER V.

The Punjab Alienation of Land Act and the Constitutional Problem.

This Act was passed in 1900 by the Imperial Legislative Council, which was not then an elected body. The only Punjab nominated member, Raja Sir Harnam Singh, opposed this measure, but the officials were anxious to see the Act placed on the Statute book. This Act is peculiar to the Punjab It divides the Punjab population into two groups—the agriculturists and the non-agriculturists—the division is not based on occupation but on birth. There are certain tribes or castes, mostly Mahomedans, who are declared as agricultural castes, while the remaining castes are non-agricultural. The agricultural castes are the privileged castes, that is to say, the members of these castes are given certain privileges on account of their birth in a particular caste, while for the mere crime of birth in a particular caste other persons are laid under civic disabilities in regard to the purchase of land. The members of the non-agricultural castes thus find that certain disabilities which this Act imposes upon them stick to them throughout their lives and descend even to their children and grandchildren. These castes are not permitted to purchase land from the so-called agriculturists. To be an agriculturist under the Act it is not necessary that a person should be the tiller of the soil. He may not even own an inch of land, yet he will will be regarded as an agriculturist if he happens to be borne in a tribe which has been notified under the Act as an agricultural tribe by the Local Government.

Restrictions on Franchise.

1. I have already explained that, under the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, certain castes are prohibited from purchasing land from the members of agricultural castes or tribes. These agricultural castes or tribes are, in majority of cases, the owners of land, and when the constitution definitely lays down that for the exercise of franchise certain property qualification is necessary, it becomes important to note the effect of this restrictive legislation on the constitutional question. On the one hand, people are to exercise the right of vote if they possess agricultural land paying land revenue to the extent of Rs. 25 per annum. On the other hand, it is definitely laid down that people who are called non-agriculturists are not to purchase land under the law from the agriculturists. Thus what is given with one hand is taken away with the other. The sufferers in the majority of cases are Hindus, specially those belonging to the depressed classes with whose case I will presently deal. This exclusion of whole classes of people from the exercise of a political privilege granted under the present reforms works the greatest possible hardship and is the negation of the elementary principle of democracy which recognises and ought to recognise the equality of all men before the law and which should afford equal opportunities to all citizens to acquire such qualifications as are needed for the exercise of the right of vote and thus participate in the Government of their country.

Impediment in the Path of Unity.

2. The second important bearing of this problem on the constitutional question is that it has greatly intensified the rigours of caste and has thus placed another impediment in the path of the fusion of various sections into one united nation. For privileged people will always be loth to part with power which the legislation under reference gives them. These privileges, based upon birth, have given the agricultural classes a preponderating influence in the Government of the country, as is evident from the fact that, out of 71 elected members in the Punjab Legislative Council, 48 belong to these statutory castes, although, according to the calculation made by Raja Narendra Nath, the agriculturist castes are in a minority in the Punjab. The minority, therefore, rules the majority.

Precedent for other Restrictive Acts.

3. The Act, as it stands, forms a precedent for other Acts of a similar nature which may be passed by the Punjab Council when it is granted further powers under the new Reforms.

When full powers are granted to the Punjab Council, what is there to prevent it from passing a law that a particular caste or tribe, e.g., the Banias or the Mahajans should not be allowed to compete for Government posts or to bid at auction for the sale of Government lands. I can well imagine the Punjab Council passing without much opposition a law of this kind. The veto of the Governor is a very doubtful safeguard. The Governor may not like to exercise his extraordinary powers in cases of this kind. In the new scheme of self-government, which would grant practically full powers to the Council, the Governor might hesitate to exercise his prerogative. According to the political leaders who are framing constitutions at the present moment, if three-fourths of the members of the Hindu community are opposed to a measure of this kind, then the Bill will have to be dropped. This provision ignores the fact that the Hindus themselves are further divided into various sections and castes. It is absolutely clear that a non-Mahajan or a non-Bania will not join with the Mahajan or Bania in opposing a Bill of this kind, such is the disintegrating effect of the Land Alienation Act. The attitude hitherto adopted by Rs. S. Ch. Chhotu Ram and his follower Ch. Duli Chand—both of whom are Hindu members—would show that they will be only too pleased to support a measure of the type just discussed. I would respectfully, yet strongly, ask the members of the Simon Commission whether the Punjab Council will not have the power of enacting laws of such outrageous nature, if it were inclined to do so.

Privileged Castes seek Further Privileges on the Basis of Birth.

4. The Council debates bear ample testimony to the fact that if you once create privileged classes, they ask for further privileges based upon birth. The great desire of these privileged classes now is to shift the burden of taxation on to the shoulders of the non-agricultural communities. The efforts to make income tax a provincial subject are the result of this tendency. The fact that income tax mainly comes out of the pockets of non-agricultural classes is responsible for this move. It is, therefore, important for us to consider whether the new Government of India Act should not make provision for the regulation of taxation on a just and equitable basis.

5. Turning now to the public services, we find these statutory castes insisting that 80 or 90 per cent. of the total appointments should go to them. The sectional differences in the Punjab have been encouraged, and perpetuated by the Government's willingness in acceding to the demand for recruitment on caste basis. The various circulars issued by the Government from time to time have compelled heads of departments to adopt this policy in filling up Government posts. Apart from the communal heartburning and unrest that these measures have caused, they are also responsible for the fact that an element of inefficiency has crept into these services, which cannot but prejudically affect the administration of the Province.

CHAPTER VI.

The Depressed Classes and the Reforms.

The importance of the problem of the depressed classes has been attracting public attention for some years. The question came to the forefront during the days of the non-co-operation movement (1920-21). There are in the Punjab 2,893,000 members of the depressed classes. The depressed castes are known to everybody. The Chamars, the Sweepers, the Meghs, the Dooms and various other similar castes are called the depressed castes. They are sufficiently well defined and well known.

Causes of their Depression.

There are various causes which are responsible for keeping these castes down.

1. These various castes became untouchables because they followed unclean trades or professions, and therefore the men of other castes ceased to have any social intercourse with them.
2. In the second place, these castes continued to hold the lowest place in society because of certain customary rules which are enforceable in Courts of law debarring them from purchasing lands in village communities. Attention was drawn to this matter by the writer in his speech in the Legislative Council on 3rd March, 1928. The result of these customary rules which have the force of law is that the depressed classes are unable to purchase agricultural lands or even residential sites in villages.
3. The third cause is the Land Alienation Act, which prevents the members of the depressed classes from purchasing lands from the privileged castes notified under the act as agriculturists. These castes, some of whom are agricultural labourers, cannot, under the Land Alienation Act, purchase land from agriculturists.

So far as the high caste Hindus are concerned they have been making earnest efforts to raise the status of these people long before Mahatma Ghandi started his campaign against untouchability. Various Hindu and non-Muslim societies in the Punjab had started the uplift work. To-day there is no such social antagonism as existed a generation ago. In Lahore the Brahmins and the Chamars are often seen dining at the same place and drawing water from the same well.

Punjab Government Hostile to the Depressed Classes.

The claim made on behalf of the Government by Lord Birkenhead is, however, without foundation, so far as the Punjab Government is concerned. The Punjab Government's attitude is distinctly hostile to the claims of these castes even for a fair treatment, as is evidenced by the following facts:—

(a) It may be stated here that persons belonging to these castes are not as a rule permitted to draw water from public wells. In March, 1925, L. Mohan Lal Bhatnagar, a Hindu member, brought forward the following resolution in the Punjab Legislative Council: 'This Council recommends to the Government to take necessary steps to ensure that the people of the untouchable classes are not prevented from drawing water from public wells in charge of local bodies." It will perhaps surprise the Honourable Members of the Commission to note that the resolution was resisted by the Government, and on the resolution being put to vote, was lost, as the Government and Mahomedan members voted against the resolution, while all the Hindus and all the Sikhs voted for it. The Council divided as follows:—

The division list is given on pages 197 and 198 of Vol. VIII., Part A, Punjab Council Debates, 1925.

(b) The second incident to which I draw the attention of the Commission is the debate which took place in March, 1928, regarding the grant of Crown lands. The Punjab Government is the fortunate possessor of many lacs of acres of land, out of which grants are made to various classes of people in the Punjab. The claims of the depressed classes were pressed for favourable treatment by the writer in a speech, the report of which is given on pages 360-361 of Vol. I. of the Punjab Council Debates, 1928. The reply on behalf of Government was given by Mr. H. D. Craik (see pages 364-365). He asserted that there was difficulty in finding a satisfactory definition of the depressed class. This is obviously incorrect. However, the Government member proceeded: "After all it is not necessary to be a grantee to benefit by the colony. Anyone can go there as a tenant, the Chamar, the Sweeper, and so on. They are all welcome and they can all find a living as tenants. Is not that the proper line for their advance rather than to allot a great portion of the huge undeveloped area on which the prosperity of the province for generations to come depends to these rather vague and undefined purposes? If the honourable member says that the Government keeps them in a depressed economic position, I might retort by asking him who is responsible for their low social position?"

That is the attitude of the Punjab Government towards the depressed classes. It is prepared to grant land to members of criminal tribes and to Mahomedan Janglies, many of whom are cattle lifters, but not to the depressed castes! The reply given by the Financial Commissioner for Development ought to open the eyes of those who claim that the Government stands between the depressed classes and the higher castes.

3. As regards facilities in education the Punjab Government's record is blank. It offers special scholarships to Mahomedans and to members of agricultural castes; but so far as these people are concerned it has not afforded any such facilities.

4. I have already stated that under the Land Alienation Act these castes are deprived of the elementary rights of citizenship, namely, to freely enter into contracts of purchase and sale for aquiring agricultural lands. The Act was professedly passed in the interests of the agriculturist classes in order to protect them from the rapacity of the money-lenders. How the people of the depressed classes could have exploited the agriculturists or the privileged castes of the Act passes the comprehension of men of ordinary intelligence.

Conclusion.

It is, therefore, safe to assert that the attitude of the Punjab Government to the claims of these people to any special treatment has been most indifferent and in most cases actively hostile. In the interests of sound constitutional advance it is absolutely essential that no restrictive laws or customary rules be permitted to stand in the way of the advancement of the depressed classes. It should be enacted that all public institutions, including the wells and tanks owned by Government, Municipalities, District Boards and village communities, be thrown open to all persons irrespective of their caste, religion or race. If objection is taken to the free exercise of these elementary rights of citizenship by any section of the Punjab public then it is a matter of serious consideration whether any further step towards constitutional advance should be taken or not.

CHAPTER VII.

The Government and the Hindus.

The Hindus in the Punjab are a minority community. This fact is often lost sight of by outsiders. The treatment accorded to them by the Government has created a widespread feeling among them that the Government has entered upon a policy the result of which is to reduce them to the position of political and economic serfs. In support of this they point to the various acts of the Government which are leading to the political and economic downfall of the Hindus in the Punjab. I will very briefly lay before the Commission some of these outstanding grievances of the minority Hindu community.

(1) The first grievance is the existence of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act. It is contended that this Act disqualifies large classes of Punjab citizens from exercising civic rights on the ground of caste. The civic disability thus imposed on account of a person's birth in a particular caste pursues him till death. This Act was not passed by the Punjab Council, but by the Imperial Council in Lord Curzon's time, where there was no representative of the castes, who were deprived of valuable rights of citizenship.

(2) The second grievance is with regard to the working of this Act. Many Hindu agricultural tribes are not declared as "agriculturists" under this Act. The Act is worked for the benefit of the Mahomedans to the detriment of the Hindus. This Act has strengthened the caste system, has divided the people, has deprived the non-privileged castes from acquiring lands and has been the cause of their humiliation and real suffering.

(3) In the matter of military service the distinction of martial and non-martial races has been created for keeping out the high-caste Hindus. The Khatris, the descendants of the old martial races, have, by a strange irony of fate, been declared to be a non-military race. The policy of the Government in this respect has led to the emasculation of the Hindus and the deterioration of their physique.

(4) In the matter of the civil services as well, the attitude of the Government and the Muslim Ministers has been deplorable. Merit and efficiency are being sacrificed in order to please the dominant community and the privileged castes. The Hindu candidates, especially those belonging to the so-called higher castes, are being arbitrarily excluded in spite of their superior qualifications.

(5) This principle has been carried forward even even in the sphere of education. Admissions to the Government College at Lahore are made on the communal basis. Similarly, in professional colleges, namely, the Medical, Training, Agricultural and Engineering colleges the pernicious rule of admitting candidates on communal or caste considerations has been enforced.

(6) Efforts have been made to pass Bills like the Moneylenders Bill in order to destroy the trade and commerce of the Hindus. The fear of the Hindus, therefore, is well-founded that their economic ruin is only a question of time if things are permitted to go on in this manner. The Hindus seek no favour or concession, but what they ask for is that a person should not be made to suffer because he is born a Hindu or because he belongs to a particular caste.

(7) Another grievance of the Hindus is that in times of communal troubles and tension a strictly impartial treatment is not accorded by the Executive Government in the matter of criminal prosecutions. The recent incidents may be cited as instances to show the discrimination made between the offenders of the various communities.

(8) Lastly, as regards the medium of instruction. Urdu has usurped the place of the mother-tongue, namely, the Punjabee. Schoolboys of very tender years are made to receive education through Urdu.

The system of communal representation has, therefore, failed to protect the interests of the Hindu minority and other minorities. In place of the old British Government now there exists British-cum-Muslim rule. The minorities have been sacrificed to satisfy the desire for domination of both the British and the Mahomedans. The Hindus have not been treated with fairness and justice. There has been no question of their getting any special favour or concession which they could have claimed on the ground of their being in a minority in this Province. The problem, therefore, for the Hindus is how they can reconcile the claim of the people of the Punjab for full responsible Government with their own safety.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Protection of Minorities.

The chief problem which the Statutory Commission has to tackle is how to protect the minorities while conceding full responsible government to the people of India. We have seen that in the Punjab, the interests of the minorities have been sacrificed to please the majority community and that the system of communal representation has failed to afford any protection to minorities in general and the Hindus in particular. It is clear that this system must be abandoned and other safeguards adopted. Democratic national responsible government can only be established if no concession is made to communal demands; and privileges based upon caste or birth are abolished. Therefore, I venture to make the following suggestions, which will, I hope meet with the approval of the Commission. These principles have mainly been taken from the constitutions of other advanced countries. So long as the power of the British Parliament is supreme, it should not be open to the Legislatures and Executive Governments in India to pass any law or issue any regulation which infringes the spirit of these principles. And if British power is weakened, the minorities will themselves look after their own safety. There is no justification for the British Government to recognise the divisions based upon religion or caste or birth, and it should not give way to the clamour of the communalists or privileged castes, but should boldly place India and the Punjab on the path of democratic rule.

The following suggestions are made for the consideration of those who are entrusted with the work of settling the question of responsible Government.

1. In the Punjab the principle of communal representation by religious communities should be completely abolished, because the minorities, i.e., the Hindus, the Sikhs and the Christians, do not want it, and the Mahomedans being in a majority in the Punjab cannot claim it.
2. That equality of all men before law should be established by Statute; caste and religious distinctions in the exercise of civil rights should, by a Statute of Parliament, be abolished.
3. That as regards the filling up of posts under the Government or the local bodies the considerations of birth, caste and religion should be wholly ruled out. The posts of trust and responsibility should be filled by open competition giving equal opportunities to all the citizens of the Punjab.
4. In the Police, Military, Naval and Air Forces, all supposed or real distinctions of martial and non-martial races, tribes or castes should be abolished and all persons who come up to the required test of physical and intellectual fitness should be taken in the Services.
5. That all judicial posts should be filled absolutely on the ground of merit and efficiency, ruling out all other considerations, and the action of the judiciary should not be made the subject of debate or discussion in the local legislatures. The independence of the High Court should by Statute be guaranteed.
6. That elementary primary education should be given in the mother-tongue of the people, and Urdu in the Punjab should not be forced on the primary schools and should cease to be the medium of instruction to the exclusion of the Punjabee and Hindi (the language of the districts of Ambala, Hissar, Gurgaon, Rohtak and Kangra).

(7) That primary education, free and compulsory, should at once be established and funds raised by new taxation, if necessary.

(8) That freedom of worship and right of citizens for assembling for religious purposes, and freedom of propaganda for the purposes of uplift or conversion should be guaranteed to all communities alike, provided the communities behave in an orderly and lawful manner. The offenders breaking the law of the land should be dealt with impartially and in accordance with law.

(9) That persons belonging to depressed castes should enjoy full privileges as regards civic rights, which are enjoyed by Mahomedans and higher caste Hindus.

(10) That the citizens should have equal opportunities for qualifying themselves for the right of vote. All restrictions recognised by invidious law in acquiring property and other qualifications should be abolished. This should be guaranteed by Parliamentary Statute.

(11) That it should be open to the citizens to test the legality of any Government order in a court of law if any regulation, order, or circular infringes these principles.

I submit that if the suggestions offered above are carried out and suitable legislation by the Parliament is passed, the question of the protection of the minorities and giving them special concessions and showing them favours will not arise. It is the desire to establish communal rule and communal domination that is at the back of the demands for communal concessions and favours. Government, by not accepting the principles acted upon by other civilised countries, lays itself open to the charge of partiality for one community and for perpetuating caste and religious distinctions for gaining its own selfish ends.

It was forcibly pointed out by Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford that by making concessions to communalism you cannot bring about national spirit. If India, and specially the Punjab, is to be placed on the path of responsible government, then communalism must be destroyed. The country is not placed on the path of responsible rule as yet. We have the beginning of the rule of religious majorities —a wholly undesirable state of affairs. There is a challenge to British statesmanship and British ideals of freedom and democracy. Shall the people of India march on the path of freedom peacefully and constitutionally or shall they be forced to march towards freedom, liberty and responsible government through revolution, revolt and bloodshed? Let British statesmen give their reply in a clear and unequivocal manner.

Part II.—Constructive Proposals.

CHAPTER I.

The Goal.—It is the declared policy of the British Parliament to establish responsible Government in India. The advance is to be on national democratic lines.

Impediments in the Way of Nationality and Democracy.—There are, however, three great impediments which stand in the way of the people of the Punjab in the development of a spirit of nationalism and democracy. They are:—

(1) Divisions on Religious Lines.—The communal tension in the Punjab is very acute, and the cleavage between the Muslims, the Hindus, and the Sikhs is very marked. Communal bitterness, as I have already pointed out in my Memorandum (Part I), is intensified by the Reforms.

(2) Divisions Based on Caste.—The caste divisions are greatly strengthened by the Government not only by maintaining the divisions already existing, but also by the creation of privileged castes by Statutory Law.

(3) The Existence of Primitive Village Communities.—It is absolutely essential for the Honourable Members of the Commission to understand the constitution of the Punjab village communities and the privileges and powers exercised by the landed proprietors, which are feudal in character and wholly opposed to the fundamental ideas of democracy. There exists a sharp cleavage between the proprietors and the non-proprietors. The proprietors exercise feudal privileges and refuse the extension of even the elementary rights of citizenship to other classes, such as the depressed castes, the tenants, the kamins, artisans and the tradesmen.

Government Accentuates the Existing Divisions and Creates Other Divisions.—These impediments in the way of national solidarity and democracy would have been removed in course of time with the growth of education and the spread of modern ideas, but the policy of the Government of India in general, and the Punjab Government in particular, has strengthened these caste, tribal and religious divisions. The various enactments which are on the Statute Book and numerous Government circulars and executive orders and instructions regarding the recruitment of services have intensified communal, class and caste bitterness. The schools and colleges have been instrumental in further accentuating these divisions. The situation, therefore, presents problems and difficulties created, not only by the old social order, but by the Government themselves.

The Government seem determined to follow a policy of granting concessions and favours mainly on the basis of birth, religion and race, and it seems almost a hopeless task to persuade the Government to take a different line of action. The policy of favouring the Mahomedans at the cost of the Hindus is being ruthlessly followed under the guise of protecting the minority community; and Government grants privileges to Mussalmans as such, while it ignores the existence of the other minority communities, such as the Hindus and the Sikhs, of the Punjab and Christians everywhere.

Indian Politician's Error.—The Indian politician, on the other hand, anxious to break down the existing system of Government at all costs, has not unnaturally followed the example set by the Government and has accepted the communal principle in order to win the favour of the Mahomedan community and also conceded to it certain privileges which he refuses to other minorities. The existence of other minorities in India [such as Christians, the Sikhs, and the Hindus in Bengal and the Punjab] has been especially ignored by the Indian statesmen. An attempt has been made in the Nehru Report to rectify some of the errors of the past and to place India on the road to national democratic responsible Government, but the desire to win the favour of the Muslim community has been responsible for some very serious errors in this otherwise valuable document.

Essentials of Advance.—To those who are prepared to think and act nationally it must be clear that we shall have to retrace our steps. The line of advance so far adopted is opposed to nationalistic and democratic ideals. The first step in responsible Government must be preceded by the total abolition of the communal principle and of privileges based upon birth, caste, and religion. The feudal privileges of the landed proprietors living in the villages must be abolished and a really democratic outlook created. Equality of all citizens of the State before the law must be established qua civic or civil rights. Freedom of religious worship must be guaranteed to all Indians alike, and elementary education in the language of the people must at once be introduced.

The Scheme of Fundamental Rights.—The authors of the Nehru Report deserve credit for having drawn up a scheme of fundamental rights which is likely to achieve most of the essentials of political advance mentioned above. This scheme of fundamental rights is absolutely essential for the protection of the minorities, be they Hindus, Mahomedans, or Sikhs. The scheme is bound to ameliorate the condition of the depressed classes and menials (kamins) in the villages. Such a scheme finds a place in the constitutions of the advanced countries of the world, and must be accepted by the British Parliament. Similar recommendations have been made by the Mussalmans of U.P. in a book published by Dr. Shafaat Ahmad, M.L.C. of the U.P. In the Memorandum which I have already submitted (Part I) I ventured to place similar suggestions before the Commission. It is expected that the Honourable Members of the Commission, true to the ideals of democracy, will recommend the acceptance of this scheme to the British Parliament.

I now pass on to make constructive proposals regarding various topics contained in the questionnaire.

CHAPTER II.

1. The Representative System as Applied to India.

The Nehru Report advocates adult suffrage. So far as legislatures are concerned adult suffrage seems to be impracticable and unworkable. There is every likelihood that the Constitution will break down if adult suffrage is introduced for election to the legislatures without the proper political education of the masses. On the other hand, adult suffrage must be extended for the purposes of local boards, municipalities and also the village Panchayats. People must be trained to exercise the rights of vote in the institutions mentioned above.

The property qualifications, so far as legislatures are concerned, must therefore be retained. It must, however, be made clear that no kind of restrictions should be imposed on any individual or class regarding the acquisition of property or any other qualifications which are necessary for the exercise of the right to vote.

Method of Election—(i) The electorate should be joint. Separate representation by means of religious electorates must be given up.

(ii) Special interests, such as trade, commerce, industries and the universities must secure representation in the legislatures by means of special electorates. Unfortunately the Government's unsympathetic attitude towards the urban and educated classes is responsible for their inadequate representation on the local legislatures.

(iii) I see no justification for retaining the constituency of big landholders on the legislative bodies, but if their representation is to be retained those people who pay large sums of income tax should also have similar representation on these bodies.

(iv) The representation of the Tamandars in the Punjab Legislative Council is an anachronism and should be abolished.

(v) The right of voting must be extended to retired civil officials on the same basis as it is granted to the retired soldiers who served during the Great War.

The Minorities and Separate Electorates.—Let us now consider whether separate electorates in the Punjab should be retained or not. I have already submitted that the Reforms have intensified communal bitterness and hatred. The spirit of violence has been engendered and riots and disturbances have disfigured the history of this province. The communities, instead of living in peace and friendship, are to-day ranged against one another. If a national spirit is to be created then communal representation by means of separate electorates must be given up. The Mussalmans in the Punjab, though in a majority, advocate the retention of this form of representation, because they wish to establish the domination of their own community over the other two communities. Not only do they want the retention of separate electorates for the purposes of election to the legislatures, but they also favour the extension of the communal principle to other spheres of life, such as seats of learning, services and to local bodies (wherever it is to their advantage). They are not, however, prepared to grant the same concessions to other minorities which they seek for themselves. That is the reason why the principle of communal representation has not been extended to the district boards in the Punjab. The Muslims as a rule are opposed to caste, but the Mahomedans of the Punjab favour the perpetuation of caste cleavage in order to retain the distinction of agriculturist and non-agriculturist, the basis of which is a person's birth in a particular caste. The Muslims outside this province are not in favour of keeping down the Hindu depressed classes; in the Punjab they oppose the Hindu depressed classes; but in the Punjab they oppose their amelioration as they lose a fruitful soil for carrying on their religious propaganda, for the purposes of conversion. Therefore the conflict between the various communities living in the Punjab has assumed a magnitude the parallel of which it is difficult to find in other provinces. Unless the majorities are prepared to show proper concern for the welfare and protection of the minorities it is clear that the advance can neither be sound nor rapid, and it lies with the majorities to make their choice. If they refuse to grant equal opportunities for progress to other citizens of the State, then the necessary result will be that the advance in this province will be restricted. Let us therefore consider some of the safeguards which are absolutely essential for the protection of the minorities in the Punjab.

Safeguards for Minorities.—In view of the increase in communal bitterness and the tension prevailing in the Punjab the following safeguards must be adopted before any advance is made.

(i) The scheme of fundamental rights must be adopted and statutory provision made for it.

(ii) Law, order and justice should be made Central subjects.

(iii) Minorities should be effectively represented in the Cabinet as is done at present. The ministers should be elected by means of single transferable vote, thus giving a chance to various groups of councillors to put in their best men in the Cabinet. It is clear that if the choice is given to the Chief Minister to appoint the members of the Cabinet he will choose such persons out of the minority communities as will be absolutely subservient to his will. The system of electing ministers by means of single transferable vote while giving protection to the minorities is in no way communal in its nature.

(iv) The ministers should be helped in the work of their departments by the Standing Committees of the Council, the election of which should be by single transferable vote as at present. These committees should not be merely advisory, but they should determine the policy of the ministers, who should be held bound by the decisions of the Standing Committees, unless in any particular matter the decision of the Committee is overruled by the Governor on an appeal by the minister.

(v) The power of making appointments should be taken away from the ministers and should vest in the Public Service Commission.

(vi) Joint responsibility of the Cabinet must be enforced.

(vii) Income tax should continue to be a Central subject and financial safeguards for protecting the interests of the minorities must be adopted. Therefore the power of taxation of the Provincial Governments should be well and carefully defined. The Provincial Governments should not be given the powers of imposing any new tax or readjust its imposition without the previous sanction of the Central Government.

(viii) There should be effective representation of the urban, educated and trading classes, which is not the case at present.

(ix) All bills passed by the provincial legislatures shall require the assent of the Governor-General-in-Council.

(x) Residuary powers shall vest in the Central Government, which should have the power to suspend the Provincial Constitutions in case the Provincial Governments act against the principles of fairplay and justice or violate the fundamental rights of the citizens.

CHAPTER III.

The Punjab Council.

The Punjab Council should be substantially enlarged. The constituencies should be made smaller so that the representatives of the people may be able to come into closer touch with their constituents. The Council should be representative of all interests about which mention has already been made.

The British Services—Europeans and the Anglo-Indians.—The classes mentioned above should have their representatives in the Council. These classes have got great stake in the Province and therefore it is necessary that they should have representation in the Council by means of special constituencies.

Cabinet.—The Cabinet must consist of the members of all communities and all interests should also be represented. Each Minister should be in charge of one or more departments. He should be helped in his work by a board or a standing committee composed of the elected members of the Council. Election to this board should take place by means of single transferable vote as is done in the case of the election to the Standing Committees of the Punjab Legislative Council. Members of this board should have a powerful voice in determining the policy of the Minister. This scheme will lead to the harmonious working between the various members of the different communities. It will pave the way for mutual co-operation and goodwill between the different communities and will considerably allay the communal tension existing in the Punjab.

The District Boards, Municipalities and Village Councils.—In order to make democracy a really efficient instrument of Government it is necessary to build it up on solid foundations. People living in the villages of the Punjab and towns should therefore be given real and effective political education. Responsibility should be introduced in the village panchayats, town committees and district boards.

The village Panchayat and Council.—There should be an elected panchayat in every village which should deal with and administer certain specified subjects such as primary education of the village, and right in and enjoyment of the common property, village sanitation, poor relief and petty disputes. In this council all communities living in the village and all interests should be represented. The kamins, the artisans and traders should have a voice in the administration of the village.

Adult suffrage should be at once introduced and the people saved from the oppression caused by the Panchayat Act of the Punjab.

Town Councils.—The town councils should exist in every town, big or small, and all interests in the town councils should be represented. There should be special representation of those people who pay large amount of taxes whether municipal or provincial.

District Boards.—The district boards should be enlarged and should be representative of the people living in the district as a whole. They should not merely be rural boards. Every adult should have the right to vote. Those who pay most for the running of the machinery of the Government may be given special representation for a specified period of time. The cumbersome machinery of governing the district with highly paid officials should be substantially modified. One District Officer, for co-ordinating different departments should take the place of the Deputy-Commissioner and the Deputy-Superintendent of Police, and the District Council should be responsible for—

(b) Medical relief and sanitation of the district.
(c) Maintenance of district roads and other means of communication.

CHAPTER IV.

Federation in India and Relation between the Central and Provincial Governments.

The Government in India should be a unitary Government. The Central Government should have the power of superintendence, direction, and control over the Provincial Governments. The power of suspending the constitution of any Provincial Government should also vest in the Central Government. If the Central Government is convinced that any Provincial Government behaves in a manner which is opposed to the principle of fair play and justice, it should suspend the constitution.

Residuary powers should vest in the Central Government and not in the Provincial Governments. Sources of revenue already made over to the provinces are sufficient for the proper administration of the provinces. In case it is found that any province requires any financial help the Central Government may, on the case being made out, make a contribution for the purposes of the Provincial Government out of its funds. The Central Government should have the right in times of emergency to levy contribution from the Provincial Governments.

Central Government.—Much has already been said about the Central Government. So far as the constitution, position and powers of the Governor-General and his relationship to the Cabinet or to the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State is concerned the scheme propounded in the Nehru Report has met with general acceptance in the Punjab. It is once more necessary here to emphasise that any weakness of the Central Government is likely to have disastrous results.

CHAPTER V.

Justice in India, Judiciary and the High Court.

All the three subjects are inter-connected. Justice should be a central subject, and the High Court should be freed from the influence of the local councils. The following suggestions are submitted for the consideration of the Commissioners:—

(1) Judges should be appointed by the Crown and should hold office during good behaviour. They should not be removed except by the Crown on the advice of the Governor-General.
(2) The Judges of the High Court must be advocates of at least 10 years' standing. No communal or caste considerations should be permitted to prevail while making appointments of the High Court Judges, as is done at the present time. Efficiency and merit alone should be taken into consideration while making appointments to the high posts.

Subordinate Judiciary.—The subordinate judiciary must also be recruited from the members of the Bar. Appointments should be in the hands of the High Court Judges, who should hold competitive examinations for filling the posts. Communal or caste considerations should be wholly ruled out for making appointments in the judiciary. The present system of making appointments should, therefore, be abandoned, as it has lowered efficiency and imported communal bias in the administration.

Separation of Executive and Judicial Functions.—The executive officers should not be permitted to exercise judicial powers. All magistrates should be placed under the High Court.

Revenue Courts should be Abolished.—The revenue courts generally perform the same function as the civil courts. These revenue courts should be abolished. All revenue cases should be tried by the civil courts. They should be tried as civil cases. Distinctions between the civil and revenue courts have often led to miscarriage of justice due to conflict of jurisdiction.

Bribery, Corruption and Communal Bias.—The clients seeking justice and the lawyers practising in the courts should have the free right of bringing cases of bribery, corruption and communal bias in the administration of justice to the notice of the High Court. The people bringing these petitions should be given proper facilities for supporting these charges, and the High Court, after having satisfied itself there being a prima facie case against a person, should, by means of a commission consisting of two or more High Court Judges, make an enquiry into the conduct of the subordinate judiciary, and should remove the accused from office if the charges against him are proved.

CHAPTER VI.

Services.

The question of services is one of the most important subjects with which we have to deal. The policy of the Punjab Government and the Government of India in making appointments on religious and caste basis must be strongly condemned. All higher appointments should be made by open competitive examinations, and, where it is not possible, the appointment should go to the best qualified person.

All ideas of communal or caste considerations should be wholly ruled out. The power of making appointments should vest in the All India Public Service Commission and in the Provincial Public Service Commission. The members of the Commission should be appointed by His Majesty the King-Emperor and should be of the same status as the High Court Judges. It should be open to all subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor, whether born or naturalised in India, to compete for all Government posts in India.

Pay and Salary of the Services.—It is submitted that the pay and salary of many of the services is very high, and a poor country like India cannot afford to pay such heavy salaries. There should be no reservation of posts for any tribe or caste or religion in the services, nor should any percentage of Indian Civil Services be the monopoly for the British subjects. Equality of opportunity should be afforded to all. This is the best way of getting the best persons for services of the State.

CHAPTER VII.

Status and position of India in the British Empire.

India should enjoy Dominion status in the British Empire and should be a partner in the British Commonwealth of Free Nations on equal terms. The declaration of peace and war should vest in the Imperial Parliament. All the citizens of the Dominions which allow equal treatment to citizens of India in their territory should have reciprocal rights in India. The citizens of Great Britain and other Dominions which allow Indians to compete for their posts should be permitted to compete for posts in the Indian Commonwealth. By mutual arrangement and agreement India and Great Britain should contribute towards the expenses of all military, air, and naval forces.

CHAPTER VIII.

Defence of India.

The problem of the defence of India is extremely important. The Punjab occupies a unique position in this respect. The politicians and the Government of India fail to appreciate the feelings of the minorities living in the Punjab while dealing with this question. These minorities are not insignificant, but have the greatest possible stake in the Punjab. They have, so far, been sacrificed either to satisfy the whims of the politicians or to pacify the anger of the Government, which is obsessed with the idea that it is the Hindus and the Sikhs who seek the destruction of the British Government. The minorities, however, cannot ignore the hard realities of life and attach the greatest possible importance to the question of defence.

(1) The Punjab is almost a frontier Province, and its geographical position makes it open to attacks from the Frontier. Afghanistan, Persia, Turkey, Baluchistan, Turkistan and other Mahomedan independent countries being carried away by the wave of pan-Islamism can attack India at any time through the N.W. Frontier. I would, in this connection, request the Members of the Commission to study the article of Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan, which appeared in the Civil and Military Gazette, dated 20th July, 1928. It graphically describes how the Afghan King holds the key of "Peace and War." (See C. & M. G. of 20th July, 1928.)

(2) The majority community in the Punjab consists of virile but mostly ignorant people who are easily inflamed to action and violence by fanatical leaders. The riots which occurred in Kohat, Rawalpindi, Multan and Lahore cannot be forgotten by the Hindus and the Sikhs of the Punjab. Reference may also be made here to the Hijrat Movement of 1921-22, which shows how these people can sacrifice everything at the altar of a religious idea.

(3) The Press in the Punjab especially, controlled by the majority community, is an index to the mentality of the people living in this Province. The threat that the Muslims will not be slow to use their power (when they get it) against their enemies has more than once been held out. And it is not a mere idle threat. The passions even of the educated men have been inflamed to a pitch which is dangerous in the extreme to the peace of the Punjab. Under these circumstances it is essential:—

(i) That the Central Government should exercise complete control over the Air, Naval and Military Forces; and Law, Order and Justice must be in its keeping.

(ii) The distinction between the martial and non-martial races and tribes should be completely abolished because this distinction has been responsible for the emasculation of the Hindus of the Punjab. All persons who fulfil the required test of physical and intellectual fitness should be permitted to enter the military services of the State. The minorities should not be hampered by unjust and unfair conventions by which the Government has sought to deprive them of their share in the military force.

(iii) On the other hand the minority communities should have special facilities for being trained in the offensive and defensive methods of warfare. Statesmanship and foresight require that the course suggested above be adopted and lessons from past experience should not be forgotten.

(iv) The administration of the Frontier should remain in the hands of the Central Government which should be the sole authority for determining whether reforms should be extended to the Frontier or not. Military and strategic considerations should be given the greatest possible weight for a decision on this point.

(v) And the advance in the Punjab must also be guided by similar considerations. Security of life and property must be guaranteed to His Majesty's subjects in this Province by adopting the suggestions mentioned above.

LAHORE.

Dated 5th November, 1928.

MORNING.

PRESENT:

ALL MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT COLONEL LANE-FOX), OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND), AND OF THE PUNJAB PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the NATIONAL REFORM PARTY.

1. Chairman: I think the leader of this deputation is Pandit Nanak Chand, a member of the Legislative Council, and advocate, and secretary and whip of the party?—(Pandit Nanak Chand): Yes.

2. And we know it is a deputation from the National Reform Party. The document is at pp. 86-97. We have before us a very large and very considerable deputation. I will just read the names, if I may, for convenience; it consists of: Rai Bahadur Moti Sagar, ex-judge of High Court and vice-chancellor of Delhi University; Rai Bahadur Durga Dass, advocate, High Court, and director of the Punjab National Bank; Rai Bahadur Ram Saran Dass; Lala Juggannath Agarwall, an advocate; Pandit Bishan Narain, a barrister; Rai Bahadur Sewak Ram, a member of the legislative council and a barrister; M. L. Puri, a barrister; Honorary Captain Dr. Maharaj Kishan Kapur; Mr. J. R. Agnihotri, a barrister and then I see the name of Lala Joti Pershad, a member of the legislative council and an advocate, is he here?—No.

3. Then there is Lala Gulshan Rai, a Fellow of the Punjab University, who, in some respects, has a few special points to raise?—Yes.

4. Dr. Narang: The time of our disposal is extremely short, and I would like you to make your answers as brief as you possibly can. If you have any documents to which you wish to refer, please give the references and do not trouble to read anything. The references will be carefully noted. The first question I want to put to you is this: What is your ideal as to the further instalment of constitutional advance in this country?—We are all in favour of Dominion Status, provided (1) there is complete abolition of the communal principle in all spheres, i.e., in the legislatures, the local bodies, and the services, and (2) there is no discrimination of any caste or religion in the matter of the distribution of civic rights or imposition of civic disabilities. These two propositions being granted, we are in favour of an advance towards Dominion Status. If communalism or communal representation is retained in any shape or form in any province of India, we are not in favour of any reform or any advance.

5. Is not that rather a broad proposition? Is this your deliberate opinion?—This is our deliberate opinion.

6. In what way has communal representation in the council, for instance, stood in the way of political advance in this country? Will you kindly briefly explain it?—Yes; in the first place communal representation has intensified communal hatred and bitterness. In the second place, it is responsible for frequent communal riots, murders and bloodshed, which have been taking place in the Punjab ever since the introduction of the Reforms.

7. Chairman: Do you think that is due to communal electorates?—Yes, and I have the authority of various members of this council to support this proposition. I will briefly give those authorities, because I am asked not to read the passages.

8. Dr. Narang: You mean quotations from the proceedings of the council?—Yes.

10. Dr. Narang: You mean to say even Hindus and Mahomedans, and all kinds of members, have condemned this?—All parties, whether Hindus, Muslims or Sikhs, have said that the state of communal tension which prevails in the Punjab has become worse ever since the introduction of the Reforms.

11. Have the Reforms that you have already obtained been utilised on communal lines?—Yes.

12. In what way, do you say?—Ever since the introduction of the Reforms there has been the giving of posts on a communal basis, and latterly on a caste basis as well. This principle has been extended to the municipalities in order to give the majority community here an advantage over the other minority communities. It is the deliberate opinion of the Hindus of the Punjab that this principle of communal representation has not been introduced into the district board because the Hindus would have gained by this and the Mahomedans would have lost by the introduction of this principle.

13. There is a party in your council which is called the National Unionist Party, is there not? What is the composition of it?—This party consists of all the Mahomedans, minus a few Khilafat gentlemen, and two Hindus. This party is in a different form a Muslim party, and I can give quotations from the speeches of the council, from these very members, to show that these agriculturists or rural names that have been given to it are mere camouflage.

14. So you mean to say that the distinction of rural and urban which is sought to be made out by this party, and which is the fundamental principle of this party, is merely a misnomer?—Absolutely. This party consists of Mahomedan gentlemen who belong to urban centres, and other gentlemen representing urban interests.

15. How has this principle affected the services? Has it led to any inefficiency in the services?—Yes.

16. You have heard what Mr. Emerson said. Do you agree with him?—Not at all. I will take that very department to which a reference was made, namely the Co-operative department.

17. Chairman: What is the particular thing that Mr. Emerson said?—I saw it reported in the papers that he said that it has not led to lowering of efficiency in the services, and I understood——

18. Whether he said it or not, your view is that the other view is the right one?—That efficiency has been lowered? That is the correct view.

19. Dr. Narang: What effect has it had on the probity of Government servants, this communal principle?—There were recently prosecutions for bribery, and always a communal defence was put up. If it was a Mahomedan who was being prosecuted it was always stated that that was due to the machinations of the Hindus, and if it was a Hindu who was prosecuted it was stated that it was due to the wickedness of the Mussalmans that he had been prosecuted.

21. Dr. Narang: I should like to know whether you agree with me in this view. Does not this communal principle make people nervous as to the coming of Swaraj?—Yes. That is what has been said more than once by the Hindus, that the power given to the members of any community on the basis of caste or religion is utilised simply for the purpose of dominating other communities.

22. Are you aware that there is a section in the Government of India Act (I refer to section 96) in which it has been definitely laid down: "No native of British India nor any subject of His Majesty resident therein shall, by reason of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour, or any of them be disabled from holding any office under the Crown in India." Has this provision of the Government of India Act been acted upon in practice in various departments?—No.

23. Are you satisfied with the wording of the section, or would you like to modify it in any way, particularly the word "disabled"? Would you like to substitute the word "prejudiced"?—Prejudiced, or disqualified—prejudiced and disqualified.

24. You would like to have this section amended?—Yes.

Dr. Narang: Now, you have made a great deal, in your Memorandum, of the evils of the Land Alienation Act. There are certain words used in your Memorandum which may not be quite familiar to some members of the Conference.

28. I see you put there agriculturists and non-agriculturists, Zamindar and non-Zamindar, privileged class and non-privileged class. Will you kindly explain what these expressions mean? What do you mean by an agriculturist for instance?—Agriculturist in the Punjab has not got the same meaning which this word carries elsewhere. "Agriculturist" here means a member of a particular caste or tribe, notified as an agricultural tribe under the Land Alienation Act. It is not necessary that a person should be a cultivator of the land or owner of the soil or subsisting on agriculture. Even if a person is following a learned profession, without owning an inch of land, he would be an agriculturist under this Act.

29. Chairman: If we speak accurately, he would be a member of an agricultural tribe. I do not think the Act uses the word "agriculturist" at all?—Agricultural tribe, yes.

30. Member of an agricultural tribe. We are very familiar with this, I may tell you. I think I could pass an examination on the Statute.

Dr. Narang: Yes, certainly you would, Sir.

Witness: Then there are non-agriculturists who (in spite of the fact they are agricultural tribes in the same sense as the notified agricultural tribes) are not declared or notified to be agriculturists.

31. Dr. Narang: You mean a person may be an agriculturist by profession and he may also be a landholder, and yet, for the purposes of this Act, he will not be regarded as an agriculturist?

Chairman: Let us be clear on this. He will not be regarded as a member of an agricultural tribe.

Witness: Or agricultural caste.

32. Dr. Narang: You have referred to this as an example of caste legislation?—Yes.

33. Have there been any other instances in the council of caste legislation of this kind? Was a Bill brought forward by Mr. Harkishen Lal when Minister that the Land Alienation Act should not apply to the acquisition of land for industrial purposes and so on?—Yes, and that was defeated by the votes of the so-called members of the agricultural tribes.

34. Are you aware that that Bill was based on the recommendations of the Industrial Commission, but none the less it was defeated?—I am not aware of it, but I take it that it was so.

35. Would you also class the Moneylenders Bill which was passed by the Punjab Legislative Council, as a measure of that kind, and actuated by the same feelings?—I regard the Moneylenders Bill as an effort made by the Mahomedans and a few members of the agricultural tribes to aim a blow at the trade and commerce of the Hindus and Sikhs of the Punjab. I said so in the debate, and this is the general view of Hindus of all shades of opinion.

36. It is only the Hindus who object to this Act, or do Mahomedans, who are not members of agricultural tribes, also object to it? Have you looked at this? (indicating document)—Yes. A representation was made by a number of Mahomedan gentlemen who have served in the Army and who want the abolition of this Act.

37. Twenty-six Mahomedan military officers who do not belong to agricultural tribes?—Yes.

38. Are you also aware there is a very important community among the Sikhs, called the Ramgariyas, who have also raised their voices against the Act?—In 1927 I attended a conference where the Ramgariyas and other Sikhs not belonging to agricultural tribes passed a resolution condemning this Act. Many of them made speeches saying they had been living on agriculture for generations and that that was their occupation, but that, in spite of that, they are not regarded as members of agricultural tribes.

39. Chairman: I wonder if you would help me about this, Dr. Narang? I appreciate the importance of this, I think, quite fully, but I feel a little confusion of mind as to what it is which it is suggested the Statutory Commission should recommend about it. You will, I am sure, at once appreciate, and so will the Pandit, that it would be a very strong order to say that what is asked for is a limitation of the powers of the local legislature, or that the Imperial Parliament should repeal some Act which has been passed by the local legislature.

Dr. Narang: That is not the object at all.

40. Chairman: Tell me in a sentence how far, having made the point absolutely prominent and clear, you think the details of the objections taken by different classes of people are relevant to this constitutional inquiry.

Dr. Narang: In order to show there is dissatisfaction, not only among Hindus, but also among Mahomedans and Sikhs who do not belong to the agricultural tribes, in regard to this caste legislation, of which the Land Alienation Act is only an example.

41. Chairman: I appreciate that you are using it as such. Does this lead up to a suggestion that there ought to be, in an amendment of the Government of India Act, some section or other . . . .

Dr. Narang: Yes, exactly. The object is that it should be made impossible for legislatures in India to frame any law based on caste distinctions or on a distinction which depends on birth in a certain community or caste.

42. Chairman: Have you, or those of you who think along those lines, got as far as drafting a suggested clause?

Dr. Narang: Yes.

Raja Narendra Nath: The memorandum* has suggested a draft clause.

Dr. Narang: It would conform to the desire of the Hindu community that the Government of India Act which will be passed by Parliament should make a declaration of certain fundamental principles, and one of the fundamental principles should be that nobody would be deprived of civic rights or of acquisition of property or the exercise of other rights by virtue of his creed, colour or caste or birth.

43. Chairman: Can you give me the page reference?

Raja Narendra Nath: Page 179.* An analogous clause is quoted from the Czechoslovak Constitution which has been cited with approval in the Swaraj Constitution framed by Mr. Iyengar.

44. Lord Burnham: It is said not to operate.

Dr. Narang: We are at a great distance and we do not know.

Raja Narendra Nath: Pages 179-181* deal with the point.

* Memorandum submitted by Raja Narendra Nath, vide pp. 163-190.

Chairman: I know the passage, but I like to see the thing in black and white. We have the draft clause here. If I may say so, I am trying, in your interest and that of everybody here, to help to conduct matters so as to get the work done expeditiously and within the time-table. I think the British Commissioners (if it is to them you are addressing yourself) are fully seized of this point, which is a very big one, and the illustration of the Land Alienation Act is certainly a very forcible illustration. The Raja Sahib, on page 179 of his memorandum, has gone to the very proper detail of drafting a clause; he has put in black and white for us the sort of suggestion he and his party would make. I myself think (though it is entirely for you) that that point is very clearly before us.

The Witness: I should like to draw your attention to the Nehru Committee's Report, where this is mentioned at page 102, Clauses (vi) and (xiii).

45. Dr. Narang: That is the All-Parties Conference. Now you have mentioned that, would you adopt all the fundamental principles which are laid down in the Report of the All-Parties Conference, and would you recommend them, or most of them, for inclusion in the Government of India Act?—Most of them. I have in my memorandum referred to some in Chapter VIII.

46. We need not go into those details, then. Coming to the depressed classes, they are also dissatisfied with this caste legislation and have raised their voices against it?—Yes.

47. There are eight lakhs of Chamars and six lakhs of Chuhras, together with Meghs, Dooms and others belonging to the depressed classes in the Punjab. They are all expropriated people who own no land and are under other disabilities?—Yes.

48. What do you say about them? You want those disabilities absolutely removed?—Yes, I want them placed on a level of equality with the high-caste Hindus and Mohamedans of the Punjab.

49. Do you want any separate representation for them?—No.

50. You are against separate representation?—Yes.

51. You believe if they were given separate representation their depressed state would become stereotyped?—They would be exploited by people who wanted to have some importance and who would not like to raise them to the status which they deserve.

52. I draw attention to page 92 of your memorandum, where you refer to how the Chief Secretary flung a taunt at you, saying, "If the honourable member says that the Government keeps them in a depressed economic position I might retort by asking him who is responsible for their low social position." You understand the meaning of this taunt, that the high-caste Hindus have kept them in this position. Do you agree with this?—I do not agree.

53. Have the high-caste Hindus done anything for the uplift of these people?—Yes. There are four societies which are definitely working for the uplift of these classes, and in Lahore, Brahmins and members of these depressed classes are often seen dining together. In the D. A. V. College, Lahore, which is one of the premier institutions of this province, the depressed class boys are admitted freely, and recently, when the Brahmin cooks objected to cooking meals for them, the authorities dismissed all the cooks. So far as other civic rights are concerned, the higher-caste Hindus and the Hindus in the Punjab Legislative Council have often drawn attention to their bad condition. Opposition has come, I am sorry to say, from the Mahomedans and from the Government.

54. That is given in your Memorandum?—There is one particular reference to which I wish to direct attention.

55. Chairman: Is it in the Memorandum?

Dr. Narang: Yes, page 91.

56. Dr. Narang: Would you like to raise the number of members of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

57. What number do you suggest?—I think there should be 150.

58. And you would have joint electorates?—Yes.

59. The Hindus in the Punjab are in a minority: Will not they be swept away by joint elections?—The Hindus in the Punjab are prepared to be made a sacrifice in the interests of national and democratic advance.

60. Without this you think there cannot be any real nationalism in the country?—And no democracy. We want these things to be absolutely abolished in all provinces, and especially in the United Provinces; the politics of that Province are always reacting on the politics of the Punjab.

61. You want it to be established as a convention that all communities should be represented in the Cabinet? You refer to this on page 95. Do you want that to be a rigid rule or a convention?—With regard to that passage, I may say that is my personal opinion, but the opinion of the Hindus is that a convention should be established that whenever a minister out of the Hindus is to be appointed, he should be someone who commands the confidence of the majority of the Hindus in the Punjab Legislative Council, and not a mere dummy in the hands of other ministers.

62. Chairman: How do you propose, as a matter of practical statesmanship, to establish that convention?—I would suggest that the Hindus who are members of the Punjab Legislative Council might be asked to propose two or three names of people who command the confidence of the majority, and the Governor should appoint one of them. This was the convention followed by Sir Malcolm Hailey in the present council of 1926.

63. You suggest the same with regard to the Mahomedan minister and the Sikh minister?—Yes.

64. And you think there ought to be in any given government a member from each community?—So far as the conditions of the Punjab are concerned I am of opinion this principle will have to be retained for some time at least, because now there is much communal bitterness and there is insecurity of life and property.

65. It seems that what you are proposing is to reintroduce an element of communalism?—No.

Chairman: You think not?

66. Dr. Narang: You want the ministry to be responsible to the council?—Yes.

67. Absolutely?—Yes.

68. And all subjects to be transferred?—Except law and order and justice, as I have stated in my memorandum.

69. And these you want to be centralised?—Yes.

70. Do you want the Central Government to have the power of superintendence, guidance and control over the provincial governments, or do you want the provincial governments (except in regard to certain matters which must rest with the Central Government) to be entirely independent, and federated only for certain purposes?—(Lala Juggannath Agarwall): So far as this is concerned, we do not believe in the principle of federal government for this country, for the reason that federalism is an expedient tried in countries where there are separate States and they want a kind of union between them. Here in India we have always had a Central Government, and to cut it into fragments and have independent provinces is an unheard-of thing. We therefore advocate the unitary government of India, the provinces being given certain powers.

71. You mean that India has never been a federated country; there has always been a strong Central Government, and the provinces are merely creatures of administrative convenience?—The history of India shows that whenever the country has been strong, the Central Government has been powerful; while whenever the Central Government becomes weak, India has been the prey of foreign invasion. We do not want that experiment to be tried again.

72. Chairman: Do you mean your desire is (taught by the lesson of history) that the Central Government should be strong?—Yes.

73. That would apparently involve the Central Government retaining in its own hands the power of interference in certain matters in all parts of India?—Yes, the power of superintendence, direction and control.

74. Dr. Narang: I want to put to you one question, and that will be my last. You have headed chapter VIII. of your Memorandum "Defence of India"?—(Pandit Nanak Chand): Yes.

75. What do you think are the peculiar features of this Province which have made you so anxious about the defence of India?—In the first place, the Punjab is almost a frontier province, and, therefore, the first attack will naturally be on the Punjab—excluding, of course, the North-West Frontier Province. Then, in the second place, in this Province the communities, especially the majority community, consists of ignorant people who are easily inflamed to violence by people whose interest it is to inflame these people to violence. In the third place, we have got evidence in the Press that at times when there is commotion of any kind these people have even sacrificed their property and other things, and have looked towards Afghanistan and other Mahomedan countries for protection. I would particularly refer, in this connection, to the Hijrat Movement, which took place in (I think) 1922-23. And, next to that, the Hindus in this Province have got great stakes; they are owners of land; in trade, industry and commerce their stakes are very great indeed, and they are nervous on account of the treatment that has been meted out to them by shutting the military appointments against various Hindu castes. They do not possess at this time the same martial spirit which ought to be there. That is due to the various conventions in the military department for keeping out the Hindus from those departments. Therefore, the question of defence of India is very important for the Hindus, especially the Punjab Hindus, and I would like to make some suggestions.

78. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Now, your view is that the introduction of the communal system of elections in this Province has directly led to communal dissension and communal riots?—Yes.

79. I presume you attribute this result not merely to the introduction of communal representation in the council, but also to the introduction of communal representation in the local bodies?—Yes, everywhere.

80. Are you aware that in all district boards in the Punjab the system of election is joint; also that in a very large majority of small town committees it is joint; and that in some municipal boards it is joint?—That is so.

81. One of the worst communal riots that has recently taken place in this Province took place in the town of Rawalpindi?—Yes.

82. Are you aware that the election to the municipal committee there is joint?—I want to make my position absolutely clear on this point. The system of communal representation in the local legislatures has led to the prominence of communal leaders, and communal newspapers have sprung up whose function it is to excite communal feeling, and that throughout the Punjab feeling among the Hindus is that it is impossible for Hindus and Mahomedans to live in peace whenever a commotion takes place.

83. Now, I put it to you in this way: That in the Legislative Council, in a very small number of town committees and in some municipal committees, there is separate representation; in all district boards, in a good many municipal committees, and in a very large majority of town committees there is the joint system, and both systems have been tried together in this Province. Your contention is that, nevertheless, the system of separate representation in this very small number of electorates has led to communal rioting, and that that is the direct cause of it. Is that your position?—No, my position is this: That in order to get proper men in the Legislative Council from the communal point of view, and in order to secure those men who would inflame communal passions, the newspapers and the leaders that have come to the forefront have created an atmosphere of distrust, which ultimately, on various occasions, even on the slightest pretext, bursts out in riots, in arson, in loot.

84. On page 87 of the first part of your Memorandum you state that, at the time of the three elections held so far, there has always been a strong desire on the part of the candidates and their supporters to give communal colour to their speeches and election manifestoes?—Yes.

85. You are referring there, I presume, to the council elections?—Yes.

86. And in the council there is a system of separate elections?—Yes.

87. That is to say, candidates of only one community have to contest the seat among themselves?—Quite so.

88. Why should there be an occasion for manifestoes of a communal nature when A, who is a Mahomedan, is contesting the seat with B, who is also a Mahomedan?—I will explain. People go to the voters and say, "Here we are to protect Mussalman rights," and, in order to appeal to the Mahomedan sentiments, the person who makes the strongest appeal to the Mahomedan fanaticism against the Hindus gets the largest number of votes, and vice versa.

89. And so among the Hindus also?—Yes. If a candidate knows that he has to rely on the Hindu votes as well he will take very good care that he does not appeal to the religious fanaticism of the voters.

90. I put this position to you. In a system of joint electorates, if in any particular constituency there was a majority of the Hindus and a minority of Mahomedans, and a Hindu and a Mahomedan candidate were contesting the seat for that constituency, would not the Hindu candidate make appeals to his Hindu electors that, because he is a Hindu, and will protect Hindu rights, therefore they ought to vote for him?—He might do it to-day on account of the communal atmosphere that has been created by these Reforms, but with the passing of time these communal colours are bound to disappear.

91. As the result of the introduction of joint electorates the immediate result may be to intensify all these passions?—No. I am very sorry, I did not make myself clear. I said it is possible for a candidate to make an appeal, if he is Mahomedan, to Mahomedan passions, but there would be other Mahomedans who would be contesting, and would be trying to rely upon Hindu votes, and thus there would be an atmosphere of better goodwill, mutual co-operation, than exists at present. You are thinking of one candidate against another candidate, but there might be several Hindu candidates and several Mahomedan candidates.

92. In the instance I have given you, is it your opinion that, with a single Hindu opposing a single Mohamedan in such a constituency, such a thing would occur?—It would not be intensified. That I have already stated.

93. Now, under the Morley-Minto Reforms you are aware that in this Province there was joint representation?—Yes.

94. Can you cite instances of elections held under those Reforms where ultimately, when the real contest came at the polling time, there were more members of one community left on the one side and more on the other? I suggest that, under those elections, what happened almost invariably was this, that in each constituency eventually the thing boiled down at the polls to a contest between one Mahomedan and one non-Mahomedan. Can you give other instances?—I have no knowledge of those elections.

95. Dr. Narang: You will remember that there were indirect elections, not direct elections?

Chairman: I was just going to ask that.

Witness: I am told by the Honourable Rai Bahadur Lala Ram Saran Dass that one, Mr. Yusuf Shah, stood against him, and he got the seat by one vote against him.

96. Chairman: * * * In the pre-Montford days (I think we say, do we not?)—the days when the Morley-Minto scheme held the field—the election was an indirect election?

Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: For members of district boards and municipal boards.

Dr. Narang: That argument does not hold good for all.

97. Chaudri Zafrullah Khan: Do I understand that the view which you give to the Conference is that in case your provisos are not accepted, you do not want any reforms?—Yes.

98. Do I understand that that represents not only your personal opinion, but the opinion of the whole deputation?—Yes, absolutely.

99. And all the recommendations, consequently, which you have made either orally to-day or in your written Memorandum, Part II., are based on that assumption?—Largely they are influenced by that consideration.

100. No, they are based upon that previous condition, that that will be the state of affairs in which those recommendations have to be introduced?—Most of them, yes. There might be one or two here and there which might have been influenced by communal considerations. Nobody can escape communalism in these days here.

101. I mean, all those recommendations are based on the consideration that a constitution of the kind indicated by you would be introduced?—Yes.

102. Chairman: Would you mind making quite clear to me as we go exactly what the condition is? I follow the condition about no disability in regard to civil rights, if any. The difficulty there, I think think, is largely a difficulty of definition, of drafting, and we have dealt with that; but I want to be quite clear as to what the other condition is. I should like to write it down. What I had written down was, "If a communal status is reserved in any part of British India, we ask for no advance." Is that correct?—I would state it in this way, that there should be a total abolition of the communal principle in the legislatures, local bodies, services and other spheres of civil rights.

103. Chairman: Shall I substitute "Communal principle"? I suppose the communal principle is the principle that the choice lies among certain people because they are members of a particular community?—Yes.

104. Is this what I am to understand from your party; that, if the communal principle, so defined, is retained in any part of British India — —?—I would add "in any shape or form."

105. Is it this, that if the communal principle, so defined, is retained in any shape or form in any part of British India, your party wishes for no constitutional advance?—Yes.

106. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Having said that, may I draw your attention to this difficulty? You would abolish all separate electorates and introduce joint electorates, but you would nevertheless insist on the representation of minorities (by which I understand you to mean the Sikhs and Hindus) in the Cabinet, and you would also enforce the joint responsibility of the ministers towards the Legislative Council?—I will make it clear. My party does not support my view given in the Memorandum

107. Does your party hold the view put forward in your Memorandum that a minister should have a sort of advisory board?—No. This is not the party's opinion. I reserve my personal opinion.

108. I am not asking for your personal opinion at all at this stage. In the services you give as an illustration of the working of the communal principle that efficiency and honesty have gone down in the co-operative department because in the co-operative sphere banias are not employed as bank managers.—That is the language of the registrar of co-operative societies. It do not refer to one particular class; banias are not the only candidates. But I do say that efficiency has definitely gone down.

109. Yes, I take that to be your position—that in the services efficiency has gone done because agriculturists have been employed, so far as the co-operative department is concerned, in large numbers. I have before me page 89 of the first part of your Memorandum. Is not it a fact, that these persons with regard to whose employment complaint has arisen are not employed by Government, but by the directors of those particular banks, and the employment lies with them?—I do not know by whom they are employed, but I am definitely referring to the report of the co-operative department.

110. The report says: "Directors are deplorably unwilling to employ non-agriculturists, though the bania is the best of all bank managers," and again: "The prejudice of certain directors against the employment of non-agriculturists as managers and accountants is unfortunate".—Whether it is the directors or the Government, the point is there.

111. With regard to the Land Alienation Act, I know that is brought in as an instance of class legislation, but is it a fact that the local Government can, if it likes, declare any particular tribe to be an agricultural tribe?—I am opposed to that. A tribe should not be declared to be an agricultural tribe at the sweet will of the local Government.

112. You may be opposed to it, but the local Government has that power?—Yes, and I am opposed to that. This power is exercised to the prejudice of the Hindus.

113. Yes, that is your point. With regard to the Moneylenders' Bill, which you cited as another example of this sort of legislation, I understand the principle of the Bill was that the keeping of accounts should be regulated?—No, not at all. We differ entirely from this. A Bill on those very lines was brought in in the Legislative Assembly, and the Government opposed the introduction of the Bill; it was opposed by the Government there in the Assembly.

114. What was the principle of the Bill to which you object?—This very principle of the regulation of accounts. Government did not agree to its introduction. It was introduced in the Punjab Council simply with the object of destroying the trade and commerce of the Hindus, and ultimately assent was not given to this Bill by His Excellency the Governor in the Punjab, though it passed the Legislative Council.

115. Your Memorandum states there are 2,800,000 depressed classes in the Punjab, or about an eighth of the total population of this Province. You make two complaints with regard to them, that they are not allowed to purchase village sites and that they are not allowed to purchase land; and on the constitutional question your complaint is that they cannot qualify for a vote. Would not your wishes be met if the tenant qualification in the urban areas, or even in rural areas (the payment of so much rent per mensem) was considerably lowered? Those classes could then qualify for the vote. Would not that be easier?—Not at all.

116. Let me put it in this way. Would not it be easier for a man to rent a house at Rs. 3 a month, rather than buy land paying a land revenue of Rs. 25?—In villages practically no houses fetch a rent of Rs. 3 a month.

117. What is the value of land in your district which pays land revenue to the extent of Rs. 25?—I am sorry, I cannot answer that. It might be Rs. 3,000 or Rs. 4,000.

118. I accept your figure; I do not want to contest it. You think it is easier for a member of the depressed classes to buy land of that value in order to qualify for the vote than to discover a house in a village which might carry a rent of Rs. 3?—My objection is based on a fundamental principle: I object to people being forbidden to purchase property which they would like to purchase. Why should a man have to purchase a house when what he wants is land?

119. Is there any statutory or other legal bar which prohibits a landlord in a village from selling a site if he so chooses to a non-proprietor?—There is no statutory prohibition, but customary law applies, and there is prohibition by customary law which is enforced in courts of law. A kamin cannot purchase property.

120. If a landlord chooses to sell a site to a kamin, the kamin is unable under the law to purchase it?—Yes, because the other landholders can pre-empt him out. I have stated that these village communities are feudal in character.

121. Do not you think it is a question of ownership rather than status? If a person owns a site in the village, he may choose to sell to one and not another?—These village communities are really feudal bodies which exercise certain feudal rights. When non-proprietors marry their daughters they have to pay certain dues to their proprietors; and when they have to perform certain other ceremonies they have to make a payment of certain dues to the proprietors. These are things which are opposed to the very fundamental idea of democracy, the elementary principle of which is the equality of all citizens of the State before the law.

122. So far as the franchise is concerned, would not it be better if a system of adult franchise was introduced, and thus all the depressed classes allowed to influence the elections?—I am not opposed to adult franchise, but I think the situation at the present time is such that it would be unworkable and would break down, because people have not got the political education necessary for exercising the vote.

123. Yet you recommend it in the case of elections for district boards, municipalities and town councils?—Yes, so that people may be educated and prepared for the extension of this principle in the larger sphere of the Legislature in time to come.

124. For the present, what further reduction in the franchise do you recommend?—Personally, do you mean?

125. No, as the representative of your party?—That is a question of detail. We will accept the present property qualification, or it may be slightly lowered.

126. So that at present you would not give to a larger class, so far as the Legislative Council is concerned, the opportunity to train themselves for the exercise of the vote?—I would give the franchise to those who are literate; and any test may be accepted to define a literate.

127. With regard to these specific matters in chapter II., you say trade, commerce, industries and universities should be represented, but landowners and tumandars should not?—Yes.

128. Industry has always been represented by a Hindu in this Province?—In the reformed councils, yes.

129. And the tumandars always by a Mahomedan?—Yes.

130. Take the case of the landholders, who return one Sikh, one Hindu and one Mahomedan?—That is the present situation. If those constituencies of big landholders are retained I wish there to be a special constituency for those who pay the same amount of income tax.

131. With regard to the question of majority and minority communities, are you aware that on the present franchise qualification the voting strength of the Mahomedans is only 42 per cent.?—44 per cent.

132. Say 44 per cent. Consequently, as against the non-Mahomedan communities combined, the Mahomedans are in a minority so far as voting strength is concerned?—I do not accept that statement at all. There are 19 districts which are predominantly Mahomedan.

133. My question is only this, that the voting strength of all the non-Mahomedans combined is in excess of the voting strength of the Mahomedans?—Yes.

134. Chairman: Still, what the Pandit was saying is an important point. I have noticed the appendix to the Nehru Report. There is an interesting analysis there. There is an interesting map, and it appears from that map as though there was a zone or portion of the Punjab which can clearly be described as overwhelmingly Moslem (broadly speaking, the western side of the Punjab), and there is a zone, or at least a series of districts, on the east; I will not say they are overwhelmingly Hindu, but they are overwhelmingly not Mahomedan (Hindu and Sikh together), and there is a certain number in the middle which are more of a mixed character. I think the Pandit is entitled to make the point that you cannot judge the thing simply by taking the general average.

Witness: That is exactly what I was submitting.

135. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Would it not meet with your wishes, so far as defence is concerned, if defence was made a central subject and the Central Government was given all the powers and the money necessary to provide for adequate defence?—I want the whole thing in the hands of the Central Government.

136. On page 97 of your constructive proposals—proposal No. 3—I find that the minority communities should have special facilities for being trained in the offensive and defensive methods of warfare. Would you not, on the same principle, give to the backward communities, whoever they may be, special facilities for education and training to take a larger share in the administration of the Province?—By a certain convention invented by the British Government these so-called non-martial races have been kept out of their training ground, and, in order to make up for that, I have made that suggestion. So far as the so-called backward communities are concerned, there has been no prohibition either by law or by convention keeping them out of educational facilities. But I am ready to accede to this, that, so far as education is concerned, so far as grants of money are concerned, they may be given in a larger measure to those communities who are backward—be they Hindu, Musalman or Sikh. I believe that education is the real thing which prepares people for democracy, and, therefore, if any money is given I cannot object to it at all.

137. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Does this Memorandum represent your personal views or the views of your party in the council?—Except with regard to the Land Alienation Act the whole of this Memorandum represents the views of my party. With regard to the Land Alienation Act, there are three persons in my party who would like to see the definition of "agriculturist" as a person who cultivates with his own hand to be substituted for the definition which exists to-day.

138. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Did you circulate your memorandum to the members of your party?—Yes, to most of them.

139. Did you circulate them also to those members of your party belonging to the notified agricultural tribes?—There might be one or two who might have been left out because I knew their views on these subjects.

140. You are personally in favour of the Land Alienation Act being repealed altogether?—Totally in its present form.

141. Do you think any of the members of your party who belong to the notified agricultural tribes would subscribe to that view?—I have not ascertained that particular question from them.

142. You represent a rural constituency?—Yes.

143. You advocate that rural representation should be curtailed and urban representation should be increased?—I have never said that it should be curtailed. I have said that there should be proper representation of the urban population who pay taxes to a larger extent than they are given now. The words used by me are that "they should be effectively represented."

144. Will you do it by increasing the number of constituencies for urban areas?—No. I am opposed to the distinction of urban and rural constituencies also. What I would say is this, that these people who have special interests—for example, commerce, trade and industry—should be given larger representation than they enjoy at present. Instead of there being one seat, there might be four or ten seats. That, of course, is a question of detail.

145. Will you allow a proportionate increase in rural representation?—Now, I would like to know what you mean by "rural."

146. You have used the word "urban"?—In the sense of town versus country.

147. And "rural" in the sense of country versus town. Would you allow a proportionate increase to rural representation?—No.

148. Do you think that, if this distinction of rural and urban constituencies were to be abolished, urban elements would be more largely represented in the council?—There is in my mind absolutely no distinction between urban and rural They are so interconnected with what one may regard as rural I may regard as urban. Let me illustrate my point. I belong to a village. All my life I have lived there and I have now settled in Lahore for the purpose of practising here. Am I rural or urban? In the same way Dr. Narang comes from a village.

149. Chairman: I understand your point to be this, that you think that the towns as at present constituted are not adequately represented as against the countryside?—Yes.

150. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Suppose the present distinction between rural and urban constituencies is abolished, do you not think that towns will be represented to a much greater extent than at present?—I have not gone through this in detail

151. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: You have no information on this?—As regards the actual number that will be put in the constituencies.

152. What is the number of members of your party in the council?—Eighteen or nineteen, I think.

153. How many of them belong to agricultural tribes?—Four.

154. Is any of these four persons present in this deputation?—No.

155. Is there any member belonging to a notified agricultural tribe present in your deputation?—No.

156. Mr. Owen Roberts: You suggested the transfer of law and order to the Central Government?—Yes.

157. Did you consider the transfer of commerce also?—I have not considered.

158. Would you be prepared to accept it?—It requires thinking over.

159. Because in another part of your Memorandum you definitely ask for having safeguards protecting the interests of minorities?—That is with regard to taxation. I have made that clear by stating that income tax and other such taxes should not be made over to the Punjab Council. I think I have explained my point there.

160. Sardar Ujjal Singh: You said, in reply to one question, that communal electorates do not exist in local boards. But are you aware of the fact that a formula of population and voting strength was created by the Ministry of Local Self-Government, and instructions were issued that constituencies in local boards are to be so framed as to give a certain proportion to various interests?—That is so.

161. And does not that keep alive a spirit of communalism in those bodies too?—Yes.

162. The second question is, if communalism or a spirit of communal representation is kept alive in this Province and done away with in other provinces, do you think you can drive out the spirit of communalism from the country?—Never.

163. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: You are very anxious to see that the depressed classes get representation. May I ask if you would not give them separate representation if they have no chance otherwise?—I am totally opposed to separate representation. I have said that I do not want any reforms if that is a condition.

164. Even if the depressed classes remain unrepresented?—Because from my experience I find that the dominant community, the Mahomedans, are not anxious to raise the status of the depressed classes.

165. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: You have expressed your opinion that communalism should be entirely abolished. May I know your views as to whether a reservation of seats for the minority communities and joint electorates will suit your purpose. That is one step in advance of the present one?—We are totally opposed to this also. We do not want communalism in any shape or form. I have made it emphatically clear.

166. Chairman: If the communal principle was reserved in any shape or form in any part of India you would rather have no constitutional advance; and when you speak of communal principle being reserved in any shape or form you include the provision of reserved seats in any part of India?—Yes.

167. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: You have expressed your opinion that law, justice and order should be made entirely central subjects and transferred to the Government of India?—Yes.

168. The general trend of feeling is that these subjects should be made transferred subjects in the local Government. May I know, for my information and for the information of the Conference, what advantage you or your party think will be effected by having these subjects transferred to the Central Government?—I am very glad you have put this question. The question of justice or the High Court has been constantly coming up before the Legislative Council and attacks have been made on High Court Judges and the constitution of the High Court, and that has led really to lowering of efficiency in the judicial service; and, with regard to the recruitment of the services, all these considerations, communal considerations have been imported into recruitment to the judiciary. If the subject were made a central subject it would be away from local influence and people would not be so ready to level attacks on the judges who have to deal out justice between man and man.

169. Are you sure that the influence of communalism will not prevail in the Assembly or the Central Legislature?—If my scheme is accepted there will be absolutely no communalism.

170. As regards the services, you have expressed your opinion that efficiency has suffered on account of communalism having been given consideration to in appointments. Of course, I am personally of the opinion that efficiency must be kept in the services. But may I know if there is any safeguard for keeping up the efficiency, taking into consideration the fact that every community should be represented in the service of the Province?—I have suggested some safeguards in my speech. Supposing a community feels that it can produce better men physically there might be a physical test. I have no objection to that. Supposing a community feels that they can produce fat men, there may be a test for that. The one thing I wish to rule out absolutely is the consideration of caste and religion in the recruitment to the services. In my speech in the Council, made in July, 1927, I made it clear.

171. Dr. Narang: Uniform standard?—Yes, a uniform standard, leaving out caste and religion, because then there would be no favouritism.

172. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: So, your view, or the view of your party, is that if communalism is not to be abolished the present form of government should be maintained and no further reform should be given?—A conference was held some time ago, the Hindu conference which was held at Lahore when this Honourable Commission visited this country previously, and that conference was of opinion that the present reforms should also be withdrawn if this system is kept on. They were so emphatic.

173. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: You have stated, Pandit Nanak Chand, that, in your view, if communal representation or communal electorates are maintained, you do not want any constitutional advance. Could you please tell the Conference whether you will guarantee this attitude on the part of the Hindu community all over India?—It is for other people to say what they feel. This is our opinion. I do not hold a brief for the Hindus all over India.

174. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: You have said that communal representation and communal electorates are responsible for hatred and bitterness among the communities. Would you please tell me if the formation of parties in the Legislative Council here has been on communal lines?—Yes, on communal lines. The cleavage of party is communal.

* * * * * * * * * * *

176. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: With regard to the services you think that efficiency must be maintained at any cost?—Yes.

177. For that reason you would have any efficient man, irrespective of his being a Hindu, Mahomedan, or Sikh?—Certainly. I made a declaration on behalf of my party in the Punjab Legislative Council that even if cent. per cent. posts go to Mahomedans, we do not mind.

178. Supposing you get for the different services very efficient men belonging to the European community, would you rather not give up the principle of Indianisation of services?—I do not recognise the principle at all. I say all citizens of the State are equal in the eyes of the law. If he is a British citizen who has been naturalised here, he will have equal opportunities along with others. I make no reservation in favour of Europeans.

179. Then you would advocate Indianisation of services on those lines?—No, no. That is not my point. I do not recognise that Europeans are in any way superior to Indians in the matter of administration.

180. If you find more efficient men among Europeans then you would not stick to the principle of Indianisation of services?—If they are Indian citizens, then only they can come in.

181. Dr. Suhrawardy: You said you are opposed to Indianisation in any shape or form and the application of that principle to the services. Do you not consider Indianisation of services a form of communalism?—I have given a definite reply to this question. I do not reserve any seat for any community. I do not admit the principle of reserving so many seats for Indians and so many for Europeans.

182. You are opposed to the reservation of seats for Europeans?—For Europeans or for any particular community.

183. You have said that communal electorate is responsible for communal tension. Have you considered that the caste system is also regarded by some prominent Hindu leaders as being responsible for communal tension and an obstacle to political advancement and a great enemy of Hinduism?—No, but so far as caste is concerned I certainly regard it as an impediment in the way of nationality. We are trying our best to remove that.

184. Do you not think that caste system is a greater obstacle to advancement because the system has been going on from the time of Vikramaditya and Asoka?

Dr. Narang: There was no caste system in the time of Asoka.

185. Dr. Suhrawardy: You said you are opposed to political advance if communal electorate is granted in any shape or form in any province?—Yes.

186. You had the communal electorate introduced for the first time under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms; but so far as my Province, Bengal, is concerned, we had the communal electorate introduced since 1903, that is the Minto-Morley Reforms?—Yes.

187. And no objection was ever raised by any Hindu leader. In 1915 Mr. Gokhale, in his political speeches, also spoke in favour of communal representation?—He was wrong.

188. In 1916 the Congress League Scheme recognised communal representation and allocated the number of seats to the Mussalmans, in the Punjab, Bengal, and so on?—That was the greatest blunder ever made.

189. Let me remind you of another greatest blunder that Sir Surendra Nath Banerjea, the great tribune of the people, introduced for the first time, the element of communal representation in the Calcutta Corporation, although I opposed him tooth and nail in the Bengal Legislative Council?—I am very glad you did it. I have given a reply to your question at page 94 * * *.

190. I only want facts to be placed before the Conference. And Mr. C. R. Das, in the Bengal Pact, accepted the principle of communal representation for Bengal?—I want to read my reply to this. In Part II of the Memorandum I have stated at page 94:—"The Indian politician, on the other hand, anxious to break down the existing system of government at all costs, has not unnaturally followed the example set by the Government and has accepted the communal principle in order to win the favour of the Mahomedan community and also conceded to it certain privileges which he refused to other minorities."

191. You say that the Moneylenders Bill, which was vetoed by the Government, is a blow aimed at the Hindus?—I repeated it many a time and my opinion was endorsed by many others.

192. You consider it a blow aimed at the Hindus because Hindus are moneylenders, and that Mahomedans are shackled by chance to the Hindus in that way. That is why you say it was a blow?—No. It was a communal blow aimed at the non-Muslim by Muslims.

193. But is it not a fact that moneylenders are Hindus?—I do not agree with that.

194. Are you in favour of joint responsibility in the Cabinet?—Yes.

Dr. Suhrawardy having finished his examination, the witness said: "I want to make clear one answer that I gave with regard to the caste system. As regards the abolition of the caste system, I meant it to apply only so far as political and civic privileges are concerned; but, so far as social privileges are concerned between man and man, anybody may retain it or may not retain it."

195. Chairman: You do not propose, for example, that a member of the depressed class should have a right to enter the Hindu temple?—I do not say that. I exclude that point from consideration at the present time. We are not concerned with this question at present. We are concerned with the question of civil or political rights.

196. Sir Arthur Froom: I would just like to invite your attention to the draft in the Memorandum of Raja Narendra Nath in connection with the proposal to protect various communities. The draft is at page 179, with which you have announced your thorough agreement?—Yes.

197. Would you tell the Conference whether you see any difference between that draft clause and paragraph VII., sub-clause (3), of the Instrument of Instructions to Governors? * * * My question is this: Is there any material difference between the proposed draft clause which you want embodied in any future Government of India Act and sub-clause (3) of paragraph VII. of the Instrument of Instructions to Governors?—I want it to be statutory.

198. No, no; I am not on that yet. Do you see any material difference?—I see that caste and birth have not been mentioned in that. I am very particular about caste and birth.

199. Chairman: I think we had better read it. In the Instrument of Instructions to Governors, sub-clause (3) of paragraph VII., says: "To see that no order of your Government and no Act of your Legislative Council shall be so framed that any of the diverse interests of or arising from race, religion, education, social condition, wealth or any other circumstance, may receive unfair advantage, or may unfairly be deprived of privileges or advantages which they have heretofore enjoyed, or be excluded from the enjoyment of benefits which may hereafter be conferred on the people at large." Probably you regard it as insufficient?—Yes.

200. Sir Arthur Froom: It is stated here: "No Act of your Legislative Council shall be so framed that any of the diverse interests of or arising from race, religion, education, social condition, wealth or any other circumstance, may receive unfair advantage"?

—That is not sufficient. There must be a clause in the constitution itself.

201. Chairman: May I put the question in this way? Do you consider that these instructions to Governors are not sufficiently effective?—They are not.

202. And therefore for that reason you want a somewhat similar clause inserted in the Government of India Act to make it statutory?—Yes.

203. If I may say so, I have a certain amount of familiarity with this question in connection with constitutions of different kinds. I think the Pandit's real point is this. He would like to have the provision of the safeguard of this sort enacted in such a way that it will be open to anybody who felt aggrieved and who thought that what has been done was in conflict with it to challenge in the law courts what is being done as being beyond the powers of the Legislature or the Executive? That is your real point?—Yes.

204. There are instances of that sort—they are not numerous—in some of the constitutions under the British system, but they are by no means always found to work very effectively. If it is desired to limit the power of a legislature it is necessary to use very clear words, and there must be a challenge in the law courts if the limit is exceeded. That is your point?—Yes, quite so.

205. Pandit, let me repeat what I have got down as your view, which you say is the view of your party. Is this right, that if the communal principle is retained in any shape or form in any part of British India, your party wishes for no constitutional advance?—Yes, it is our view.

206. And I understand that, when you speak of objecting to the communal principle in any shape or form, you object to the reservation of seats on the ground of religion or race?—Yes.

207. Have you looked at the very interesting document supplied for the Commission by one of my colleagues, Raja Narendra Nath, who is the president of the party for which you are speaking?—Yes.

Raja Narendra Nath: That document must be read with the supplementary note which I issued. It contains answers to my queries.

208. Chairman: Subject to anything in the nature of a supplementary note, you are aware that his proposal is that there should be joint electorates in principle, but that separate electorates should be provided wherever the community which is in a minority in the Province desires it. That, of course, is not your present proposal at all?—It is not.

209. Somewhere on page 164 Raja Sahib says that it is unjust to force joint electorate if the minority is unwilling. I understand your view is, whether they are willing or unwilling, you would insist on joint electorate?—Yes.

210. You know that this matter was very carefully considered, to all appearances, in what is called the Nehru Report. You are aware that what you are proposing is quite inconsistent with that?—Yes, they are in error; that is our opinion.

211. Even the most perfect document may have a flaw. On page 54 we read: "The principle we have adopted is that wherever such reservation has to be made for the Muslim minority it must be in strict proportion to its population." You are opposed to that?—Yes. We are opposed to the principle of communal representation.

212. Your party is opposed?—Yes.

213. In the same way this document under the chapter which is called "Recommendations" actually has a heading "Communal Representation." Your view would be that the communal representation should be dealt with by saying there shall not be any?—Yes.

214. But this document provides, "there shall be no reservation of seats for any community in the Punjab and Bengal; in provinces other than the Punjab and Bengal there will be reservation of seats for Muslim minorities on population basis with the right to contest additional seats," a provision that should last for the next ten years?—They want to please the Muslims and therefore they have arrived at a sort of compromise; otherwise they are opposed to the principle.

215. You think that this document is really drawn up in a effort to please the Muslims?—This particular portion.

216. The provision of communal representation is really drawn up in an effort to please the Muslims?—Yes; they were following the Government in this matter.

217. Are you in favour of appointments to official positions in the Punjab administration being regulated by a Public Services Commission?—Yes, I am.

218. You are opposed to the matter being left in the hands of the Minister?—Yes, I am opposed.

219. With regard to law and order and justice, your view is that they ought not to be transferred to provincial Ministers but they ought to be centralised?—Yes.

220. Of course you realise that it is very easy to say that they ought to be centralised and it is much more difficult to construct a workable scheme. Have you in your document—I do not think you have—given any suggestions?—I have not, but Mr. Gulshan Rai has something to say on it.

(Mr. Gulshan Rai) : I propose the transfer of police to the Central Government on the ground that we want Indian solidarity, and also in the interests of military strategy and in the interests of public peace and tranquillity being maintained on uniform principles. I have also given a scheme in the memorandum which is in the hands of the Conference to the effect that it can easily be done by taking away the revenue-collecting functions from the deputy commissioner and retaining him as the head of the police, as he is at present, and keeping him also as the district magistrate as at present, and so long as the judicial and executive functions are not separated, he can also be given such All-India subjects as income tax, post office, etc. In that case the deputy commissioner will become practically an officer of the Central Government. He will work under the supervision of the Governor, and he will act as Agent to the Governor-General so far as the police is concerned.

221. I was only asking you whether you had realised the practical difficulties. I do not say it is an impossibility. You realise of course that under the present conditions of this country police assistance is sometimes needed very suddenly, and may also be needed in connection with the administration of some department on the transferred side. A most innocent-looking act may sometimes produce some trouble?—Yes, and sometimes the assistance of military is also necessary.

222. Fortunately I understand that is not very often. But do you think your scheme really provides for the effective business of getting police on the spot for all possible support?—I think so, because the deputy commissioner and the superintendent of police will still remain in the locality concerned.

223. Did I hear you say that Hindus are not enlisted in the Indian Army?—(Pandit Nanak Chand) : What I meant to say was that there are certain Hindu tribes and castes which by convention are regarded as non-martial classes, for example, the Khatris, who provided men for Ranjit Singh's army.

224. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Panditji, you have stated that the state of communalism in this country is intensely bitter. I presume you mean that it could not be more bitter than it is?—It can be made worse.

225. How will the fact that there is no constitutional advance improve the situation?—I have stated that if constitutional advance is to be made with separate electorates the situation will become worse. If constitutional advance is made with the abolition of these communal electorates, things will improve.

226. Even if there is a reservation of seats?—Reservation of seats will always help to embitter the feelings, though they will not be so bitter as they would be if there were separate electorates. That will be a better system than the present one, but it is not a democratic or a national system.

227. I am sure you are using the word "democratic" in its widest sense. The Nehru Committee provides for the reservation of seats only for ten years?—Yes.

228. You say that in your Province the difference between the urban and the rural classes and the agricultural and non-agricultural classes has led to bitterness. Now supposing the distinction between the urban and rural classes is removed, then you will get a larger number of urban representatives into the Legislative Council. Would that bring a better class and a more intellectual class of men into the Legislative Council?—Certainly.

229. And thus improve its efficiency?—Yes.

230. Chairman: I do not know whether I may just ask this one question. Of course you know that a main objection which is taken by, I think, a great majority of the Mahomedan community to the idea of abolishing separate electorates, is that if you have a joint electorate there would be a serious risk that the Mahomedan who was returned would not be what they will regard as a good representative of their community. We have heard that argument many times. I am not asking you to say whether it is a good argument or not. But have you yourself, as a practical constitutional student, thought of any method by which that might possibly be got over? I may mention a suggestion which has been made to us at Poona. It involves the reservation of seats which you do not like. But the suggestion is that the Mahomedans should, in the first instance, choose a panel, a list, of candidates, whom they would regard as satisfactory representatives of the Mahomedan view —what I think the Americans sometimes call "a primary"—and then the general constituency, the joint electorate, should elect its members, and if there was a seat for the Mahomedans the choice would be between the different Mahomedans who have been nominated to stand by the Mahomedan community. I am not saying anything at all of the merits of the scheme, and I have not at present any views and I would like to know if you have any views on it. The argument in its favour is said to be that, while on the one hand you might secure that the Mahomedan member was a man who was satisfactory to the Mahomedan feeling (which is a very natural wish on the part of the Mahomedans) and not a turncoat or a sham Mahomedan and a man who is simply there pretending to represent the Mahomedan view but really in the hands of other interests, at the same time the man who is actually elected would feel that he is responsible to a constituency which is not purely Mahomedan, and therefore would be disposed to take a view when he took his seat that he should give fair consideration to communities other than his own?—I personally have not considered this suggestion and I cannot give any answer off hand.

231. You have exercised a wise discretion, if I may say so, because this is not a matter on which anyone can give an opinion in haste. This is one of the many ways in which it is proposed to solve the question. I am not saying that is a suggestion which will meet the Mahomedan view. It must receive adequate and proper consideration. I have not the slightest glimpse of Mahomedan opinion on this point?—We will give the matter our best consideration.

Memorandum submitted by the All-India Muslim League.

1. Preliminary.—The number of individuals who actually authorise the representation made herein is an overwhelming majority of the Musalman community of India, numbering over seventy millions, whose political, economic, social, religious and general interests are the care of the All-India Muslim League with its Council and its provincial, district and local organisations.

In this memorandum the All-India Muslim League represents the view and sentiments of the Muslims of India as a whole, touching only such matters as come within the purview of a central body. It reserves to provincial bodies or other Muslim organisations the right to supplement the demands made herein, by means of memoranda which may be submitted separately by them. This is in recognition of the principle of decentralisation, as each province is the best judge of the peculiar conditions prevailing therein. The demands which have been set forth are based on the needs of the next stage of the Reforms in the light of the present situation in the country, and without prejudice to any further constitutional developments at any future time which may be consonant with the pledge of "responsible government within the British Empire," which has been given by the British Parliament in laying down the goal of its policy in India, as well as with the legitimate aim of the people of India to reconcile that pledge ultimately with a constitution framed on democratic lines.

2. Working of the System of Government.—At the outset the League desires to stress forcibly the danger of framing any new constitution which, by not paying full regard to the actually existing conditions, tends to create an oligarchy. In a vast continent like India, as large as Europe minus Russia, divided into a large number of provinces, many of which are larger than some of the countries of Europe, inhabited by 318 millions differing in race, creed, language, social customs, traditions and material interests, it is most essential that the constitution should be founded on the needs and rights of all. For this purpose the representation of the principal communities in the legislatures, local bodies, educational institutions and public services should be so regulated that no injustice is done to any, and at the same time as a sure foundation has been laid for a government which will be thoroughly representative of the most important communities and interests the uplift of the backward classes and weaker sections should be provided for by reasonable concessions. The chief defect of the present system of government has been that although safeguards have been embodied in the present constitution, such as special representation in the case of the Muslim community, they have not served to counteract monopolisation by the community which is treated as the largest majority. The League believes that the artificial census division of the population, as a result of which all Indians who are neither Christians nor Muslims are termed Hindus, has resulted in the over-representation of caste-Hindus to the detriment of the interests of the pre-Aryan or depressed classes, as well as of other large or important communities. It is, therefore, necessary that (a) a new classification be made early and authoritatively, (b) a more equitable basis of Muslim representation be fixed by statute and that meanwhile the average increase of population be added to the figures of the 1921 census in order to obtain the basis for the present representation of their communities, and (c) such readjustment be devised with an eye to associating at the earliest possible time both British India and the Indian States as a homogeneous nation in working out the salvation of the country on the lines of a federal government.

3. Basis of Franchise.—As the franchise and electorates are the very foundation of a constitutional structure the League proposes a very careful examination of these two subjects. The existing franchise for our legislative bodies, central as well as provincial, is too high, with the result that these bodies cannot be said to be truly representative of the people. There is more to be gained by a voter being required to be a sufficiently literate person than by his possessing a property qualification. Moreover, it is unfair that all Indians who belong to such minorities as have not been given the right of separate communal representation should be included in one generic term, e.g., "non-Mahomedan," in the Punjab. Indeed, the consequence of the classification has already been to promote an oligarchy in the country. If, therefore, the franchise is lowered and widened and if communities are justly represented, our legislative bodies will be more truly representative of the people and will prove more effective in furthering the common interests. The League in these circumstances suggests:—

(a) That the franchise for the Council of State (if an upper house of the Central Legislature is to be maintained in the new constitution) should be widened so that all persons who now possess a vote for the Legislative Assembly should in future have a vote for the Council of State.

(b) All those who have at present the right to vote for the provincial legislative councils should have a vote for the Central Legislature;

(c) For the elections of the provincial legislatures, there should be universal adult suffrage. This, of course, implies the suffrage for election to the local bodies will also be universal.

(d) There should be a difference between the qualifications of voters and candidates in all electoral procedure.

4. Electorates.—In the matter of the electorates the League holds that a system of separate electorates for the Musalmans is to-day as much a fundamental principle of the constitution as it was when first introduced by the Minto-Morley Reforms and since confirmed by the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, when it was stated that "so far as the Musalmans at all events were concerned the present system must be maintained until conditions alter, even at the cost of a lower progress towards the realisation of a common citizenship." It may be pointed out that the results of the introduction of separate communal electorates, which were also extended to the Punjab and Bengal, were from every point of view so beneficial that even a Hindu majority in the U.P. Legislative Council agreed to extend the system to local bodies. In this connection the League would invite the attention of the Commission to the evidence given by Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, late Minister in the United Provinces, before the Muddiman Committee, to the effect that the separate electorates of the Muslims lessened friction between them and the Hindu community—vide Reforms Enquiry Committee's Report, Appendix 16, Vol. I., pages 316-319. The League may indeed claim that the separate electorates, by preventing recurring causes of friction, have actually tended to promote mutual co-operation and goodwill between the two communities. The causes of the communal tension which has existed are to be found in other directions; and certainly the cry raised by a certain section of the Hindu politicians and of the Hindu Press that the separate electorates are responsible for riots and bloodshed is entirely artificial and unjustified. An analysis of the real causes of such disorders and tragedies is given in an article appended to this memorandum. The entire Muslim community of India, as represented by the League, is most emphatically opposed to any scheme of a joint electorate with or without reservation of seats; and the separate electorate of the Musalmans may be regarded as the cornerstone of the Reforms.

MEMORANDUM BY THE ALL-INDIA MUSLIM LEAGUE. [Continued.

5. Size of Legislative Bodies and Constituencies.—Connected with the two questions of franchise and electorates is that of the size of our legislative bodies. Compared with the legislatures of all democratic Governments in the West, the size of our legislative bodies is extremely inadequate to secure effective representation of the Indian population. With the lowering and widening of the franchise, the existing disproportion between the communities will be further accentuated. The League, therefore, suggests that in future the number of the members of the Upper House of the Central Legislature (if maintained) should be raised to 150 and that of the Lower House to 400. The League further desires to state that, in the matter of Muslim representation on the Central Legislature, the Musalmans feel, in view of the vital issues involved, that in no case should they be given less than 33 per cent. of the seats filled by election in each of these two houses. In the case of the various Provincial Legislative bodies, the seats should be increased so as to provide one representative for each unit of 100,000 of the population.

The League is further of the opinion that most of the existing constituencies, both rural and urban, are too large and should be reduced in size to manageable proportions.

6. Muslim Representation in the Provinces.—There is an important grievance of the Muslim communities of the Punjab and Bengal in connection with the existing scheme of representation for the Provincial Legislative bodies to which the League desires to draw attention in this place. Among the nine provinces in which the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms have been introduced, the Punjab and Bengal are the only two Provinces in which the Musalmans are in a majority of the population. Nevertheless they have, in the existing circumstances, been deprived of their majority position, since against the nominal award of 50 per cent. representation in the Punjab, there are, as a matter of fact, in the Provincial Legislature, only 34 Muslims out of 71 elected members. In Bengal, in spite of the fact that 50 per cent. representation was recommended for the Muslim community (vide the Fifth Reforms Despatch of the Government of India dated April 23, 1919), the Joint Parliamentary Committee awarded the Musalmans of that province only 40 per cent. representation in the Provincial Council. The League submits that this state of things is entirely opposed to all democratic principles, and it urges the Commission to take this opportunity of redressing the grievious wrongs of the Muslims in these two provinces in these respects. The demand of the Muslim community which the League desires to submit with particular emphasis is for the full Muslim representation in these two provinces according to the population of the Musalmans and the practical enforcement of the principle that a majority community shall in no case be reduced to a minority or even to an equality.

In the provinces where the Muslims are in a minority their representation should, in future, bear the same proportion to the elected members of the Legislature as that of the Muslims to the number of elected members in the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme and be also fixed by statute at a figure in each province which is adequate to meet the considerations of their political and historical importance, their inferiority in numbers and their backwardness both economically and educationally, owing to the handicaps of the past. The League has no objection to the non-Muslims being given the same concession in Provinces when they are in a small minority, subject, of course, to the principle enunciated above.

7. North-West Frontier Province.—For years past an overwhelming majority of the population in the settled districts of the North-West Frontier Province have been demanding the introduction of constitutional and administrative reforms calculated to bring their Province in line with the rest of India. This demand has been supported unanimously by the whole of Muslim India. It has also the support of the Indian National Congress as well as of a majority of what is known as the Brey Committee appointed by the Government of India some six years ago, who have virtually admitted that the peace of India depends on the tranquility of the border, which can only be assured by the contentment of the people of the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan. Had the North-West Frontier Province not been separated from the Punjab, the settled districts would have enjoyed the benefits of both the Minto-Morley and the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. Education has, in fact, made even greater strides in these districts than in many parts of India. The only ground which, according to what was said in the debate in the Legislative Assembly during the session which has just concluded, stands in the way of Government is the alleged opposition of the Hindu minority in that Province. Recent events connected with the visit of a delegation of the Central Legislature to the North-West Frontier Province have made it clear that the alleged opposition is artificial and confined to a comparatively small section. Moreover, it only shows that this particular school of Hindu politicians does not want reforms in any Province where its co-religionists are in a minority, and advocates their introduction only in the Provinces where the Hindu community constitutes a majority of the population. Were the Muslim community in the various provinces in India also to adopt such an unreasonable attitude all constitutional advance in this country would become absolutely impossible. The delay which has taken place in this connection is already a source of serious discontent among the Muslim community, and the League is very much afraid that, unless the present investigation by the Royal Commission results in satisfying this legitimate aspiration of the people of the North-West Frontier Province, there will not only be widespread resentment throughout Muslim India, but also material change in the viewpoint from which the Indian Mussalmans have hitherto regarded the Indian political problem. The League, therefore, earnestly hopes that the Royal Commission will recommend this much-needed reform to the British Parliament.

The need for introducing reforms in British Baluchistan is equally imperative.

8. Separation of Sindh.—The League is unable to see any reason why the Province of Sindh should continue to be tied to the apron-strings of the Bombay Presidency. Neither on an ethnological, geographical and linguistic basis, nor on any other ground whatever, is the present arrangement justifiable. The mere accident that it was the Bombay Army which conquered Sindh has led to the incorporation into that Presidency of a Province which has no consanguinity whatever with it. Indeed, its absorption into that Presidency has resulted in its educational, material and civil progress being greatly retarded. This unnatural state of things has hitherto deprived Sindh of its own university as well as of a high court. Owing to the jealousy of Bombay hardly anything has been done towards further developing the Port of Karachi, one of the biggest grain export centres in India. While Bombay proper thrives mainly on its commerce and trade, Sindh is mainly agricultural, and, in the past, agricultural development in the Province has been utterly neglected. The League, therefore, strongly urges that the Province of Sindh should be separated from the Bombay Presidency and should have its own separate executive and legislative machinery.

9. Muslim Minority Provinces.—With the redistribution of legislative and administrative areas above outlined, there will be in future five Provinces with a Muslim majority of the population out of a total of eleven. But just as the minority position of the Muslims in the whole of India is one of the greatest concern for the community, which is historically, politically and numerically no less important than any other and more important than most, their position in six other Provinces is one of so considerable a minority that, unless proper, adequate and effective safeguards are provided in the constitution, by a clear statute fixing their representation definitely and only leaving it to the Central or Provincial Legislature or local bodies and educational institutions or departments to carry out the details of such provision, the main problem of the constitution will continue to remain unsettled. The League, therefore, submits such a preliminary statute should guarantee such safeguards as will give Muslim interests in India as a whole—that is, both in the Provinces in which they are in a majority and in those in which they are in a minority of the population—sure or special protection, especially in the following domains:—

(a) In the exercise of their religious rights, particularly by legislation for allowing cow-slaughter and preventing music before mosques;

(b) In all elected bodies, including municipal and district boards, universities, intermediate education boards, etc., by adequate and effective representation by means of separate electorates;

(c) In the Central and Provincial Cabinets;

(d) In the public services, that is, the services maintained by the Government or local bodies or educational and other civic institutions;

(e) In admission of students to all educational institutions maintained or aided by the State and in the provision of Muslim teachers;

(f) In the use of the Urdu language in all institutions maintained or aided by the Government; and

(g) By a fair and reasonable distribution of grants-in-aid for education and other public objects.

10. Residuary Powers.—Before dealing with the questions connected with the Executive and Legislative machinery, the League considers it necessary to invite attention to a question of vital importance in relation to the constitution as a whole. India, as has already been pointed out, being in reality a vast sub-continent divided into presidencies and provinces inhabited by peoples speaking different languages, possessing diverse characteristics of their own, influenced in their activities and aspirations by territorial patriotism and for at least three-quarters of a century, and in some cases even for over a century, living under their own respective provincial governments, it seems to the League to be inevitable that the constitution of the country must develop on the lines of a Federal government, each territorial unit forming a state in itself and all being governed, in matters of common concern, by a central federal authority. In other words, the constitutional reforms in this country should at this stage aim at the ultimate creation of a United States of India within the British Commonwealth. For such a constitutional goal, the first important question for consideration naturally is in whom should what are called "Residuary Powers" be vested. This, in the opinion of the League, is a constitutional problem of the first magnitude, upon the right solution of which depends the future stability and welfare of the State itself. In view of the varying conditions obtaining in the different provinces of India, it seems to the League to be essential that the future Federal constitution of India should, among other things, provide the Central Government with only such powers as may be expressly vested in it by the constitution and all "Residuary Powers" be left to the individual states. A Federal government, constituted on this basis, would not only give provincial autonomy to the various states constituting the federation, but would also prevent the coming into existence in India of an oligarchy which would be disastrous to the vital interests of the minority communities in this country and would be entirely inconsistent with true democratic principles.

11. Secretary of State for India and India Council.—Even a casual glance at the various sub-sections of Section 2 of the Government of India Act (1919) will serve to show that the constitutional position of the Secretary of State, with his extraordinary powers of superintendence and control, is of an all-embracing character. Apart from the fact that this sweeping provision is inconsistent with the grant even of partial self-government to India and with the spirit of the declaration of 20th August, 1917, it is, the League submits, obvious that exercise of the vast control thus vested in the Secretary of State over the Government of India, even in affairs relating to the internal administration of the country, is opposed to the principles of sound administration. A British politician sitting in his office 6,000 miles away, with little or no experience of the complicated Indian position and affairs, exercising unlimited control over the internal administration of the country, is a constitutional conundrum somewhat difficult to solve. Moderate opinion in India is agreed that the time has not yet arrived when the administration of Foreign Affairs, the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force can be safely transferred to popular control. The ultimate control in the case of these Departments of State may, therefore, be still left in the hands of the Secretary of State as representing the British Parliament. But the League finds it difficult to conceive any sound reason for subjecting the Government of India to the control of the Secretary of State in so far as purely internal administration is concerned. Such state of things is, the League is sincerely convinced, not conducive to the best interests of the administration. The time has now arrived when the Government of India should be relieved of the irksome chains with which it is at present bound in this respect.

With the introduction of this reform the costly machinery of the India Council would become unnecessary. Should the Secretary of State be in need of any advice with regard to vital questions concerning the administration of Foreign Political Affairs, the Army, the Navy and the Air Force, he would have at his disposal the advice of experts who deal with these very subjects in the various departments of State in England. It is an open secret that he enjoys these facilities even at the present moment. In any case, in view of the curtailment in the extent of his own responsibilities, as advocated above, the existing personnel and staff of India Council can be largely reduced.

12. Central Government and Legislature.—On a careful consideration of the past constitutional changes, of the existing conditions and of the necessity of further constitutional advance towards responsible government within the Empire the League would suggest the following changes in the existing machinery of the Central Executive Government:—

(a) As in all civilised Governments, the Commander-in-Chief should be the head of the Army, performing the duties and exercising the powers which are legitimately connected with that responsible position. He should not be a member of the Executive Council or of the Central Legislature, whose meetings tend to increase in number with the expansion of our constitutional and administrative machinery and, in consequence, necessitate his constant presence at the headquarters of the Government of India. A civilian member for the army should take his place within the Indian Cabinet and in the Central Legislature, as is the case in England.

(b) The number of members in the Viceroy's Cabinet should be increased to not less than eight, at least four of whom should be Indians, with the Governor-General at the head of them all, adequate representation being given to the Muslims.

The Viceroy's Executive Council should not exercise any control over the administration of subjects which are transferred in the Provinces.

(c) In addition to the reforms already suggested in connection with the Central Legislature, this League urges the widening of the control of the Central Legislature over the country's budget by increasing the number of votable items, particularly in regard to the All-India Services other than those dealing with the Army, the Navy, the Air Force and Foreign Affairs. The decisions of the Legislative Assembly should be final. Only if all subjects are transferred should the Viceroy have the veto.

13. Provincial Governments and Legislatures.—In regard to the provincial governments and legislatures the League would advocate the following reforms:—

(a) However excellent the conception which resulted in the introduction of dyarchy in the provinces, in actual working it has revealed difficulties and complications, which have led to its condemnation by important sections of the politically-minded Indians as well as able and experienced administrators, European and Indian. The League is, on the whole, of opinion that this experiment should now be scrapped and a unitary form of government should be inaugurated in the provinces.

(b) The provinces having gained sufficient experience of the administration of provincial subjects, the time has arrived when provincial autonomy should be introduced as the next step in constitutional advance. In other words, responsible government should be conceded to the provinces by placing all provincial subjects in charge of Ministers fully responsible for their administration to the Provincial Legislature, the Governor being the constitutional head of the Provincial Government. It is further essential that the principle of joint responsibility of Ministers should be introduced and the Cabinet system should thus be adopted in the provinces.

(c) Income tax should be a provincial subject and the Government of India may fix contributions from the provinces.

(d) In addition to the reforms already proposed in connection with the provincial legislature regarding the franchise, electorates, constituencies, etc., here also the line of advance with regard to increased control of the legislature over the provincial budget will necessarily be the same as that which has already been suggested in regard to the Central Legislature.

(e) The League considers the following provision essential:—

> "No Bill or resolution or any part thereof affecting any community (which question is to be determined by the community in the elected body concerned) shall be passed in any legislature or any other elected body if three-fourths of the members of that community in that particular body oppose such Bill or resolution or part thereof."

14. Public Services.—The unanimous demand of the Muslim community in India for their proportionate share in the administrative machinery extends, with perfect justice and equity, to the public services. The very grounds hitherto urged by the Indian politicians for the Indianisation of the services apply equally to an equitable adjustment of the claims of the various communities to a proper share in the administration of the various departments which manage the affairs of the country for the welfare and happiness of the people. Because these departments come into more direct contact with the masses than even the legislative or local bodies, the contentment and progress of a large portion of the country depend on their just and proper working. It must, therefore, constitute both an anomaly and a grave political danger if the services which administer the various departments become the monopoly of a class. There is no possible justification for the fact that, with the exception of our fighting forces and the police, all other branches of our public services are staffed by an overwhelming majority of caste-Hindus. That the Muslim community, in spite of its having produced as qualified persons as any other community for suitable and even efficient service in any capacity, from the top to the bottom, in any service, should have been so glaringly and so long neglected and suppressed in almost every department of the administrative machinery, is a ground for the hope that means will now be devised to give Musalmans their due share in the services of which they have been deprived by the over-representation of the caste-Hindus on the false plea of their greater numbers and higher efficiency. In this matter also the League submits that a general statutory provision requires to be made and its principles applied in each province with legislative sanction for its particular requirements. It may be suggested in this connection that the Muslim share in the provincial services should be at least the same as its representation in the legislative bodies and in the All-India services not less than one-third. In view of the serious economic disabilities of the Musalmans their adequate representation in the services is a very vital matter to their general progress, more especially as their unemployment in such large numbers not only makes it more difficult and often impossible for them to educate their children even for a trade or profession, but also creates unrest. It is a sad record for a century and a half that there should be less than three per cent. Muslim officers in the All-India services to-day, while in the subordinate services the position is so deplorable that the Railway Board, the largest employer of subordinates, has barely three per cent. Muslim employees drawing Rs. 250 and over.

15. Separation of Judicial and Executive Functions.—The confidence of the people in the administration of justice being the corner stone of all constitutional progress, it is essential that a system by which judicial and executive functions are combined in certain authorities, and thereby tend to impair that confidence, ought to be done away with. The promises which the Government of India and the Provincial Governments have made in the past in the matter of this reform have remained unfulfilled till now; and the League earnestly hopes that much harm will be prevented by a change being made in this important matter at this stage.

Memorandum on Behalf of the Ahmadiyya Community.

We, the representatives of the Ahmadiyya Community, which has its headquarters at Qadian, in the district of Gurdaspur, Punjab, India, beg leave to submit the following Memorandum for the further development and extension of the system of self-government in India.

The representative system as applied to British India:—

(a) The Basis of Franchise.—We believe that the broadening of the present system of franchise is in the interests of the Government as well as the governed. We are, however, of the opinion that this extension should for the present be restricted to those who are in one way or other a support to the Government. In view of the above we would suggest that the franchise be extended to (a) everyone who pays to the Government land revenue or income tax or any other tax, however small the sum may be. (b) Everyone who pays a rental of Rs. 100 or more a year on agricultural land held as tenant, other than occupancy tenant, who has already been enfranchised or pays five rupees per month as house rent or owns immovable property other than agricultural land of the value of Rs. 1,000 or more.

(b) Methods of Election.—This needs to be considered in two ways: First, whether it is advisable to retain the present voting system or it is desirable to devise a new one. As regards this we would suggest that, in consideration of the simplicity of the system in vogue, the present system may be retained. Secondly, whether to retain the system of separate electorates or to discard it in favour of that of joint electorates. We strongly hold the view that the system of joint electorates, whatever its advantages, is at present very much against the interests of the country. We do concede that if India is to advance politically it shall ultimately have to adopt this system, for there can hardly be any cultivation of political or civic sense nor any political education without it, but as things stand at present we could not commit a greater mistake than if we discarded the system of separate in favour of that of joint electorates. India is at present in the grip of communal and sectarian bias. No community reposes faith in the other. The majority is not prepared to concede even its bare rights to the minority. Government offices, universities, commercial and industrial markets, chambers of commerce, and even judicial awards afford instances of the communal bias that reigns rampant throughout the length and breadth of India. If under these circumstances the system of joint electorates were thrust on the people, there would be no room for the uplift and advancement of the Moslems, the depressed classes and other minority communities in India, with the exception, perhaps, of one or two favoured ones. Rather than bring on the desired evolution such a step would be a prelude to a deplorable revolution. Hence we believe that, until that happy era when the minorities can safely trust and confide in the majorities is ushered in, the system of separate electorates should continue, the number of seats for each community being fixed in accordance with its numerical proportion to the whole population. Provision may, however, be made to safeguard the particular interests of a special community by giving it a higher representation than its numbers warrant, provided always that the majority of any other community is not reduced to a minority in any case.

(c) Methods Whereby Particular Interests, Communal, Local, Social and Economical may Obtain Adequate Representation on Local Self-Governing, Provincial and Central Representative Bodies.—We hold fast to the view that, with the exception of Government interests, no other interests should be represented by nomination. It is not only wrong in principle, but is a fruitful source of misunderstandings and other evils. It is commonly held that nomination is but a cloak to strengthen the hands of the Government, and, curiously enough, this view is shared, along with the Government critics, by those in whose favour the nomination is made. The best means of giving representation to an interest is to give it a direct voting power. It may entail some difficulty in certain cases, but it is certainly not impossible of achievement. University and industrial seats are already open to election, which entails no great difficulty. Similarly, the seats reserved for the minorities or the depressed classes may be made open to election.

In this connection we beg leave to further suggest that, in view of the importance of the question, it must be definitely laid down as part of the constitution that the system of separate electorates shall not be abolished until the mutual confidence of the different communities is fully restored and until at least 75 per cent. of the elected members of a minority in the Central Legislature vote in favour of its abolition in three successive assemblies, and also that this system shall not be replaced by that of joint electorates in any Province until three-fourths of the elected members of the Provincial Council vote in favour of the change.

If the system of election is not introduced among the backward communities, they shall never be able to develop a sense of self-respect nor shall they receive political education. Nomination can never create a sense of political responsibility or even a due appreciation of one's own rights, nor can a people who are given a nominated seat feel satisfied that their rights have in this way been properly safeguarded. If the elective system be introduced among the backward communities and the depressed classes the various candidates will have to approach the voters of such communities and classes in their own interests, and this cannot fail to gradually awaken in such communities a sense of their rights and responsibilities.

Another advantage of the introduction of the elective system among the backward communities will be that other communities will feel the necessity of coming to an understanding with them and seeking their co-operation. A nominated member is not in a position to be much sought after for he does not really represent his community owing to his not having been returned by them by election. Another beneficial result of this policy will be that when the other communities will stand in need of co-operation with the backward classes, they will also seek to ameliorate their condition. Moreover it is an admitted fact that the Government, despite their desire to promote the happiness of the backward communities, cannot fully understand their requirements which in the case of nomination generally go uncared for.

We advocate the system of election as opposed to that of nomination not only in the case of communal interests but in other interests as well, and we suggest that this system should be accepted as a matter of principle.

In addition to the agricultural, industrial, commercial and educational interests, we think there is need for elective representation in the matter of self-governing institutions as well, which are as yet in a stage of evolutionary infancy with much scope for improvement as is evidenced by various rules and regulations which the Government have to issue from time to time. We think then that municipal committees should have the right to send their representatives to the Legislature so that the municipalities may be in a position to criticise Government policy and to watch and safeguard their interests in the councils of the country. Municipal committees in every province should elect one or more representative to the Legislative Council of the province to safeguard and advance their interests. But even here we would advise the same caution, that in no case should a majority be turned into a minority by the representation of special interests. Majority rights must be protected with the due safeguards for the minority rights. For instance, in the Punjab the margin between majority and minority is so small that a little change upsets the balance of power and a majority is turned into a minority. University, industry and commerce seats are already held by the Hindus.

Agriculture, too, has been so manipulated as to adversely affect Moslem interests and representation. The best solution out of this difficulty would be the reservation of these seats for particular communities on the system of Joint Electorates. For instance, if reserved seats for special interests when held by non-Moslems adversely affect the proportional representation of the Muslims it should be laid down that these seats be reserved for the Moslems on the basis of the system of Joint Electorates. The university and industry seats may, for instance, be reserved for Muslim candidates, and that of commerce for a non-Muslim. This shall not only bring about right communal representation in special interests, but shall also maintain the balance of power between the various communities inhabiting the province or the country. Without some such arrangement we shall have to give up either the representation of special interests or sacrifice the majority rights, both of which would be dangerous.

Moreover, in our opinion, it will be advisable that the Provincial Councils should also be represented in the Central Legislature which will contribute to the true development of a Federal Constitution. It is true that in this case the rule that the same man is not eligible for the membership of both the Houses shall have to be amended, but if an exception be made in this respect, it will certainly bring the Central Assembly and the Provincial Councils much closer to each other, to the advantage of both.

(d) It should not be held as necessary that a candidate should belong to the district or the territory for which he proposes to stand. In our opinion whatever his residence, any candidate should be eligible to stand for his community so long as he is a British subject. The choice of representative should be left to the voters who should be free to elect their representative from their own circle or from outside it.

(e) Growth of Parties.—In principle we are opposed to the party system, for under this system one is not unoften debarred from speaking the truth, and until other members of one's party agree to one's view-point and make it a part of their programme, one is constrained to withhold a motion which one personally believes to be advantageous to the country. But as the present political system of the country has been so constituted that the party system has become an indispensable factor thereof, we, in view of the present form of the Government, think it necessary that the party system should be reformed and strengthened.

We are of opinion that the form of the existing political constitution of India is such that the party system cannot properly thrive under it. This system can thrive only where the Government is liable to be changed. The truth is that parties cannot be formed on right lines where the Government cannot be changed, for there the interest which is essential to the growth of parties is absent. There is no doubt that the councils have been vested with a good deal of power, in the transferred subjects, but there is equally no doubt that there is an element in the councils which is wholly unaffected by the party system and which is totally independent of public voice and public opinion. This element, though numerically weak, is sufficiently strong to make government possible by winning over to its side one or more of the minorities; nay, it can manage to have its own way even with the co-operation of certain individual members. Hence when the majorities cannot succeed in carrying out their policy, notwithstanding their superiority in numbers as a single party and this failure of theirs is not due to any lack of public support, but to the existence of the Government block which does not represent the country, but is merely a representative of the Government, the people have no incentive to organise and consolidate the party system; and owing to the absence of such incentive the parties formed are not powerful. And when the individual members know that in order to display their personal talents, they do not stand in need of any co-operation with the elected parties, but that they can do so by identifying themselves with the Government block, they do not care much for the discipline of the party, and hence the strong organisation which is so essential to the growth of the party system cannot be achieved. Hence under the present system neither the public has any interest in the organisation of the party system, for it feels that the strength of the system cannot affect the Government to any considerable extent, nor is there any likelihood of the elected members themselves being much attracted by it.

Moreover, as the Government itself forms an unelected block, and it has power to interfere in the transferred subjects, no party can seriously advocate any particular policy, for they know that they will not be able to achieve anything without the help of the Government, and will not have a free hand in carrying out their policy or in coming to an understanding with other parties.

Hence, under the existing circumstances, it is absolutely impossible for the party system to make any headway in India, and this is particularly the case in the Punjab.

In our opinion, for the growth of the party system, nay, in fact for the growth of the whole political system, it is highly essential that the Government should have no concern with the transferred subjects. They should not vote on matters relating to these departments, nor should they take part in any discussion bearing on the work of the Ministers. As the Governor has been vested with special powers with regard to the transferred subjects, he can in case of necessity achieve his purpose by making use of those powers. But there is no need to defeat the very purpose of the Reforms by controlling the House by means of Government votes.

(f) Growth of Informed Public Opinion.—The answer to question (e) does in fact comprise the answer to this question also. The growth of informed public opinion, under the present system, depends on the growth of the party system. As there is no party system now, it is not the parties that elect members, but it is the members who, when elected, form the parties. Hence these parties are like a mushroom growth and do in no way influence the future elections. As every candidate stands in his individual capacity, and is conscious of his inability to do anything single-handed, he cannot enunciate any policy for the future which may create an interest in the various classes of the country with regard to his election. His personal connections and personal influence form the only factors on which he counts for his success. The result is that there is no cultivation of public opinion. If there be party system and it be possible for the strong party to have its way in certain departments of public administration, such party will certainly draw up a statement of policy and a programme, and its members will do their best to advertise it among the people. In that case only that person will venture to make a stand against them who will be able to offer a better policy and programme to the public, and at the same time assure them that he has a party at his back with whose help he will be able to carry out his programme. Then it will not be that there should stand up candidates who, though holding identical political views, should trust for their success to their personal connections and who should be supported on that account.

In short, neither the party system can be strengthened nor public opinion educated until the Reforms are made a reality, and until the transferred subjects are placed beyond the pale of Government votes. What happens now in the Councils is that some clever members enter into an understanding with the Government, saying, "Come, let us govern jointly; you should help us and we will help you." There is no such thing as political advancement or any preparation for real representative Government.

(g) Nomination of Officials and Non-Officials as Additional Members of Elected Bodies.—We think that in view of the reserved subjects, the presence of Government officials in the Legislative Councils is highly essential, but in view of the transferred subjects their presence is injurious. Hence the proper course will be that Government officials should be nominated members, but (1) their number should in no case exceed 10 per cent. of the whole strength, and (2) they should have nothing to do with the transferred subjects, all decisions concerning them being left to the elected members.

The nomination of non-official members is, in our opinion, highly injurious. If such members are meant to safeguard the interests of any minority, that minority should be allowed the right to elect its own representatives. But if they are included for their personal qualification, we deem their admission into the Councils inconsistent with the real spirit of the Reforms. We cannot think of a man whose presence in the Councils is essential to voice true public opinion but who cannot be returned to the Council through election. Such a man will really represent the Government point of view, and we think the Government officials are enough for this purpose.

With regard to such Indian gentlemen whose opinion the Government thinks it essential to consult, but who will not or cannot be elected to the Councils, the best course, we think, will be that every Governor should have with him an advisory committee, like the Privy Council, and such men whose counsel the Government thinks it advisable to seek in matters of moment should be members of that committee. When the Governor has to make some important decision, for instance, when he thinks it desirable to veto a decision of the council, he may summon such persons and take their advice. In this way, the Government shall be able to avail itself of the advice of such gentlemen without sending them to the Councils, where their presence serves only as a clog to the working of those bodies.

2. The suitability of existing areas for legislative and administrative purposes and for the growth of representative institutions.

(a) Local Self-Government.—So long as the posts of Collectors or Deputy Commissioners exist in India, it is necessary that the District Boards should also exist, in addition to the Provincial Councils. The posts of collectors and Deputy-Commissioners were created in view of the fact that the Government in India was not representative but bureaucratic. But now when the form of Government is being changed into a representative one, these posts appear to be incongruous. The Governor is not free to administer his province, but has with him a body of men to advise him; while the Deputy-Commissioner who rules his district has been left quite free and that notwithstanding the fact that within the limits of his district all the Government departments are under him and are subject to his authority. Hence if the post of the Deputy-Commissioner is indispensable, and to our mind it is so under the present circumstances, he must have with him an advisory committee, so that he too may be impressed by public opinion and may be compelled to remain in touch with it. In our opinion it will be best to reform the district boards and invest them with greater powers so that the district administration may in this way be reformed; otherwise, the post of the Deputy-Commissioner will look more and more incongruous side by side with the growing development of representative local institutions in the country.

It will also be proper to start sub-district or local boards, along with the district boards, as is the practice in certain provinces, so that by dividing the districts into sub-divisions, the work should become more effective and progressive.

(b) Provincial, including the discussion of proposals for extension of self-governing institutions to other areas than the nine provinces and of proposals for division of existing provinces.

We think this to be a most important question on which hinges, to a large extent, the question of the future progress or decline of India, and the sooner this question is solved, the better will it be for the advancement of the country and for the growth of self-governing institutions.

The existence in India of a number of small territories where representative government has not been introduced is, in our opinion, highly prejudicial to the future progress of the country. No sensible man will endorse the idea that although the whole of India is advancing politically, yet of all its territories, Ajmere and Marwara, for instance, is such that the people thereof are not qualified for representative government. Similarly, to suppose that Delhi, which has the distinction of being the capital of India, is not fit for representative government, or that Coorg, in spite of its being situated in the centre of an advanced territory, is not fit for it, or that the North-Western Frontier Province is not qualified to participate in representative government, or that Baluchistan is not deserving of it, is an insult to human intellect. This sort of discrimination is sure to lead to discontent, and even tends to create a spirit of rebellion, and should therefore be removed as soon as possible.

Again, this kind of discrimination is not only calculated to create discontent but is also unjust. If Delhi happens to be the metropolis of India, it is no reason why the people of Delhi should be deprived of the privileges which are enjoyed by their fellow subjects of adjoining territories. Similarly, if at one time and owing to some temporary considerations, Ajmere was made a political agency, the inhabitants thereof who had no hand in the matter should not suffer on that account.

Another injurious effect of this discrimination will be that in this way India will never become one country. To maintain two sorts of territories under the same government will mean the perpetuation of a false comparison and the creation of a false impression in the country by a comparison of the administrations of the two sets of territories, whereas it is an admitted fact that representative Government is better than even a good bureaucratic government, for the former is a step to the establishment of an excellent government. (We do not mean that a tyrannical representative government is better than a good government, for a good government, though bureaucratic, is decidedly better than a tyrannical government, though it may be representative.) Hence, in order that true political sense may grow in India, it is necessary that such territories should be abolished as soon as possible.

Another harm which is sure to ensue from the maintenance of such territories is that while with the political advancement of India, the elected councils will be vested with greater and greater powers of government, the administration of these semi-representative provinces must continue in the hands of the Governor-General, which means that a ponderous machinery will have to be retained merely to supervise the administration of a few petty provinces, and the many departments which are now established for the government of the whole of India will have to be kept open merely for the sake of these small territories. And if, as an alternative, these territories are placed under the supervision of the Central Legislature, that will be an unwarrantable act, for in this case the representatives of a few provinces will unduly be put in authority over other provinces as well qualified as themselves. For these and similar other reasons, it is utterly inconsistent with the growth of representative government in India to deny to some of its provinces the right to self-government.

Hence, we propose that in the absence of a better arrangement the Andamans be annexed to the Madras province. In the first place, the use which is now made of these islands is strongly disapproved of, not only by the Indians, but also by many right-minded Europeans and therefore it should be put an end to. But if the Andamans are still to be used for this purpose, that may be done under the supervision of the Madras Government. Similarly, Coorg may also be annexed to the Madras province and Ajmere and Marwara may be included in the United Provinces. Again one district of the United Provinces and a portion of the Punjab territory may be detached to extend the boundaries of the Delhi province, the Chief Commissioner of which may be given an elected council for the administration of his province. Similarly, Baluchistan may be conceded the right of representative Government, but of this we will speak later on.

We, however, lay the greatest emphasis on the North-West Frontier Province being given the right of self-government. The argument that the North-West Frontier Province, being a frontier Province, should not be given a representative government for the benefit of the rest of India is a stale argument which cannot stand the test of criticism. No Province can be deprived of its due rights for the imaginary benefit of other people. Nor is it right to think that the Afghan, who being nearer independent countries, is better able to understand some of the political problems than the inhabitants of the other Indian provinces, is not fit for representative government. Such an idea is not only opposed to reason, but is calculated to stir up the blood of independence. For, when the frontier people will realise (and it appears that they have already begun to realise) that they are to be deprived of self-government for the imaginary benefit of the rest of India, their sympathies will certainly turn to the other side of the frontier rather than to the Indian Government. They will begin to feel that they can attain to independence only through Russia or Afghanistan. Thus the whole Province from end to end will be filled with feelings of hatred and ill-will against the Indian Government, and will become a serious menace to the peace of the country. But if, on the other hand, the frontier people are also given the right of representative government along with the rest of the country, they will look upon the Indian Government as their own Government, and any harm to it as a harm to their own cause, and will not tolerate even for a moment that any foreign Government should take possession of India.

With equal strength we advocate the separation of Sindh from Bombay, and its formation into a separate Province, with a full-fledged reform scheme. As a matter of fact, Sindh and its people have little in common with the far more educated and advanced territory of Bombay, and, truly speaking, the connection is proving injurious to both. It is a matter of regret, and, indeed, of national loss, that Sindh, with its natural and by no means mean potentialities for growth, has so far been allowed to remain in a state of stagnation and denied the road to progress by its being linked to Bombay, which overshadows it in all respects. The connection is highly unnatural and unjust, and must be broken off as early as possible. We take special interest in this question because Sindh is a pre-eminently Muslim territory, and our brethren of this part of the country have most heavily suffered owing to their having no separate existence of their own and owing to their being linked to a people who have nothing in common with them.

3. The Local Self-Governing Bodies and their relationship with the Provincial Government:—

(a) Constitution.—In our view the district boards and municipal committees should be autonomous in their particular spheres, barring, of course, the communal affairs, where some restrictions are necessary. For instance, municipal committees with Hindu majorities are daily devising new methods of stopping the slaughter of cows. Age limits in some places and obstructive plans in others are imposed to harass non-Hindus who eat beef. It is not self-government, but a travesty of it, which can never place a country on the road to progress. If the Moslem majorities, with similar motives, began to impose restrictions on pulses or greens, and forced their vendors to keep them out of towns or prohibited the entry of cattle and bulls into the town areas under the plea of sanitation or general nuisance would they not arouse a hornets' nest about their ears. But the fact is that the Hindu majorities are doing all these things without let or hindrance. Hence in such affairs, where certain particular communities are affected, it should be laid down as a matter of principle that no such law or regulation will be valid unless three-quarters of the members of the community affected vote in favour of it, with the further proviso that the general order so passed shall be null and void if on some future occasion three-quarters of the members of the same community vote against it. This sort of elasticity is very necessary in the present state of things.

(b) We do not like to say anything about the municipal committees, but we must affirm very strongly in favour of the extension of district boards' jurisdiction. For example, sanitation, education, the provision of grazing grounds and their maintenance, control over the construction of buildings in rural areas, road construction, and traffic control, co-operative societies, drainage, cattle breeding, agricultural farms, adult education, rural recreation, and all other things pertaining to local development, should be entrusted to district boards, who should be empowered to legislate and levy proper taxes for these purposes within their own spheres. We are sure this step will rapidly foster the progress of our country. Moreover, if the district boards, or select committees out of their members, be also formed into advisory committees to advise the Deputy-Commissioners, that will go a long way in remedying the defects we have already mentioned concerning the arbitrary nature of the administration carried on by the Deputy-Commissioners under the present system.

(c) Relationship with Officials of Provincial Governments.—We think this relationship should be confined to mere general supervision. The district boards should be under the direct supervision of the Minister for Local Self-Government. It is further necessary that, in the work of the district board, provincial councils should, as far as possible, restrict their supervision to matters of principle or where the question assumes a provincial aspect; otherwise local affairs must be severely left alone.

4. The Provincial Governments.—(a) Constitution:—

It is necessary, in our opinion, to make some changes in the constitution. The Home Government has declared responsible government to be the goal in India, and, in order to achieve this goal, it is but necessary that the number of reserved subjects be gradually reduced, and that of transferred subjects increased correspondingly. Steps should be taken in this direction immediately, and the best course to this end would be to limit the Governor's authority in reserved departments. At present, in spite of the council, the Governor is all-powerful. He can do what he pleases. A beginning in the responsible form of government should, in our opinion, be made by restricting the Governor's authority even in the case of reserved subjects with the consequent widening of the power of his councillors both individually and as a whole, so as to make them responsible to some extent even as regards reserved departments. If such a change be effected it shall not only create a spirit of responsibility, but will assign to the Governor the position of disinterested third party which would strengthen his position both as regards reserved and the transferred departments. At present the Governor is supposed to be an arbitrary ruler, an embodiment of bureaucratic sway, and such an impression stands very much in the way of responsible government.

The Constitution needs amending in another way also, and that is that like the three Presidencies all provinces should have their governors appointed direct from among the public men of England and not selected from the members of the Indian Civil Service. The system in vogue at present, even if defensible from the administrative point of view, is very defective from the political point of view. In the first place the Governor chosen from among the members of the Indian Civil Service cannot and does not sympathise with the political aspirations of the people. Secondly, it is not only anomalous, but derogatory that a civil servant who but a few years ago worked as a subordinate to a Minister should be thrust upon him as the head of the province to lead him instead of being led by him. Thirdly, as a Governor appointed from among the ranks of the civil servants has already had dealings with the people and the parties of the country he can never take a disinterested view, but invariably becomes involved in party politics, and rather than be above parties becomes partisan himself.

(b) Working of Dyarchy.—Though Dyarchy is being condemned on every side, yet we think that under the principle and policy by which India is to gradually attain to responsible form of government there could be no other possible practical plan, and now that it has been in force for about a decade it would be a grave mistake to give it up without giving it a real trial. To give it up now would, in our opinion, be a prelude to anarchy. Accordingly, we do not think a case has been made out to uproot dyarchy altogether, though we think it needs considerable pruning. As a matter of fact the dyarchy that we see about us is no dyarchy at all. It is a mere skeleton form without the soul. Real dyarchy means that a part of the government must be truly representative. But the fact is that the method of selecting ministers as well as the block of official votes in the council are practically keeping even the transferred departments in the reserved groove. Dyarchy will have its real trial when the official votes are kept off the transferred subjects or, at least, they are so reduced as to leave the elected vote unaffected, though the latter procedure is certainly not as safe or effective as the former.

We have from the very beginning of the reforms been of the opinion that if a real trial is to be given to self-government then in the transferred subjects, full and unhindered control should be given to the representatives of the people without any interference on the part of the Government, excepting, of course, the right to veto on the part of the Governor, who should use it as sparingly as is done in the self-governing dominions. We cannot conceive that a fair trial could be given without giving full powers. And where is the need for this experiment if the Government cannot confidently transfer to the people the full control of even such departments as education, local self-government, medicine, public health and sanitation? Unless there is a complete transference of powers we could neither call this experiment a fair trial, nor the system a dyarchy in its true sense. But if a true form of dyarchy is established then the Governor will truly be in part a responsible ruler, deriving his power from the people and in part an executive head deriving his power not from the people, but from a superior authority.

(c) Position and Power of Governor.—We have already answered this point (vide our answers to sections (a) and (b) of this question).

(d) Position of Ministers in relation to Governor and Members of Executive Councils.—We think the relation between ministers and members of the executive should continue as it is at present, that is to say they may consult each other in an informal manner without any one interfering with the other's work. As to their relation with the Governor we have already touched on this point, that is, it should be as is the relation of the ministers to the governors in the self-governing colonies, but as a further precaution, everything being in an experimental stage here, we would have it recommended that the ministers should talk over a measure with the Governor informally before they bring it before the Council, though, of course, we must lay it down that the Governor should not override the wishes of the ministers, which power even now, in theory, he does not possess, though the Government with the official block at its back practically enjoys it.

(e) Relationship of Ministers to each other and Question of Collective Responsibility.—Representative Government means collective responsibility. But owing to the absence of any clear instruction, we find a sort of chaotic state of things in the various provinces. For instance, three ministers belonging to three different creeds have been put in charge of three different portfolios in the Punjab, who sometimes go so far even as to criticise each other's policy. Now this undesirable state of things has arisen from the absence of any clear injunction on this point, and from the fact that the Government has lost sight of the fact that in the representative form of government, collective responsibility is the object. We think the selection of ministers must be carried out in the same way as is done in some of the advanced countries of the West where a capable person is invited to form a Government, the choice of his colleagues being left to him. If he fails another is invited. This not only brings about a state of collective responsibility but also leads to that mutual consultation and confidence which are a happy prelude to the strengthening and consolidating of party ties. Moreover it will prevent the Governor from entrusting ministerships to those who have no party backing of their own. We think this principle must in the clearest terms be embodied in the constitution, otherwise dyarchy will continue to be a failure or it will be a dyarchy only in name.

(f) Growth of Party System in Provincial Councils.—We have already dealt with this point (vide answers to questions 1 (e) and 4 (e). In order to develop and strengthen the party system in India we think the Government ought to supply all those facilities which are enjoyed by the various parties in the British Parliament, that is, the allotment of seats to members and leaders of parties, setting apart separate rooms where the leaders can conduct their own party business, etc., etc. Moreover, the party in power should be financed by the Treasury to pay its chief whip. These are mere details, but they will help greatly in shaping and consolidating parties.

(g) Desirability of Second Chambers.—We do not think the introduction of second chambers in the provinces will serve any useful purpose. It will, on the other hand, only delay and obstruct business.

(j) Question of Autonomy.—It is a very important question, and the future progress of India depends very largely on it. We are indeed indebted to the authors of the Montford Reforms Scheme for the right lead they have given to the country in this matter and for beginning reforms with the Provinces. India is a country as well as a continent. It is a land of different tongues, different customs and habits, and different creeds. To put them all in the same administrative group would be courting anarchy, disorder, and even rebellion. India can only be governed on a federal system, and it should be clearly laid down that the goal of the reforms in India is a system of federated States. The Central Government shall retain control of only such matters as concern India as a whole and about which the provinces, or on their behalf the Imperial Government, may decide that in the interest of peace and good government their control should rest in the Central Government. Barring this, all other affairs must be settled by the Provincial Councils, which shall be held responsible for the internal administration, peace and security of their respective provinces. This arrangement necessarily raises the question of provincial autonomy. In our opinion the federal system necessitates complete provincial autonomy. Exceptions may be made only in those matters which the provinces cannot control or where combined administration is necessary. Provincial autonomy will also solve the communal problem of India.

(k) Finances of Provincial Governments and Financial Control.—We are in complete accord with the Montford Scheme on this point, and a further discussion of it we leave over till we take up the question of Central Government. But we must mention here that in our opinion the legislatures should have a greater control over the finances than they enjoy at present, for the chief object of the representative government is the control of the revenue and the taxes and to see that no undue financial burden is imposed on the country.

It is a very complicated question which has practically defied all solutions so far. The Montford scheme proposes that the Governor may apportion the revenues to the reserved and transferred subjects. It seems it was supposed at the time that the provincial governors would be like the governors of the colonies, and that the Government and the elected representatives of the people will look upon them as quite disinterested. But the facts have belied all this. The people's representatives regard the Governors as not only a part of the Government, but the most important part thereof. The Governor is fully responsible for the reserved side of his Government, and as regards the transferred departments he has only supervisory authority over it. Hence his decision can never be disinterested, and even if it were so, the elected representatives of the country in the present state of things can never regard them as such. Again, to say that being disinterested now they will continue to be so always would be expecting too much. And none of these defects can be remedied unless the provinces are granted complete autonomy. Every other solution falls short one way or the other. Taking all these things into consideration, we would suggest that the present procedure may be amended so as to make it necessary that the Government should settle the Budget both for the reserved and the transferred departments after consultation with the Finance Committee, and it should be laid down that the Government should, as far as possible, try to satisfy the demands of the elected members with regard to the Budget of the transferred departments. No better arrangement can be suggested under the present state of things.

5. The Central Government.

(a) Constitution.—(1) The question of the constitution of Central Government is bound up with the provincial form of government. If federation of States and Provinces is the ultimate goal of India, then the central constitution must correspond with this ideal, and any change therein must conform to the change in the Provincial Government, and the Central Legislature should not be empowered in such a way as would be detrimental to the future federation of India. That is why we think that the Central Legislature should be given control over those very departments of the Government of India over which the provincial councils supervise, and it should be clearly laid down that the Central Government is vested only with delegated authority. If no such clear statement is made there is danger of the Central and the Provincial Governments arriving at the parting of ways over the questions of rights and duties, the former always trying to usurp and the latter to wrest and extend its authority. So to avoid this danger of struggle the Central Government should have authority delegated to them in those departments only over which the Provincial Governments have full authority, and this delegated authority should be limited to mere supervision, so that at no future date should the Central Government regard its authority as being inherent in itself.

(2) We do not think it is desirable for the Commander-in-Chief to sit in the legislature as a member. His presence there is not only subversive of discipline in his own department, but is also hindrance in the full and frank expression of views. We therefore suggest that in place of the Commander-in-Chief, there should be nominated to the Assembly a "Member for the Defence," who should represent the Army, Navy and Air Departments. In England, no doubt, these three departments are represented in Parliament by three different Ministers, but it is not necessary for India to follow England in every detail. In some of the advanced Western countries this English system is not followed. Moreover, Indian Departments of Navy and Air are both in a state of infancy. Hence, there is no need at present for three full-fledged departments, and for the present one would suffice.

There are some who hold that the political department should be in charge of a member of the Executive Council. We think such a course is needless, and will create complications, and so it should be postponed till the question of the future relations of the Indian States with the Government of India has been fully thrashed out.

(3) The present constitution needs another amendment, viz., that the Secretary of State for India should not at all interfere in a matter wherein the Governor-General in Council and the Legislative Assembly are in complete accord. Foreign and military matters should, however, be regarded as exceptions, for they deeply affect Imperial interests.

(b) Position and Powers of Governor-General.—Until the federal system is fully established in India and the authority of the Central Government definitely fixed under the Federated States of India, the position of the Governor-General should also be of a dual nature. That is, he should be a responsible ruler in certain departments and an executive head in others.

(c) Relationship of Governor-General to his Executive Council.

As we have already stated in the case of the Governors, it is in the fitness of things that the authority of the Governor-General should be curtailed while those of executive councillors extended, so that when a complete responsible government comes to be established, there should be no difficulty in transforming the Central Government on the lines of representative government.

(d) Relationship of the Governor-General to Legistive Assembly and the Council of State.—We think the powers enjoyed by the Governor-General at present are very necessary for the carrying on of an efficient administration, but we think also that a frequent use of those extraordinary powers is far from desirable. No Governor-General in any civilised country or dominion would think of interfering in matters like the Salt Tax. But such things have happened very often in India during the last few years. Hence, there must be some such direction in the manual of instructions, whereby the power of veto or certification may be made exceptional even at the risk of difficulties.

(e) The Governor-General should also be instructed to hold informal meetings of members of the Assembly and the Council of State to discuss important matters of State. Being no longer the President of the Assembly or the Council, he is losing contact with the people's representatives. Dinners and tea parties cannot be so useful as informal meetings of the Legislature, where political views may be frankly exchanged.

(f) As the federal system must be preceded by Provincial autonomy, it is natural that, in the absence of the latter, the Executive Council of the Governor-General must receive its powers and authority from the Home Government. To put this Executive Government under the supervision of the Central Legislature would be productive of more harm than good. The best course in such circumstances is to create separate departments in the Government of India for those subjects which have been wholly placed in the control of the Ministers in the Provinces, and such departments of the Central Government should be given in charge of one or more ministers. These transferred subjects might, as delegated powers, be placed under the full control of the Central Legislature.

(g) Relationship between the Two Houses.—We have never agreed in principle to the establishment of the Council of State. We believe it is one of the glaring mistakes of the Montford Scheme. Whatever rights and powers have been bestowed upon the Assembly they have been taken away by the establishment of the Council of State. We would, therefore, recommend its total abrogation from the constitution. But if it be proposed to retain it, we would advise that at least 70 per cent. of its members should be elected and the Government majority should be abolished. No question of relationship arises if the first part of our suggestion in this behalf is agreed to. In the latter case there is no need for change in the existing relationship, but if the existing majority be retained or if official-cum-nominated majority be adhered to then, of course, we would propose that the Council of State should function merely as a consultative body without any powers to revise or reject the Assembly's decisions.

6. Relationship between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments.

(a) The extent of the power of superintendence, direction and control to be exercised by the Central Government:—There is a fundamental principle concerning this question which should never be overlooked. It is that there can be only two forms of Government. First, those that owe their powers to ownership, such as the representative form of government; and, secondly, those that owe their authority to possession, such as the autocratic or bureaucratic forms of government. Any other form of government is not a responsible government, and, therefore, it needs supervision at the hands of the people or the Central Government, or else the administration is sure to suffer. Now, it is an admitted fact that the Provincial Governments neither belong to the one category nor to the other. In one part they represent the people and in the other they owe their authority to the Central Government, so in both respects they are in need of supervision. Now the department wherein the provincial governments are given autonomous powers should be put under the direct supervision and direction of the legislative councils, while in those departments which are outside the control of the legislative councils or where the officials are not under the supervision of the provincial councils such departments or officers must remain under the direct superintendence, direction and control of the Central Government.

Secondly, as the various communities inhabiting India have not had friendly relations among themselves for the time past, and as each one of them is afraid of the other, therefore, in the absence of a Supreme Court that should settle these communal differences and questions, these various communities should be entitled to appeal to Central Government through their elected representatives, especially in those matters where some other community or communities under the cloak of political or economic necessity have unduly infringed their special communal or religious rights.

(b) The classification of subjects as central and provincial.

Central subjects, we think, should include foreign, defence, railways, posts, and all-India legislation. To these may be added those of the provincial subjects which need a unifying control throughout the country, but this should, of course, depend upon the willing delegation of powers on the part of the provinces. We think, however, that a part of the Department of Defence, Army and Air Force, can also be provincialised side by side with its federation, as is the case in the U.S.A. It is very necessary, too, owing to the peculiar conditions obtaining in India, where owing to the numerical preponderance of one community there is danger in the exclusive centralisation of defence, inasmuch as the majority depending upon its voting strength may out of ill-will or other causes legislate in a discriminative way so as to stamp martial spirit out of a special class of people who are in minority. So partial provincialising of defence is necessary even in the interests of free and unhindered development of minorities. The parallel is not only confined to U.S.A. as we have mentioned above, but extends also to Germany, where there exist in addition to the Federal Army what are called the State Armies.

(c) The financial relationship between the Central and provincial governments, including the Meston Settlement:—There is much room for improvement in the relations between the provincial and Central governments in the matter of finance, but as the basis for the above cannot be stated definitely, therefore it cannot be discussed here in detail. This much can be advanced as a matter of principle that as all revenue-producing subjects would be under the provincial government therefore it is our duty to see that the provinces do not suffer in any way. We regret to notice that in the Meston Award the financial condition of the provinces was unduly weakened. The difficulties at the time were of a temporary nature, but the award crippled the provinces for a long time to come with the undue emphasising of the central needs. Although the Central Government has taken certain steps to undo the wrong by totally remitting or postponing the contributions to the Central Government, we are of the opinion that it should be laid down that in future not a single pie should be levied from the provinces in the form of a fixed contribution. As to the other revenue-producing departments, such as customs, mints, posts and telegraphs, railways, ruling states' contributions, salt (provided the Salt Department is to be retained), all these should be retained as Imperial. To treat income tax as a purely Imperial subject we regard as a great mistake, for the development of this source of income depends upon the efforts put forth by the provincial governments on this behalf. If there is no incentive or interest in the form of a suitable share in the income the provincial government cannot be supposed to work enthusiastically, and in the absence of income which could be fruitfully employed in the development of industry or commerce, the provincial governments are sure to show indifference or slackness in voting demands for these departments. Or if they did materially help commerce or industry the agricultural classes would be justified in saying that certain other departments are developing at the expense of theirs, without contributing anything to the provincial purse. Such a policy is untenable on principle, too, for that would mean that a certain portion of the provinces under the federated states system would still be beyond the control of provinces. To remove this defect two suggestions may be put forward; first, that income tax should be provincialised, and, in lieu of this change, certain other sources of revenue be centralised, though this, too, is not without glaring defects. For instance, stamps, land revenue, and excise are the only other departments which may be handed over to the Central Government. Now the handing over of the land revenue will be open to the same objection as the income tax. As regards stamps, it is a source of income from a particular department, and this income is at present spent on judicial employees, and it would sound ridiculous to hand over the income to the Central Government and to make payments out of the provincial sources. Excise, too, cannot be handed over, as the Indian voice is in favour of prohibition, while legislation in this behalf is purely a provincial matter. Now as the general trend is towards prohibition, and in view of the fact that the provincial governments will have left no incentive to retain it, they would be sure to legislate in this respect at the expense of Imperial interests. The result would be that in a few years the Central Treasury will run short and their budgets will begin to show a deficit. If, on the other hand, all legislation regarding excise and its control be entrusted to the Central Government, it is sure to conflict with the principle of provincial autonomy. And, moreover, the evil of drink would never be tackled and the curse will hang round the people's necks for ever.

Considering all this, we advocate that in addition to the abolition of provincial contributions, it should be laid down that treating the income of 1929 as the basis of income from income tax, any future excess over it should be divided equally between the Provincial and the Central Governments, so as to retain the interests of all parties and to avoid the very reasonable objection of the agriculturists, whose main ground of objection rested on the exploitation of their interests in the interest of the monied classes.

7. The courts and Judiciary:—

We must confess it with shame that the increase of the Indian element in the judiciary of the country has greatly damaged its fair name and reputation that it formerly commanded. We do not mean to say that an Indian judge has less probity than an English judge. What we mean to say is that communal bias and prejudice is so much to the fore that it has become a sort of second nature with the Indians and even judges are not free from its taint. The Indian judges have to deal with their own countrymen whether of one community or the other. While an English judge has very rarely to deal between an Englishman and an Indian, and has often only to decide between an Indian and an Indian, so he has less opportunity to show his communal bias. But the Indian judges have to frequently deal between the members of their community and those of others so the temptation for him is greater, and it is a sad fact that very few Indians have risen above this communal bias.

In addition to their judicial duties, the judges possess executive powers too, and it has not infrequently happened that, as a result of the exercise of such powers a particular judge's community has gained at the expense of the other communities. Therefore, as it has been deemed expedient to appoint Royal Commissions at stated intervals to report on political progress, we think it advisable that to properly guard against the undue usurpation by one community, both in the judicial as well as the executive department of the judiciary, there should be provision in the law to appoint Royal Commissions at stated intervals, for this purpose also, say, after every seven years, a commission should be appointed which should report how far progress has been made in the elimination of this communal bias, after making thorough inquiries, and whether the various communities are enjoying their full rights. For instance, we take the Punjab judiciary. Here we find the Moslems very badly represented in view of their proportion in the population of the province. The High Court has one Moslem barrister judge as against three Hindu barrister judges, and even this Moslem judge has been imported from outside, and so he cannot be fully cognisant of the grievances of the local Muslims. The Small Cause Courts judges are generally Hindus. Most of the senior and junior posts in the judicial departments are held by the Hindus with only a nominal inclusion of Moslems. Why, in spite of the great strides education has recently made in the Moslem ranks, we find them represented in such a disproportionate manner in the judiciary, is a point worth going into. A High Court judge cannot be removed without the sanction of Parliament and His Majesty. Now if communal bias were to find its way into the ranks of the High Court judges, the peace of the country cannot but be jeopardised. Therefore, until such time as this communal bias makes room for something fair and impartial, there is need for the institution of septennial Royal Commissions who should minutely go into all these points and report on the general progress made and make recommendations in connection thereof. Again, it should be settled once for all that the number of judges according to communities will be in direct proportion to the population of the communities. This principle is at present treated very lightly and has not yet been accepted as a working principle in India, whereas the League of Nations has admitted it as a part of the constitution for every government. The minority clause has been specially inserted in the constitution of the League with this end in view, so that the minorities may be represented on the judiciary of their country according to their numbers. If in Europe, where the people are so far ahead of India in education, this principle could not be dispensed with, but on the other hand has been given its due place in the various constitutions, why should India, which is at present the arena of communal fights and struggles, be deprived of it.

8. The Constitutional problem in relation to some vital matters.

(c) Defence of India.

We are of the opinion that in the matter of the defence of India the Indians must bear the greatest possible share. To say that the Indians cannot defend themselves is not right, for the Indians have not had an opportunity to show their capacity for it. The Skeen Committee's recommendations should be given effect to as soon as possible. We would like to point out that, unlike our other countrymen, we are heartily in agreement with the amendments of Skeen Committee's report which the Government of India have effected.

It is, of course, the duty of every government to help in the social progress of the country, but it is also very necessary to bear in mind that under no circumstances should the religion of the people be interfered with.

(e) Federation in India.

We have already dealt with this question and we have declared it as our definite opinion that the future progress of this country is closely and indissolubly bound up with the policy of the Federated States of India.

(f) The Status and Position of India in British Empire.

As far as we understand, one of the root causes of all agitation in British India is the indifference of the governing powers to this question. An Indian does not like to be discriminated against or otherwise unfairly treated in foreign lands, much less can he stand any insult to his own nationality within the British Empire. Unless the Indians attain the same status and the same treatment as is enjoyed by the Free Dominions, it is idle to expect of the Indians to take any pride in the fact of their being the citizens of the British Empire. This is quite natural and the demand quite legitimate. When an Indian feels that he is treated worse than an alien in the British Dominions of Australia, South Africa, and Canada, that he is regarded there as something like an inferior being and at the same time when he comes to know that even enemy aliens of white complexion are treated like brothers, he cannot but regard the British Empire as a meaningless phrase so far as India is concerned. Rather than take any pride in it he regards the Empire as a sort of shackle or restraint upon his nationality, for he knows that being free a small country like Japan can retaliate on the smallest provocation, whereas India, in spite of its being a much bigger land, and containing better resources, cannot move her finger in spite of insults being heaped upon her, and this in spite of her being called a member of the British Empire.

The plea of difference in civilisations is a mere myth. If an Indian can be deprived of the rights of British citizenship on the score of such a plea, then one may naturally ask why should England with all her difference in civilisation and culture interefere in the internal affairs of India? If the Russians, in spite of this cultural difference, can live side by side with the Asiatics, why cannot the peoples of the Dominions? If in the British Dominions the Russians can enjoy equal rights, why should the Indians be deprived of this status? In short, this unfair and unjust treatment of the Indians has been cutting deep into the Indian sensitiveness, and we honestly think that if at any time in the future there happens such a thing as the dissolution of the British Empire, its greatest cause would be none other than this unfair and unjust treatment of the Indians.

10. The Position of the Services.

(d) The question of the recruitment of Public Service Commission.

This Commission is certainly a good thing, provided due care is taken to recruit Muslims in all grades of services in the Provinces. They should be recruited according to their proportion in the population, while in the Central Government they should get one-third of the posts. Capable and efficient Muslims can be easily found for all grades of services.

(e) Indianisation.—In our opinion the time has arrived when all the posts and grades should be thrown open to the Indians. Excepting the Army, Navy and Air Force, where, too, the process of Indianisation should be accelerated at a quicker rate than it is at present in all other departments, provisions must be made to give from sixty to eighty per cent. of the posts to Indians. There can be no peace in the land until there is suitable accommodation for educated Indians of worth and capacity. It is apparent that there are no chances for an Indian in Canada, Australia, South Africa, or England, and if he be debarred from his own country, too, on the flimsy plea of efficiency, there is no wonder that he should swell the ranks of the disaffected.

Before closing this memorandum, we beg leave to respectfully submit that under the peculiar circumstances of India, where communal prejudices are so rampant, it is absolutely necessary that the right of minorities should be properly safeguarded, and just as in Greece, Czechoslovakia, Poland, America, Austria, Hungary, etc., safeguards have been provided for the rights of minorities in the constitutions of these countries. Similarly, the future constitution of India should definitely contain proper safeguards for the rights of the Moslems, particularly with respect to separate representation, proportionate share in the services, non-interference in religious matters, language and education. Without such safeguards the reforms would be no reforms for the Moslems, and the representative form of Government will merely exist in name.

It may not be out of place to mention here that certain representatives of the Ahmadiyya Community would also appear as witnesses before the Commission, and the names of the following gentlement may kindly be noted in this connection :—

(1) Maulvi Abdur Rhaim Dard, M.A., late Imam of the London Mosque.

(2) Doctor Mufti Mohammad Sadiq, late of the Ahmadiyya Muslim Mission in Chicago, U.S.A.

(3) Mirza Bashir Ahmad, M.A.

Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: * * * I would like you to clear up certain points which I wish to put to you. I do not want to conceal from you that one of the principal controversies which range round the matter of election throughout is the question of communal or joint electorates. Would you very kindly tell the Conference when this principle was first introduced in India?—During the pre-Minto-Morley days Indian representation on the various legislatures in this country, Imperial and provincial, was by means of nomination. The principle of election was first introduced in the Minto-Morley Reforms.

3. Chairman: You mean to say it came into operation in the year 1909?—Elections were held towards the end of 1909, and on the 1st January, 1910, the Reforms came into operation. Simultaneously with the introduction of the principle of elections, communal electorates were introduced in this country.

4. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: At that time was any dissatisfaction expressed by any of the principal political parties in India with regard to these electorates?—As a matter of fact it so happens that I played a humble part in the negotiations which took place between the Government on the one hand and the various parties on the other. I was one of the six Muslim representatives summoned to Simla to discuss the whole matter with a sub-committee of the Executive Council, and I know that the arrangements finally arrived at and actually introduced were with the concurrence of the late Mr. Gopala Krishna Gokhale, who was the leader of the Indian National Congress at the time.

5. Of course you are aware that under these Reforms the principle of separate electorates was not introduced in the Punjab?—No, it was not introduced.

6. You were at that time—were you not—the honorary general secretary of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League?—I was.

7. I presume that in the elections held under those Reforms you certainly took some part and might be aware of the details of those elections. Can you tell the Conference how that system worked in the Punjab?—As general secretary of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League I had a great deal to do with all the three elections which took place under the Minto-Morley Reforms scheme until the introduction of the Chelmsford-Montagu scheme, and as a matter of fact the so-called joint electorate then introduced resulted in this that at every election while in the beginning four or five Hindu and four or five Mahomedan candidates were proposed and seconded, at the final stage of the actual elections in each constituency there was only one Hindu candidate against one Mahomedan, and the fight thus became a fight not between individuals but between communities, and furnished a periodical recurring cause of friction between the two communities.

8. Was the system found or accepted as satisfactory by the Muslims in the Punjab?—No; they continued to ask for the introduction of separate communal electorates in this province as well.

9. Were their demands in any form or shape accepted?—There was a meeting of the Congress and the Muslim League leaders at Lucknow in December, 1916, and with the full concurrence of the National Congress leaders, who were mainly our Hindu brethren, and the then leaders of the Muslim League, a scheme was evolved, as a result of which separate communal electorates were introduced both in Bengal and the Punjab as a result of mutual agreement, and this scheme was accepted by the Joint Select Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, in spite of the fact that the Government of India recommended that the Muslims in Bengal should be given 50 per cent. representation instead of 40 per cent. as agreed to in that pact.

10. I understand that in other provinces also this principle was accepted and had already been in force?—Yes.

11. Can you say if this principle was accepted by all parties at that time or whether it was accepted only by some and objections were raised by others?—I can give the Commission positive facts in support of the statement that, right until the end of 1922 and even later, no objection was raised against separate communal electorates by any responsible person or organisation. On the contrary, in the United Provinces, during the period of office of my friend Mr. Chintamani, one of the leading Hindu politicians in this country, separate communal electorates were extended, with the concurrence of the Hindu majority in that council, to municipalities and district boards. In 1922 Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya started the All-India Hindu Mahasabha. The first anniversary of that Mahasabha took place at Gaya under the Presidency of Pandit Malaviya on 30th December, 1922. At that anniversary what are known as the Shuddhi and Sangathan movements were started, and nothing was said against communal electorates. On the 19th August, 1923, the All-India Hindu Sabha met again at Benares under the Presidency again of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. Again stress was laid on the Shuddhi and Sangathan movements, but nothing was said even then against separate communal electorates. For the first time at Belgaum, at the annual meeting held on the 27th December, 1924, again under the presidency of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, a voice was raised against separate communal electorates. That was the first occasion on which this new agitation was started.

12. Chairman: I am afraid I have not quite followed you. I am anxious to keep the dates right. I think you said that no objection to separate electorates was raised in any responsible quarter till 1922. Now you are going into details and it looks as though you are saying that no objection was raised to communal representation till 1924?—I divided this period. The first stage was the one ending with 1922. Until then the National Congress and the Muslim League were the two political bodies in India representing the political intelligentsia of the country. Towards the end of 1922 the All-India Hindu Mahasabha came into existence. Objection for the first time was raised in December, 1924.

13. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Since then there has been, as you are aware, organised agitation against separate electorates?—Yes.

14. Do we understand that it started in 1924 and subsequently gathered force?—To the best of my recollection it started in the beginning of 1925 after the passing of those resolutions at the meeting I have already referred to, and, as far as I remember, this agitation in its acute form was started after Mr. Lajpat Rai's return from England and the publication in the Times of a letter by Lord Olivier attacking separate communal electorates. Mr. Lajpat Rai, on his return from England, resigned the vice-chairmanship of the Swaraj Party and joined the Hindu Mahasabha.

15. Can you give the Conference your own view as to the object which made them unloose the agitation against separate communal electorates?—As the spokesman of this deputation, bearing in mind the principle of joint responsibility, I am giving the views of the deputation or of the association that this deputation represents.

16. When I said "you," I must explain I meant you on behalf of the deputation?—Yes. We are of opinion that the Shuddhi and Sangathan movements, and the agitation against separate communal elec-torates, are part and parcel of the same programme and the same policy.

17. And in your view the object is?—The object is to bring into existence in India an oligarchy rather than a really representative government.

18. Do you think that the replacement of the present system of separate communal electorates by joint electorates in this province would lead to better intercommunal relations than at present exist?—No. In our view joint electorates are certain to furnish periodically recurring cases of friction between the two communities, and, as true patriots and nationalists, we are on that ground, as well as on other grounds, opposed to it.

19. You, Sir Muhammad Shafi, explained to the Conference why you think that communal bitterness might be intensified. Why should there be worse communal feeling in a joint electorate?—Because in a separate communal electorate we have a Hindu candidate fighting another Hindu candidate at the election, and a Mahomedan candidate fighting another Mahomedan candidate. If any feeling of irritation is generated thereby it does not last long, and it is confined to the community itself, while in the case of joint electorates, bearing in mind the actually existing conditions in the country, the fight will be between the two communities and it will be a periodically recurring fight. Joint electorates, instead of helping the cause of Indian nationalism, will thus be in the highest degree detrimental to that cause.

20. Sir Muhammad Shafi, you must be aware that one of the systems which in some quarters has been suggested as a sort of compromise between the joint system of election and the separate electorates is the system which briefly is called the joint electorates with reservation of seats for particular communities. Do you not think that that might provide you with a suitable system?—In our opinion the introduction of joint electorates with reservation of seats will make matters still worse, and that for this reason. We are in intimate and close touch with the actually existing conditions and therefore we know that what will happen will be this: The majority of Mahomedans will support the Mahomedan candidate who really represents the Mahomedan community. The majority belonging to the opposite community will set up a dummy Mahomedan to oppose him and might, by casting the influence which the moneylenders and others exercise, succeed in securing a minority of Moslem votes in support of that dummy candidate. Similarly the Mahomedans will counter the efforts of the Hindus by setting up dummy Hindu candidates and supporting them by their own votes. The result will be that, instead of a dual contest, there will be a quadruple contest in circumstances which will give rise to results far worse than even the ordinary joint electorates. There will be another consequence, sir, if I may invite the attention of the Commission to it. Every effort will be made by each community to defeat the best candidate of the other community and to try and put nonentities in the council. They will succeed in many cases; they will not succeed in all, and the result will be that the legislative councils, as a result of this joint electorates and reservation of seats system, will become the laughing stock of the country and will grow, from the point of view of the good of the country, worse than even the legislative councils we have now.

21. You are aware of the enormous amount of rural indebtedness in this province? Do you think that this indebtedness plays a part in the result of elections?—Undoubtedly it does. My long experience and intimate knowledge of the conditions of this province leads me to the conclusion that it does, and all the members of this deputation are in entire agreement with me with regard to this statement.

22. Are you of opinion that separate electorates under the Montford scheme of reforms have fostered communal dissensions and communal disturbances?—Far from it. Mr. Chintamani, the Minister already referred to, in his statement before the Reforms Enquiry Committee, of which I was a member, in reply to my question, admitted that the introduction of separate electorates had fostered better understanding and mutual co-operation and goodwill between the two communities in the United Provinces, and that was the reason why he had been instrumental in extending separate electorates to district boards and municipalities.

26. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: With regard to this Province, is it your view that separate electorates here have in any way fostered communal dissensions?—No, what has fostered communal bitterness and communal disunity are the Shuddhi and Sangathan movements on the one hand and the Tanzim and Tabligh on the other. Sir, this question of the responsibility for the existing Hindu-Moslem situation was discussed by me in an article in the June number of the Indian Review of last year, which, I believe, is referred to in this Memorandum.

27. Chairman: In any case it reached my hands 48 hours ago.—That is our analysis of the existing situation.

28. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Can you say how many elections have been held from the university constituency since the Morley-Minto reforms?—I think six.

29. How many Mahomedan members have been returned and how many non-Mahomedans?—In five elections my Hindu brethren have been returned to the Council by the university and on one occasion Mr. (now Sir) Fazl-i-Husain was returned.

30. Was it before the introduction of the reforms or after?—That was before the introduction of the Chelmsford-Montagu reforms, when graduates were enfranchised. Before that only the Fellows of the university voted at the elections.

31. In the case of Sir Fazl-i-Husain, was there a contest, or was he elected unopposed?—I was Mr. Fazl-i-Husain's counsel at that election. There was a legal question involved. The Mussalmans put forward Mr. Fazl-i-Husain as their strongest candidate. My Hindu brethren thought that the candidate who was likely to defeat Mr. Fazl-i-Husain at the election, their best candidlate, was Raja Sir Harnam Singh, and he was proposed and seconded. I appeared before the returning officer as counsel for Mr. Fazl-i-Husain and took the objection that Raja Sir Harnam Singh, not being a British subject, could not stand for election. The result was that my objection prevailed and Raja Sir Harnam Singh was disqualified and Mr. Fazl-i-Husain was elected unopposed.

32. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Are you aware that there are some Fellows of the university who are elected by the graduates?—Yes. Under what is known as Lord Curzon's University Act two members of the Senate are elected every year by the graduates of the university.

33. And their total number is eight?—Yes.

34. Since the introduction of that system has any Mahomedan ever been elected?—No, not a single Mahomedan has been elected ever since the passing of Lord Curzon's Act.

36. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: From your vast experience as a lawyer in this Province perhaps you will be able to tell the Conference whether there is any statutory or customary rule of law which prevents a non-proprietor from obtaining a village site for building a house if the proprietor chooses to sell it?—There is nothing to prevent it.

37. Without going into details perhaps you will be able to tell us whether the present representation of the Muslims in this Province on local bodies, district boards and municipalities and town committees is according to the population strength?—So far as I have been able to collect statistics I can, in a few words, explain the position——

38. If you tell us whether it is below their strength or not, that will serve my purpose.—It is below their strength.

39. Now, so far as the Legislative Council is concerned, you accept the principle of universal adult franchise?—Yes. The League advocates that.

40. Now I want your opinion, as the leading Mahomedan in this Province, whether there will not be a considerable amount of reluctance on the part of Mahomedan women to go to the polling booth?—In my opinion, for the next 20 or 25 years at least only a very small minority of Mahomedan women will go to the poll.

41. Now perhaps you would inform the Conference whether in your opinion the Punjab Land Alienation Act was designed as an economic measure or as a class measure, and whether it has operated as a class measure or as an economic measure, and whether you consider its continuance is necessary in the interest of the Province or not?—I had something to do with the passing of the Punjab Land Alienation Act, and the genesis of that Act was that, during the period of the settlement alone, such a mass of lands had passed into the hands of the moneylenders that the result was dacoities and disturbances, and, from a political point of view, the position became so dangerous that Mr. Thorburn, who was the Commissioner of Rawalpindi, recommended to the Government that some measure of this kind should be passed in order to prevent the expropriation of the landowning class in the Punjab in this manner; for it was developing into a grave political danger, both for the Government and for the country. That was the genesis of the passing of this Act.

42. Chairman: May I interrupt you? The Conference and the Statutory Commission are not going into the detailed merits of such an Act at all, because I do not suppose that anybody suggests that we should go into details of any particular Act. Its relevance is merely as a piece of legislation, referred to by one side as illustrating the importance of making more effective some express statutory provision which they suggest would make it impossible for the legislature to pass any legislation which conferred rights or opportunities on members of one community when it did not confer them on another. It was referred to on the other side and by you at this moment as an illustration of what you think is the necessity for such legislation. But the only relevant point is this, whether or not you think that there ought to be any statutory provision, something that either permits or prevents it?—I think the circumstances here are such that there ought to be a statute to prevent expropriation of the landed classes in this Province.

43. That is, of course, in regard to the Punjab. But it was suggested this morning, in the view which was put forward by a very large number of Hindus in this Province, that in any future constitution of India such a piece of legislation ought to be rendered impossible; it would be ultra vires. But I gather your view to be you do not think that there ought to be such a restriction put upon the local legislature?—I fail to see entirely why it is ultra vires.

44. And nobody suggests it is. We are talking now of the possible changes in the constitution. It may be very difficult for the Imperial Parliament to devise a rule that such things should not be done?—I think Parliament ought not to lay down any such rule. May I in this connection mention one thing—I think the Commission is probably already aware of it—that the Punjab Land Alienation Act protects all the agricultural tribes alike, whether they be Sikh, Hindu, or Mahomedan.

45. Raja Narendra Nath: * * * On page 108 you propose to sub-divide the Hindu community into caste Hindus and non-caste Hindus?—I do not sub-divide the Hindu community into those two sections. My view of the Indian situation is this. There are the pre-Aryan aborigines of India, numbering somewhere over sixty millions. There are then the caste Hindus, and there are the Mahomedans, I do not sub-divide the Hindus themselves into those two sections.

46. Would you also include aborigines who have embraced Islam as a separate class?—If the pre-Aryan aborigines of India themselves, any one of them, or any section of them, say that they are part and parcel of the Hindu community having embraced the Hindu religion, I am willing that they should be included among the Hindus, but not otherwise.

47. Do they call themselves Hindus, and have they got Hindu names?—Names do not signify anything at all.

48. Would you allow that sort of classification to be made in respect of other religions whether Mahomedans or Christians?—I say that all those who profess the Mahomedan religion are members of the Mussalman community; all those who profess the Christian religion are Christians.

49. You want the census superintendent or the enumerator to make a philological inquiry with regard to the origin of a man?—It is not a matter of inquiry as my honourable friend has put it. Everybody knows who are the pre-Aryan aborigines of India and who are the Aryan Hindu invaders. It does not need any investigation.

50. With regard to separate electorates, Sir Muhammad. I would invite your attention to the deputation which waited on Lord Morley, and to the reasons which were advanced for claiming separate electorates. The principal reason suggested was that the Mahomedans were a minority community. Would you not discriminate between a province where the Mussalmans are in a minority and where they are in a majority in the population?—Whatever may have been the reason given by that particular deputation to Lord Minto, whether that be the only reason or was one of the main reasons for which Mussalmans claimed separate electorates, the foremost reasons for which I say that no change ought to be introduced in regard to separate communal electorates are two; firstly, I think that joint electorates will furnish a periodical recurring cause of friction and thus do an immense amount of harm to Indian nationalism; secondly, the only way to secure a thoroughly representative legislature in this country, as in the Kenya Colony, is through communal electorates and not otherwise.

51. Could you suggest any instance from the constitutions of the world in which separate electorates are retained at the request of a majority community? —I am afraid I have had no time to study it. I have seen the Constitutions all collected together by the Irish Parliament in one volume. I have seen all those, but I have had neither the time nor the leisure to study the history of the agitation in various countries in the world which resulted in one form or the other form of the electorates being adopted.

52. My question is this. The Constitutions which allow separate electorates are few. And do you know whether in the case of one such Constitution separate electorates had been retained at the request of the majority community? I have put it " from the Constitutions of the world," but, as a matter of fact, there are only about four or five instances in which separate electorates are allowed?—I know of no country in the world, in which modern parliamentary systems have been introduced, of which the political and social conditions are so complicated as those of India, and I think that really it is not a question of analogy of this country or that country. It is a question of deciding things for this country in view of the actually existing conditions.

53. In paragraph 6 of the Memorandum before me you have asked for representation of the Mussalman community on the Provincial Council on the basis of population. Do you do away altogether with the principle of weightage for minorities, and do you allow that principle to be carried out everywhere?—Personally, and I think the Memorandum also has given expression to that feeling, I am willing to concede to my Hindu countrymen in those provinces where they are in a small minority the same concessions as they would be willing to concede to my community in those provinces in which they in their turn are in an overwhelming majority.

54. In the United Provinces the weightage allowed to the Mussalman minority is this. There they form 14 per cent. of the population, and the representation allowed to them is 30 per cent. In the Assembly they are given a weightage of 33 per cent. How would you manage the representation of Mussalmans on the basis of population if you followed the same principle with regard to the Sikh minority in the provincial council?—The reply to that, if I may venture to say so, is simple. We consider that the distinction which of late has been drawn for political purposes between Sikhs and Hindus is non-existent. The Sikhs are a sub-section of the Hindu community. I know a number of cases in which the father is a Hindu, the elder son a Sikh, and the younger son a Hindu. The Sikhs and the Hindus inter-marry among themselves. Their gotras are the same, their castes are the same, and, as was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the well-known case of Sardar Dayal Singh's will, the Sikhs are Hindus and are bound by Hindu law. So that in reality this distinction is artificial and is intended, by means of appealing to certain sentiments, to render the 5 per cent. majority of the Mahomedans practically useless. We, Mahomedans are perfectly willing that our Hindu brethren give to our Sikh brethren as much representation as they like out of their 45 per cent. If our Sikh brethren are entitled only to 11 per cent., and the Hindus agree to give them 25 per cent., we have no objection so long as this excess comes out of the 45 per cent.

55. You say that this distinction has been made on political reasons. Who is responsible for those political reasons?—I am not concerned with whoever is responsible for this condition, nor, if I may venture to say so, do I think that it is a matter into which this Commission will enter. There is the actual state of things.

56. I mean to say that the difference between Hindus and Mahomedans and the separate electorates given to Mahomedans may be also due to political reasons, or perhaps they owe their origin to the same source?—The origin of those is the desire of the Mahomedans as true democrats to make the legislative councils of this country really representative of the people, so that all interests should be represented in the Legislative Council.

57. But the Sikhs also wanted separate electorates. When the Reforms were introduced, it was at their request that the Government introduced separate electorates. There was no collusion between Hindus and Sikhs?—Supposing the Shias were to insist upon separate electorates being conceded to them because in many respects the Shias and the Sunnis differ with each other, I do not know how my friend the Raja Sahib will look upon such a demand. Personally, I think the two cases are analogous.

58. But you would maintain the principle of weightage to minorities?—Where the minorities are such that without giving them effective representation their interests cannot be properly protected. I am willing to give that to my Hindu brethren where the Hindus, for instance, in the North-West Frontier Province and other places, are in a small minority.

59. Chairman: I think you said that in the North-West Frontier Province, taking that as an example, you would be prepared to see a Hindu minority given something more than its strict mathematical proportion. Is that so?—Yes, just as the Mahomedans in Madras, for instance, under the pact of 1916 have received a slightly larger representation than their proportion in the population entitled them to. I am, in fact, willing that my Hindu brethren in the North-West Frontier Province may have even larger representation than the Mahomedans in Madras.

60. I would like to know what your view is in reference to the undoubted fact that the Hindus are in a minority in this province?—But may I point out, sir, that in Bengal and the Punjab also the Mahomedan majority is only 5 per cent., and the Hindu minority is already an effective minority? I am only referring to provinces where the minorities are something like 10 or 15 per cent. of the entire population. There special measures of protection are needed, not in provinces where they constitute 45 per cent. of the population.

61. Raja Narendra Nath: With regard to public services I find that you advocate the representation of Mahomedans on the basis of population. Here, again, would you allow the rule of weightage to operate for minorities? Would you allow to minorities greater representation than their numerical strength justifies? That point has not been considered by the League, and, therefore, I am entitled to express my own personal opinion on that. I think that their proper proportion of the population is a fair basis. No weightage is necessary in that case.

62. In some provinces, in Assam and the United Provinces, for instance, although the population of Mahomedans is 14 per cent., the proportion of Mahomedans employed in public service is 47. Would you reduce that percentage?—If I may venture to say so, the premise will not lead to that conclusion. I was saying that the minimum proportion should be that. Of course, if by reason of qualifications and other considerations more persons are appointed, that is a different matter altogether.

63. You see that in the United Provinces and in the Central Provinces educationally the Mahomedans are on the same level with the Hindus both in English and in Oriental languages. And the reason is that a larger proportion of the Mahomedan population in both these provinces live in towns, and there are better facilities for education in towns. Would you impose any obstacles in the way of Mahomedans for service?—No.

64. You would not put any obstacles on the minority here in the Punjab for that reason, assuming that the two are identical?—Why? Mahomedans in the Punjab have made rapid advance in education. There are thoroughly well qualified Mahomedans for any post in Government service. That being so, without putting any obstacle in the way of any other community we claim that the Mahomedans ought to have their fair proportion.

65. Would you make appointments of Mahomedans purely on merit then?—I would lay down a standard of efficiency for a particular class of posts. Having laid down that standard of efficiency, I would consider the case of only those who fulfil the requisite condition, and out of those who fulfil the requisite condition, when actually appointing I would bear that proportion in mind.

66. Do you object to the principle that recruitment to the public service should be made by an independent board, two-thirds on pure merit and one-third to remove communal inequalities?—No. I have actually had a voice in that decision, and I approve of it.

67. And you have no objection to its application to provincial and subordinate services?—The case of provincial and subordinate services perhaps stands on a different footing.

68. What distinction would you draw?—The qualifications for what have hitherto been called the Imperial services and the considerations which must influence the minds of the authorities in making the appointment to these posts are somewhat different from those which one has to bear in mind in regard to the provincial and subordinate services.

69. What are those considerations?—It is quite unnecessary to enter into those now, and I think the matter is self-evident. The responsibilities involved and the qualifications and other considerations are quite different. For instance, they would be different from what they are for mere clerical and other posts.

70. Mr. Owen Roberts: You have said that you will be prepared to extend special considerations to small minorities. May I take it that you will be prepared to extend those considerations to Europeans?—Yes.

71. Chairman: Before we pass on I should just like to understand clearly one matter of historical fact. You began, Sir Muhammad, I thought, by laying stress on this point, that the method of election was not used before the Morley-Minto Reforms? That is right, I suppose?—Yes, the general elections.

72. And that as soon as the method of election was adopted under the Morley-Minto Reforms, communal electorates were adopted?—Yes.

73. Is that correct as regards the Punjab?—I have already stated that Punjab was the only exception. The question in a general way was, when were communal electorates first introduced, and my reply was generally that they were introduced simultaneously with the introduction of the principle of election.

74. I only want to get the thing right in my mind. The correct statement of historical fact is this: that in the Punjab under the Morley-Minto scheme, that is to say, from the 1st of January, 1910, down to the Montford Reforms, there were no communal electorates at all?—That is true. Do you, Sir, when you put it so generally, refer only to the Punjab Provincial Legislative Council?

75. I mean, of course, the Punjab Legislative Council?—Yes, in certain of the local boards, for instance, communal electorates had been introduced long before that.

76. There were a certain number of nominated members and a certain number of experts and there were a certain number of elected members, elected, for example, by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce and various other bodies. So far as the elective members were concerned, they were elected by the district boards, and there were three of them. Now tell me if the district boards had a communally-elected element?—No; municipal boards had.

77. It follows, then, that there was not a single person under the Morley-Minto Reforms, so far as the Punjab Council was concerned, who was elected by a communal electorate?—No, there was not. I might mention that I myself was a member on all those three councils.

78. In some other provinces it would be equally untrue, would it not, to say that the whole system was based on communal electorates, but it would be correct to say that, for good reasons or for bad, there was added to the body a limited number of members that were elected by the Mahomedans of the province. For example, in Bombay there were four additional members elected by the Mahomedans of the province? —You will remember, if I may venture to say so, the question was merely this: when were communal electorates first introduced in India?

79. I am only anxious to get the facts. The fact seems to be that it would be untrue to say that in all the provinces the whole thing was based on communal electorates?—Mixed in parts and separate in others.

80. The separate parts were small, and in the case of Bombay only four members were elected by means of a communal electorate of some kind?—That is because they are in a minority.

81. I see the same thing, for example, in other provinces where the Mahomedans were in a minority, and I suppose that the real reason—I do not say it is an adequate one—the explanation why they did not do it in the Punjab was because when the scheme was drawn up they regarded the Punjab as a province in which the majority were Mahomedans. That must be the reason?—All I can say with reference to that observation is that if you will kindly refer to the speech delivered by His Excellency Lord Minto, in reply to the address presented to him by the All-India Mahomedan deputation on the 1st October, 1906, you will find in it the reason why separate communal electorates were conceded to the Mussalmans. You will find there what was in the mind of the framers with regard to each particular province.

82. What is stated is this: They point out that "in many cases electoral bodies as now constituted cannot be expected to return a Muslim candidate, and if by chance they do so it would only be at the sacrifice of such a candidate's views to those of the majority opposed to his own community." Therefore what strikes as one reads it, as a mere matter of history, is that Lord Minto might very well have thought that in a province where the majority was Muslim that proposition would not lead to a separate representation of Mahomedans?—With all deference I may say that the proposition as we understood it—I was also a member of that deputation at that time—was this, that any Mahomedan returned by a joint electorate cannot be said to be a real representative of the Mahomedan community.

Dr. Suhrawardy: I may say, sir, that in Bengal the Muslims form the majority of the population, and yet in Bengal, under the Minto-Morley Reforms, five seats were given to us in excess of our population. Lord Minto in his speech said to the following effect: The Muslims demand three things; first, communal representation; second, a few seats in excess of their numerical strength on the ground of their political and historical importance. The third demand was for the appointment of a Mahomedan Member to the Executive Council of the Viceroy along with the Hindu Member. The last he said he could not do. The word excess is very misleading, because as a matter of fact we have not got any excess, but, as you have pointed out, we had the joint electorate and the Muslim could offer himself for election by the joint electorate, though in practice, in Bombay, not a single Muslim was ever returned.

83. Chairman: It was a curious arrangement, but it is a thing which is only of historic importance. You have cleared my mind about a mere historical point. If the Commission has to write a report which includes an account of what happened under the Minto-Morley Reforms I must be quite sure that I understood correctly what it was, and you were speaking of the history?—Yes; but I submit that, in spite of all that is brought out now, the position remains as I stated in the beginning, that communal electorates as a system of election were first introduced in India along with the introduction of the system of election by the Minto-Morley Reforms.

84. It is plain. If you assume that there were no elections before 1909, and that the Morley-Minto scheme may be treated as the beginning of what I call the electoral period, it is true that from the very beginning this method of separate or communal electorate was to be found in India in all the provinces, except in the Punjab?—Yes.

85. Dr. Narang: On page 108 of your memorandum you say that the League represents the views and sentiments of the Muslims of India as a whole. Is it not a fact that there is another All-India Muslim League in the country and yours is only schism or an offshoot or a descent of that League?—I am afraid my friend Dr. Narang's question is based on an entire misapprehension of the real state of things. It is a well-known fact that the All-Indian Muslim League split upon the question of the boycott of this Commission and that question alone, and that because of that split the League is divided into two sections at present and probably will be so long as this Commission remains here. So far as the policy of the League, apart from the question of the boycott of the Commission, is concerned, there is no material difference, and before long the two Leagues will unite.

Chairman: We had already heard there were two bodies, and I do not suppose questions and answers will decide finally and definitely the exact amount of authority of either. At any rate, it is admitted we have a very important and representative deputation before us.

86. Dr. Narang: That is a different matter. With regard to another matter, you rely a great deal on your experience of elections, but, if I am not mistaken, you have never stood for election under the Reforms scheme?—To what scheme do you refer?

87. The Montford Scheme, either for the Assembly or the Legislative Council?—My friend knows very well (or he ought to, if he does not) that when the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms were introduced I was a Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council and had no opportunity of standing for election.

88. I only wanted an answer, yes or no; that is all. Whatever the reasons may be, you have no personal experience of elections?—I stood for election twice under the Morley-Minto Reforms.

89. On page 108, referring to the basis of the franchise, have you gone through the memorandum of the Ahmadiyya community (pp. 112-120), which is also represented, I understand, in this deputation?—It is represented; both sections are represented.

90. If you will turn to page 112 of that memorandum, I should like to read a passage to you:—" We are, however, of the opinion that this extension should for the present be restricted to those who are in one way or other a support to the Government." The memorandum goes on to say, " we would suggest that the franchise be extended to (a) every one who pays to the Government land revenue or income tax or any other tax, however small the sum may be." Do you agree with this view?—So far as the position of the League is concerned, the League agrees with anything any other body may have said in so far as that body's memorandum is in agreement with what the League has said in its memorandum: as regards the rest, I am not in a position to express any opinion. You can ask them about it.

91. I should like to ask you what your ideal of constitutional advance is. If you had the power today, what further instalment of constitutional reform would you give to this country? What is your ideal?—The ideal is one thing and what measure of reforms I would at this moment give to the country is something quite different. My friend should confine his question either to the one or to the other. So far as the latter portion of the question is concerned, this memorandum embodies what I am prepared to give to the country at this revision. As to the ideal, it is what the Government of India Act says—responsible government; in other words, Dominion Status is my ideal.

92. You have said that the Indian question is not a national but an international question. Is that consistent with the aspiration for Dominion Status for this country?—Entirely consistent; I see no inconsistency between the two. For, if my friend will bear it in mind, Canada is now having its own ambassadors everywhere, and is yet within the British Empire. India has already got the necessary International status by being a member of the League of Nations in her own right.

93. You advocate provincial autonomy?—Yes.

94. Not only for the Punjab, but I hope for every province?—Our views are not confined to the Punjab. We do not say, " If such-and-such a thing is not done or is done we will not have any advance in the Punjab "; we want advance all over India equally, because we are true democrats and nationalists.

95. Do you think that in any province which enjoys provincial autonomy (and there are at least 11 provinces in India) two nations can subsist side by side under one system of government. If your idea of internationalism in India is kept in view, what will be the position?—It is not two nations, but two communities inhabiting the same country. There is a difference between nations and communities.

96. You have called this question an international question, not an inter-communal question, have not you? You have used the word " international," not " inter-communal." Is not it a fact that you have called it international?—International in the sense that you have so many communities here to deal with, and not one community.

Dr. Narang: In the sense of inter-communal, then.

Chairman: What is the question?

97. Dr. Narang: The question is this. (To the witness.) You have referred to three meetings; one in 1922, presided over by Pandit Malaviya, in which you say joint electorates were not mentioned; then to one in 1923, again presided over by Pandit Malaviya, at Benares, in which joint electorates were not mentioned. May I ask whether the Hindu Sabha is predominantly a social body?—The Hindu Mahasabha is social and political, and also a body which protects the religious rights of the Hindus. It comprises all three aims.

98. Can you point to one political resolution bearing on joint or separate electorates or any other political question such as those now before the Conference at either of those two meetings?—If the Commission would like me to do so, to-morrow I will send in copies of the resolutions actually passed by the All-India Hindu Mahasabha bearing on constitutional reforms and other political matters. I read the proceedings year after year regularly.

99. Chairman: I think that would be a very useful thing.

101. Dr. Narang: As for the Belgaum meeting held in September, 1924 (some four months after the last annual meeting of the Hindu Sabha), was not this a meeting held in connection with the Congress? The Congress was held at Belgaum?—It was a meeting of the All-India Hindu Mahasabha and not of the Congress, and therefore I cannot understand how it can be characterised as a meeting held in connection with the Congress.

102. Are you sure that your article in the Indian Review was not severely criticised in the Hindu press as containing some absolutely baseless statements?—Even the Tribune did not deny the facts I stated. The only criticism was that I did not refer to Sir Abdur Rahim's speech at Aligarh. They had to admit the facts, because the facts were undeniable—every one of them.

103. There was no criticism in any paper?—Yes, there was criticism.

104. All I wanted to know was whether your views were accepted by the Hindus as correct or not?—I can give you the article; I have it here.

105. Dr. Narang: On page 108 of your memorandum you say in paragraph 3 (c) " For the elections of the Provincial Legislatures, there should be universal adult suffrage." Why not also for the elections for the Legislative Assembly, if adult suffrage is your ideal?—Because we consider that the stage for that has not yet been reached.

106. But you think the stage for it for the councils has been reached?—Yes.

107. There is an essential difference between the Provincial Council and the Legislative Assembly?—Yes.

108. You say on page 109, " The League submits that this state of things is entirely opposed to all democratic principles and it urges the Commission to take this opportunity of redressing the grievous wrongs of the Muslims in these two provinces in these respects," and give the Muslims representation according to their population. Do you think it consistent with democracy that any community should demand separate electorates?—Yes, certainly.

109. You do?—Yes, because the basic principles of democracy are two: that the executive of a country should be responsible to its legislature, and that the legislature should be truly representative of the people. In order to make the legislatures in India truly representative of the people you must have communal electorates, otherwise your legislatures will not be truly representative of the people, and in the end the result will be the creation of an oligarchy which is entirely opposed to the principle of democracy.

110. You want democracy before the various elements of the people have been welded together to form one nation; does it not come to that?—They are welded together, and but for this present game of leader-bazi the present position would never have arisen; that is my sincere conviction.

* * * * * * * * * * *

117. Dr. Narang: Only two questions more. You say the Central Government should not have residuary powers, which should vest in the Provincial Government, and you want federation on the American model?—Yes.

118. Is it not a fact that before this federal system sprang up in America each American State was an independent sovereign body?—That is the reason why we want provincial autonomy to be introduced first, and then reform in the Central Government thereafter, so that each province may constitute a State before the central federation comes into existence.

119. You want to break the nation into pieces and then bring them together?—Not a bit. India is not a country, it is a continent; it is a continent as large as the whole of Europe minus Russia, and its population is greater than that of the whole of Europe minus Russia. In a country like India there can only be a federation and nothing else.

120. On page 111 you say that in All-India services you want one-third. Are you prepared to concede to the Hindus also that proportion where they are in a minority?—Yes, certainly; if their minority in a province amounts to 25 per cent., as does that of the Muslims in the whole of India, I am willing to concede them 33⅓ per cent.

121. In Assam the Mahomedans are 29 per cent.?—We ask that the Mahomedans, who constitute 25 per cent. of the population, should have 33 per cent. of representation in the services. I am willing to concede to my Hindu brethren 33 per cent. of the services in every province where they constitute 25 per cent. minority.

122. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Separate electorates in 1916 were set up for Mahomedans, backed up, I believe, by the Muslim League; is that a fact?—They were first set up in 1921. The elections were held in 1920, not 1916.

123. Chairman: I understand you are speaking of the Lucknow Pact?

Sardar Ujjal Singh: Exactly.—That was an agreement respecting all provinces, not setting up of separate electorates.

124. Chairman: You appear to be perfectly right, if I may say so, in saying that the Lucknow Pact was in 1916.

Witness: That is right.

125. Sardar Ujjal Singh: And that was a part of the bargain to bring the Mahomedans under the Congress fold?—Congress fold?

126. Yes.—It was an agreement between two independent bodies, one representing one community, the other representing another community, two independent bodies, quite separate from each other. Neither Congress came into the fold of the League, nor the League came into the fold of Congress.

127. The spirit of bargain was there; is not that correct?—Yes, compromise, not bargain.

128. Is it your opinion that the system of separate elections is a permanent feature of the Constitution, or can you ever imagine a time when separate electorates might be dispensed with?—I am afraid I am not a speculator, and I refuse to speculate as to what may happen many years ahead.

129. Chairman: If you will excuse me, I was interested in the same point as that put by Sardar Ujjal Singh. I quite agree that none of us can foresee the future, not even the wisest of us; but at the same time I have often seen the statement made that the Mahomedan community wish to retain the separate electorate on the ground that it will be necessary to keep it for a time until, as they hope, there is a change in the situation. And without, of course, in the least seeking to commit you to fixing a year, it would be useful, I think, to me and to the Commission to know whether you, with your great knowledge of the situation, think that your proposal is likely to be a temporary measure, or whether you think you see signs which would lead one to expect that what you now propose is likely to have to go on for a very long time?—The only way I can put it is this, that in the existing conditions I consider that the only way to secure representative legislatures in this country—and that is the primary consideration—is to maintain separate communal electorates. When the communities have learned to respect each other's legitimate rights, the time may come—I do not know when it will arrive, or how soon—when the experiment of joint electorates with reserved seats might be tried; and later on, if the nation is welded together, and from a political point of view all communal distinctions disappear, then possibly it might be——

130. Do not think I am in the least indicating any view, or even any bias.—I quite see that, sir.

131. I must be quite frank about my difficulties. You have just said, and I think, if I may say so, very wisely said that nobody could fix a date; but I see that you do hope that the time may come, and you define it as the time when the people of this country cease to attach any political importance to these communal distinctions. Do you think you will cultivate that spirit in this country by maintaining or by removing communal electorates?—By maintaining them.

132. You think if you maintain them long enough the political opinion of the country will attach no importance to them?—Yes, and, on the contrary, I hold as the result of my experience that if joint electorates were to be introduced, this ideal that we as sincere well-wishers of the country as looking forward to, and ought to look forward to, will be postponed, because joint electorates will accentuate the communal difficulties, and will provide periodical recurrent causes of friction, and therefore, will keep up communal irritation and friction.

133. I do not know that those reasons were given, but in order that I might not be supposed to have any sort of bias in the matter, let me add one other thing. I should have said that it was an extremely strong practical consideration that although the authors of the Montagu-Chelmsford report expressed, I think very forcibly, the arguments which appealed to them against communal representation, they none the less came to the conclusion that it was quite impossible to dispense with it, and I think it may be said again—no doubt it is a less striking fact, but it is an important fact, and one which you have every reason to know, and so has Sir Arthur Froom—that the Majority Report of the Muddiman Committee,* which deals with this same matter, again did not indicate any enthusiasm for the idea in the abstract, but none the less said that they regarded it as practically quite impossible to get rid of the system now. The reason I asked the question, therefore, was that I wondered whether you, with your very wide experience in this matter, visualised in some reasonably near future such a change in the situation as would lead us to hope that the change might some day be made?—I hope and pray that this era which is contemplated in the question may come as soon as possible—I hope and pray, but I see no prospect of that in the near future.

134. Sardar Ujjal Singh: You said that by joint electorates with a reservation of seats the danger is that nonentities will be returned—those were the words used by you. May I know what you meant by nonentities?—Dummies—political dummies.

135. Does it not mean that the man returned will not represent the views of one community, but the views of all the communities he will represent?—Well, I have myself seen in the Legislative Assembly, when I occupied a certain position there, men returned who slept all the time that the discussions were going on, and never took the slightest intelligent interest in the discussions, and then, when it came to division, they looked at certain individuals, to see which lobby these individuals went into. I mean men of that type.

136. Chairman: But there is communal representation, is there not, in the Central Legislature?—Yes.

139. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Do you say that in constituencies where there is a joint electorate the man returned is a nonentity, and always will be a nonentity?—Perhaps my friend has forgotten my answer. I said no doubt, from some of the constituencies good men would be returned.

140. As for adult franchise, you accept it, probably, as a democratic principle—you suggested it for that reason, I believe?—I suppose the members of the League who constitute the Committee had those considerations in mind.

141. And I find that some members of your deputation are also members of the Punjab Unionist Party, too, and in their memorandum they have suggested not adult franchise, but lowering of the franchise to Rs. 10 for landowners and Rs. 25 for tenants?—I think the best thing would be, as I am not aware of all the circumstances, to put the question to my friends, who are here.

142. Sardar Ujjal Singh: What I mean is that adult franchise is not the view of all the members of the deputation?—(Sir Muhammad Iqbal): It is.

143. How far, in your opinion, does the educational advancement in the province prevent the extension of the franchise to universal suffrage?—(Sir Muhammad Shafi): A very large number of voters in the Punjab have already been exercising their right to vote in municipal and district board elections, and therefore they have had sufficient education, direct education so far as voting is concerned, and the strong commonsense of the virile races of the Punjab, even in the case of those who have not yet actually exercised the vote, I think, fits them for the possession of the vote.

144. I said educational advancement?—Education is not the only test for the exercise of vote. I know lots of people who manage vast estates, and yet they are, from an educational point of view, almost illiterate. That is nothing.

145. So that is not the test in your opinion?—No.

Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: Not the only test.

146. Sardar Ujjal Singh: You say the distinction between the Hindus and the Sikhs is of recent origin?—The political distinction.

147. Have you never heard of the Sikh community as a distinct community before?—Oh, yes. So have I heard of the Arya Samaj community as a distinct community ever since it was founded.

148. Not as a distinct political constituency in Ranjit Singh's time?—I do not quite understand the question. I have heard of the Sikhs, certainly.

149. As apart from the Hindus?—As apart, no.

150. Would you call that a Sikh rule or a Hindu rule? I put a plain question to you. Would you call that a Sikh rule or a Hindu rule or a Mahomedan rule?—In essentials it was Hindu rule, although it was called a Sikh rule, because the sub-section of the Hindus who ruled over the province were denominated Sikhs—just as you hear of Mahratta rule, Rajput rule, and so on.

151. Do you know that at the Nagpur Congress also, Sikhs were admitted as a distinct community?—I am not concerned with what the Congress did or did not do.

152. I ask whether you know or not?—I think they might have done so, in so far as it has become convenient for political purposes to make this distinction.

153. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: You said you would be prepared to give away the majority; but would you say that is a danger of turning a majority into a minority?—No, I say it is a condition precedent that no majority should be reduced to a minority, and that is the true democratic principle.

154. One more question about the Lucknow Pact. Do you think the Lucknow Pact of 1916 was fair to Muslims as a whole?—It is a well-known fact that the Lucknow Pact of 1916 was protested against by a very large section of the Mahomedan community, and that there was then, as unfortunately now over the boycott of this Commission, a split in 1916 amongst the Mahomedans over that Pact.

155. Raja Narendra Nath: If the importance of Mahomedans for representation in councils and for representation in the services is to be considered in the light of the fact that they were rulers in the past, how much more important do you think it would be to assign places, with regard to representation in the services and in councils, to Christians who are the co-religionists of the present rulers?—Well, Sir, I personally am willing, and I think my friends of the deputation are willing and ready to attach due importance to all members of the British, Scottish and Irish races living in India.

Raja Narendra Nath: I am speaking of Indians.

156. Chairman: I think the question is with reference to the Indian Christian community?—I do not think Indian Christians rule over this country, or have ever ruled over it.

157. That was not the question; that was merely the introductory phrase used. The practical question is this, without any sort of introductory matter: Is it your view that the Indian Christian community in the Punjab is at the same time sufficiently important and sufficiently in a minority to require some special protection?—So far as the services are concerned—that was the question—I would willingly show every legitimate consideration to them.

158. Raja Narendra Nath: The fact of their being co-religionists—that is my question?—No.

159. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: In view of the opinion you have just expressed about joint electorates with reservation of seats, will you kindly tell us, in the district boards of your province how is it that I find out of 26 districts where you have joint electorates without reservation of seats, Muslims have secured seats much in excess of their voting strength?—So far as the district boards are concerned, the position is this, that in a number of district boards Mahomedans have secured much less than their due proportion of seats; in some they have secured more, but, on the whole, the number of members of district boards in the Punjab—Muslim members—is less than their proportion in the population.

171. Chairman: There are two considerations with regard to what my friend has put to me which I ask him and the Commission to bear in mind. The election in these districts is on the basis of the Government formula, not on the basis of mere proportion of voters and so on; that is to say, a mean is struck between the voting strength and the population, and that makes a difference. Further (and, if my friend is not aware of it, I think he ought to be, for he himself occupies the position to which I am about to refer) these elections in these joint electorates (and this is my main objection to them) become matters of contest between communities and not only between the individuals concerned, with the result that the Mahomedan candidate is backed up by all the influential Mahomedan residents and the Hindu by the Hindus. Take Dera Ghazi Khan. The whole district is divided into so many tumans and the tumandars are Mahomedans. It is obvious, therefore, the political influence in that district will be on the side of the Mahomedans, and in consequence, the Mahomedans have there secured a larger number of seats than is their due on the voting basis. The result, which is perfectly natural, gives rise to heart-burning among the Hindus.

* * * * * * * * * * *

172. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: You said that in your view the members returned by joint electorates were mere dummies?—Not all of them; I did not say all of them.

173. You have asked for representation according to the population basis in Bengal and the Punjab, but you want the retention of the Lucknow Pact as regards the other provinces. What is the principle on which you make this suggestion?—I am very willing to make the same concession in favour of my Hindu brethren in the North-West Frontier Province, Baluchistan and Sind. That is a mere matter of reciprocity.

174. For the Mohamedans you want proportional representation on a population basis?—Because their majority is only nominal—5 per cent.

175. That is for the Punjab and Bengal, but you want to stick to the Lucknow Pact for the other provinces?—Yes, because there the Mohamedans are in a very small minority. Where they form 10 per cent. or 15 per cent. of the population it is immaterial to our Hindu brethren if they have 15 per cent. instead of 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. instead of 15 per cent., but it would strengthen the minority to a certain extent.

* * * * * * * * * * *

187. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You recognise, I take it, that so far as you are concerned your object is to safeguard the interests of your community, the Mohamedans?—My object is to bring into existence in India a truly representative government.

188. That is your object?—That is my object.

189. All else is subservient to that main object?—There are other things, but this is the main object.

190. If this main object is served, everything else is subservient to this main object?—I would not call it subservient, but additional. There may be other things which are of almost equal importance.

191. Tell me what else is of equal importance to the fact that you want to establish in this country a thoroughly representative institution. What else is of equal importance?—The prevention of the coming into existence of an oligarchy.

192. But then it would not be representative government?—That may be, but I consider that as of equal importance.

193. Also you wish, Nationalist as you are, to see India is nationalised as soon as possible?—Yes.

194. You are anxious about it?—I am.

195. Consequently you would be prepared to use such means as may bring about a speedy consolidation of the people of India?—Such means as would bring that about. Certainly.

196. If, therefore, during the transitional period we devise some means of safeguarding the interests of your community sufficiently, and, while seeing that the fundamental principle of representative institutions is not violated, bring about a progressive realisation of the nationalisation of the country, you would be in favour of it?—Yes, as a hypothetical proposition.

197. Have you considered all the various alternatives that may occur to one for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of minority communities, including your own?—It is possible some may have occurred to me, but I am not in a position to know what considerations may have occurred to other people.

198. May I give you one?—Yes.

199. You are naturally anxious that your representative should not be, as you have called it, a "dummy" of the Hindus?—Of the non-Mohamedans. Do not use the word Hindus : I do not like it.

200. Very well. Suppose your community elected three candidates for one seat, and then there was a joint electorate and one man was elected out of those three, would not that fear be eliminated?—Do you mean there should first of all be an election amongst the Mohamedans, and they should elect a panel of three, and then there should be another election?

201. A joint election; yes.—It would be much too cumbersome a machinery, and I do not know it would result in any real benefit at all.

202. Is that your suspicion or your considered opinion?—You have just put it to me and I have given you an opinion offhand. A considered opinion means having had time to consider it.

203. Before I put it to you this alternative had not presented itself to you for consideration; is that so?—Yes.

204. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: You have tried to show the Conference that the Sikhs form a sect of the Hindus, and that therefore the seats in the Council should be divided between the Mohamedans and the Hindus?—Yes.

205. You have also said that the principle of communal representation was introduced when the present reformed councils were started, and that before that it did not exist in the Punjab. Can you tell the Conference whether any member of the Sikh community, which you believe to be a sect of the Hindus, was ever elected to the Punjab Council before separate communal representation was allowed for the Sikhs? Can you say whether before that any Sikh was elected on the Punjab Council?—I am afraid I do not remember. If the lists were in front of me now I might be able to tell you.

206. Will you accept my statement that as far as I remember no Sikh was elected during that period?—I do not remember. I do recollect this, that Sardar Gajjan Singh, a Sikh, was my colleague on the Punjab Council, and there may have been others.

207. One Sikh was elected for the whole of the Punjab?—That may be, I forget now.

208. May I know your term of office as member of the Executive Council of the Governor-General?—From July, 1919, to 31st December, 1924.

209. Was that when the Government of India Act was under consideration?—No, the Government of India Act was passed in 1919. We received intimation of the Act having been passed in England shortly after—two or three months after—I joined the Government of India.

210. Do you know from Government records that the Punjab Government emphasised that they recommended a separate electorate for the Sikhs, who formed a separate community in the Punjab, and therefore deserved a separate electorate?—I have no recollection of that. That must have been before I joined the Government. All the despatches had been sent before I joined the Government of India.

211. Of course, there is no gainsaying that this principle has been adopted by the Government, and that it is being acted on. I do not wish to enter into an academic discussion as to whether Sikhs are Hindus or whether they are not, but two glaring facts I would like to get from your statement. You stated that Sunnis and Shias formed two different sects of Mohamedans, did you not?—Yes.

212. But that analogy does not apply to Sikhs and Hindus, because, as you know, the Sikhs have got their separate scriptures, while the Hindus have got their separate scriptures?—That is a matter of argument.

* * * * * * * * * * *

215. Dr. Suhrawardy: Is it not a fact that the Mussalmans of the Punjab were given an amount of representation less than their numerical strength under the Lucknow Pact?—Yes, that is so.

216. What was the amount of representation given to them under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms?—Was it the same amount of representation as was agreed upon?—They did not even get that which the Lucknow Pact conceded to them.

217. As a matter of fact, in the Punjab council, as the result of elections from the special electorate, are you in the enjoyment of even the amount of representation which the Mussalmans of the Punjab thought they would get under the Reforms?—No, we are not.

218. A question was put to you about the historic and political importance of Mussalmans?—Yes.

219. In the Punjab you have got not even the amount of representation on your population strength, leave alone your historic and political importance and your war services during the Great War. Is not that a fact?—Yes, that is the fact.

220. Have you any objection to the Sikhs being given a number of seats in excess of their numerical strength on the ground of their political and historic importance and their services during the Great War if the Mussalmans are given the same consideration in the matter of representation on the strength of their population and their historic and political importance?—I have no objection whatever to my Sikh brethren being given that concession, provided my 55 per cent. is in no way affected.

221. In other words, you are willing to give up that historic and political importance, and all those considerations, if you get only the amount of your population strength?—On a population basis, yes.

222. You have laid a good deal of stress on the adult franchise—that the League advocates adult franchise?—Yes.

223. Before I come to that, may I ask this: We have heard a lot about the Muslims being in the majority in the Punjab. Is it not the fact that Muslims form about 56 per cent. of the population in the Punjab, and that they are heavily in debt?—That is a fact.

224. In view of the fact that they are heavily shackled in the way of debt, is not your majority a mere illusory majority?—That is one of the unfortunate features of the situation, but we Mahomedans, being democrats and being sincere well-wishers of the country's constitutional advance, are willing to bear the consequences. We do not want to stand in the way of the country's advancement.

225. I do not want your reasons, and I am not in love with democracy or nationalism, because I am a humanitarian. I simply wanted to know this. In view of these facts, of the heavy indebtedness of the Punjab Muslims to non-Muslim moneylenders, is not your majority a mere illusory majority, and for all practical purposes, for purposes of election, they are as helpless as a minority?—There is that disadvantage.

226. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: I should like to know whether you think that the present relations of bitterness and hatred between the communities is due to separate electorates being formed?—No, certainly not.

227. To what do you think it is due?—It is due, as I said, to Shuddhi and Sangathan on the one hand and Tanzim and Tabligh on the other.

228. You know that the Mahomedans here in this province form a very narrow majority. Can you tell me what are your fears with regard to this majority being reduced to a minority?—If joint electorates are introduced.

229. I want to know as you claim only five or six per cent. more than the other communities joined together, under what circumstances do you think this majority would be reduced to a minority?—If franchise is kept high the majority disappears.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: In the case of joint electorates what community will rule in the Punjab?

230. Chairman: It is rather an estimate, is it not?—I do not know how to answer that.

Chairman: I think, Sir Zulfiqar, that that is one of those questions which conveys all you wish to convey without it being answered.

231. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: During the recent riots have the Sikhs remained neutral, or have they taken sides?—They have sided with the Hindus in almost every riot. I know that Sikhs and Hindus have been on one side and Mahomedans on the other in the Lahore riots, in the Rawalpindi riots, in all the Punjab riots Hindus and Sikhs have been on one side and Mahomedans on the other.

232. What is your notion about the Central Government being kept strong enough for the purpose of controlling any irregularities of majorities or minorities in the province?—In the existing conditions?

233. In the future conditions.—During the transitional period certainly Government ought to be kept strong enough, but when full responsible government is conceded, and we have provincial autonomy, the residuary powers should be vested in the provinces and the Central Government should have only such powers as are expressly given to them in the Constitution for the purpose of management of common affairs.

234. You know that in all the provinces of India there are majorities and minorities. You admit that fact, do you not?—Yes.

235. Then what do you think is the safeguard against the minorities being oppressed?—In my opinion, when the time arrives when India is fit for full self-government, it connotes that by that time this communal friction and these differences will have disappeared, and, in consequence, all these considerations will disappear.

236. This idea, I dare say, is your happy dream, but what I want to know is this——?—Then do not put to me this question—when full Dominion status is granted.

237. In the meantime I should like to know what will be the position of the minorities?—Meanwhile, during the transitional period, a strong central government is necessary—during the transitional period. I have said so already.

238. Could you please tell me if there are any untouchables amongst the Mahomedans?—What Mahomedans are untouchables?

239. Can you reply to my question, Sir Muhammad Iqbal?—(Sir Muhammad Iqbal): There is a class of people amongst the Muslims who are known as Musallis, but they have free access to mosques and everybody accepts food from their hands. To the Mahomedans both they and their votes are touchable, unlike the Hindus, to whom their votes are touchable, but themselves untouchable.

240. Could you tell me whether you would have Kazis appointed in the provinces for regulating Mahomedan family laws?—This is not mentioned in the Memorandum of the League, but the opinion of the Mussalmans of the Punjab, as far as I know, is that they demand Kazis in order to decide cases relating to Mahomedan family law.

242. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Perhaps I may refresh your memory, because you were asked whether a Sikh was ever elected to the council before the days of communal representation. Do you remember if the late Sardar Partab Singh was elected a member of the Legislative Council?—Yes, and, after him, his brother, Sardar Daljib Singh, was elected from the Legislative Council to the Imperial Legislative Council.

* * * * * * * * * * *

245. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: In the pre-Reform council you elected a member to the Imperial Council, as it was then called?—Yes.

246. Could you tell us if the Mahomedans voted for the Sikh nominee who was elected?—The voting was by ballot, so we do not know.

247. Was there a pact between the Sikhs and the Mahomedans at that time in that council?—As both were interested in safeguarding agricultural interest they followed the same policy.

248. With regard to separate representation, you would give separate representation also to the Christians and the depressed classes in the Punjab?—I think they ought to have it, yes.

249. Chairman: I should like to use the opportunity of your being here to gather together three or four important pronouncements on the main subject you have been helping us about. They are, of course, very familiar, but it is convenient to have them together. First of all let us take the Montagu-Chelmsford Report itself. In paragraph 231, after some passages in which the authors said that separate electorates were opposed to the teaching of history and that they perpetuated class divisions and tended to stereotype existing relations, they dealt with the case of the Mahomedans, and they said this: "At the same time we must face the hard facts. The Mahomedans were given special representation with separate electorates in 1909." That, as we saw earlier in the afternoon, really means that in a number of provinces, though not in the Punjab, there was the addition to the Morley-Minto provincial councils of a limited number of members elected on a simple Mahomedan vote. Then they go on to say: "The Hindus' acquiescence is embodied in the present agreement between the political leaders of the two communities." That, no doubt, refers to the Lucknow Pact. "The Mahomedans regard these as settled facts, and any attempt to go back on them would rouse a storm of bitter protest and put a severe strain on the loyalty of a community which has behaved with conspicuous loyalty during a period of very great difficulty, and which we know to be feeling no small anxiety for its own welfare under a system of popular government. The Mahomedans regard separate representation and communal electorates as their only adequate safeguards." I want to ask you, Sir Muhammad, to tell me and the Conference (and specially the British Commissioners) in a sentence whether it is your view, with the experience that you have, and speaking in your representative character, that that remains true still, that the Mahomedans regard separate representation and communal electorates as their only adequate safeguards?—It does.

250. You think so?—Yes.

251. Then the authors of this Report go on to say: "Much as we regret the necessity, we are convinced that, so far as the Mahomedans at all events are concerned, the present system must be maintained until conditions alter, even at the price of slower progress towards the realisation of a common citizenship." I have asked you whether you could help me to some view or estimate of the probability of a change in the situation, and you have rather said you cannot speak of the future, though you hope for a change?—I hope.

252. Then comes this striking sentence: "But we can see no reason to set up communal representation for Mahomedans in any Province where they form a majority of the voters." You observe it does not say "where they form a majority of the population," but "where they form a majority of the voters." Then that being the view expressed in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report the next thing one likes to look at is the Southborough Committee's Report, again using you as a means of getting these things together. I have got here the Report of Lord Southborough's Committee, Volume I., Command Paper 141, 1919?—There were two Southborough Committees, one on electorates and one on subjects.

253. Quite. This is on electorates, and on page 7 of the Report comes the passage on communal representation. It contains a very important sentence. I think the Committee sat in the year 1919?—I was a member of the Subjects Committee.

254. I know, but what is important for the moment is this one.—They both sat simultaneously.

255. As a matter of fact, the Report was in 1919. Let us get the actual date. It is dated 22nd February, 1919?—Yes.

256. Sir Malcolm Hailey was a member?—Yes.

257. I see on page 7 what Lord Southborough's Committee says is this. They refer to the passage in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report which I have just summarised. "The Joint Report," they say, "recognised the necessity for the communal representation of Mahomedans in Provinces where they do not form a majority of the electors." Then they say this: "The evidence received by us and the opinions of local Governments concerned were almost unanimously in favour of this course. In all Provinces except Bengal and the Punjab Mahomedans are in a minority as regards both population and electorates. In Bengal and the Punjab, where Mahomedans form a majority of the population, our rough estimates show that they form a minority of electors," which they were anticipating in trying to make the calculation. Then this strikes me very much: "There was very general agreement in favour of communal representation for Mahomedans in those Provinces as well as in the rest of India, and the local Governments urged the same step." Then the authors of the Report say: "Both Hindus and Mahomedans are thus in substantial agreement that the latter should everywhere enjoy communal electorates."—Exactly. That is my position.

258. This was a document drawn up immediately after this Committee had been in the Punjab, and "Both Hindus and Mahomedans," they say, "are thus in substantial agreement that the latter should everywhere" (that is, in the Punjab, too) "enjoy communal electorates and," they go on, "we have no hesitation in recommending that effect should be given to this common desire."—Yes.

259. I am going to ask you a question about that; but it certainly would appear that the authors of this Report of Lord Southborough in 1919 were then under the clear impression, on the material before them, that not only Mahomedans but Hindus were in substantial agreement on the matter. That, I think, is the interesting point?—There is one thing I hope you will permit me to observe here. The late Mr. Gokhale, in a document which is known as his will and testament, recognised the right of the Mussalmans to special representation.

260. My friend Dr. Suhrawardy referred to it this morning?—Yes.

Dr. Suhrawardy: Yes, that was in 1919.

261. Chairman: Let us go a little further. The next thing which I think the Conference might well consider is this, that if we take the official book, page 14, we see that, whereas by way of population the Mahomedans are 55 per cent. of the Punjab, taking the present general electorates and the present franchise rules the Mahomedans are not a majority of the electorate?—They are not.

262. But, on the contrary, are 43.77 per cent?—That is so.

263. Does not that seem to show that Lord Southborough's Committee was at any rate right in this. They were right when they said that their estimate went to show that, though the Mahomedans were a majority in population, they would turn out to be a minority in the electorate?—That is quite right.

264. Then it seems to me at present to follow that, if that is so, it was not a departure from the Montagu-Chelmsford Report to provide for communal representation in the Punjab for the Mahomedans, but it was an application of the Report?—Exactly.

265. That seems to me to be the direct position in historical fact; I say nothing about whether it is right or wrong?—Exactly.

Major Attlee: Does that show that it is possible that, though they might be in a minority of voters in the whole Province, yet, owing to the formation of a constituency, they might be able to return a majority to the Punjab Legislative Council?

266. Chairman: I cannot find that either in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report or in the Southborough Report that aspect of the matter was brought out, but, as we had occasion to observe this morning, there is no doubt at all that the distribution of the Mahomedan population, and, indeed, of the Mahomedan electorate, in this Province is not uniform over the whole area, but, on the contrary, you get a very considerable preponderance, not merely of population, but of voters in what we may call the western parts?—Yes.

267. And, on the other hand, in some urban districts you get a very different situation; and that, of course, has to be borne in mind?—Yes.

Raja Narendra Nath: I have considered this point which Major Attlee is raising in my Memorandum.

Chairman: I recognise that you have; indeed, I have it in mind. It is a very interesting analysis. But it is a fact, as far as it goes. Of course, we are not deciding anything; we are trying to get the facts right.

268. One other thing. I have had worked out for me some figures which I think may be useful to the Conference and perhaps also to you. The Lucknow Pact—if you can call that sort of arrangement a pact; lawyers might argue whether or not it has any contractual force—or the Lucknow scheme arranged for the Punjab, provided that Mahomedans in the Punjab should have one-half of the elected Indian members?—That is right. As a matter of fact, we have not got that.

269. I just want to see. Let us look at the figures as they in fact are to-day. If you take the general elected seats, by which I mean if you exclude the landowners' constituencies, exclude the university, industry, commerce—if you simply take the general electorate there are 64, and of those 64, 32 are Mahomedan. That is exactly 50 per cent.?—Yes.

270. The next thing is this. There are four landowner seats, and it is fair, I think, to say that of those four, two may be safely supposed to be Mahomedan, one by express definition and the other in practice, because it is Baluch Tumandars, and two others, one Hindu and one Sikh. So you now get the total of 64 turned to 68, but you get the 32 turned into 34, and it is still half?—That is right.

271. And the only sense in which it can be said to-day that the Mahomedan elected members are not half of the total elected members is this. There is a member elected for the university, where (except in one case when, owing to your astuteness, there was no contest) a Hindu in fact has always got in. There has been one occasion where there was not a contest; I do not care who the other candidate was, but it is one of my distinguished friend's forensic triumphs that he took the objection at the right moment, and therefore there was no contest. That is the one exception. The Industry Member in practice has turned out to be a Hindu; the Commerce Member—that is what Sir Hari Singh Gour was referring to—has been a Christian. That means that you are adding three members without adding anyone to the Mahomedan list, and that is really the state of the poll, is it not?—Yes.

272. There is one other thing which rather puzzles me. I know you do not mind my speaking quite frankly. I am a little puzzled by the statement that no serious challenge to this communal representation arose, as you think, till December, 1924. I will tell you why I am puzzled. I quite see the strength of the point that it was not prominent at the time of the Southborough Committee, because I have just read the passage; but, you see, the Muddiman Committee was appointed and made a report, and, as we all know, you were on the Muddiman Committee, and you yourself signed the majority report, and I see, when I look at paragraph 69 of the Muddiman Committee's Report, a very important passage on communal representation, beginning: "A question of much greater importance is undoubtedly that of communal representation." I miss a few words out. "We have received conflicting evidence on this question from the witnesses before us, which we consider it is unnecessary for us to summarise in full. On the one hand it is urged that the election of members on a communal basis is a very serious obstacle in the way of constitutional advance"—and so on. Then lower down on the page, in the same paragraph, "it must be admitted that, in principle, these provisions are open to constitutional objection, and most of us look upon them as an obstacle to political advance." You observe it says "most of us"?—I remember that.

273. "But we consider that the abolition of any communal electorates (and in this we include reserved seats) is quite impracticable at the present time." Now, it is obvious, is it not, that the Muddiman Committee evidently had this matter before them as a matter of contest and dispute?—Well, the reply to that, if I may respectfully say so, takes us back really only to three months earlier than December, 1924. We sat in Committee to take the evidence, as far as I remember, in August and September. Until then no resolution had been passed by any representative non-Muslim organisation taking any exception to this. No doubt among the witnesses who appeared before the Muddiman Committee, some had taken exception to this. But they were individual opinions expressed by those witnesses. On the other hand, I have pointed out that a Hindu representative of the position of Mr. Chintamani, who is the editor of Leader, has approved of it. So, it is really a matter of more or less three months. But if you feel inclined to think that exception was taken three months earlier

274. Chairman: I am only trying to get at the fact merely because it is very important to see when this strong criticism emerged. You see the report of the Muddiman Committee was signed in December, 1924, and you yourself were one of the signatories to it. So I think it must have been rather before?—May-be three or four months before, say, in the summer of 1924. My point is simply this, that the objection against communal representation is a matter of comparatively recent origin and came to the surface after the foundation of the All-India Hindu Mahasabha in 1922.

275. Chairman: I wish to be entirely fair. We must remember that it may be urged, and urged with some force, that at the time when the objections began to be strongly taken, actual experience had been gained as to how the system worked, but when Lord Southborough was sitting or when the Montagu-Chelmsford Report was being drawn up, the full effects of working of the system were largely matters of surmise. That is an argument that will have to be met.

Witness: With all due deference, I might say that communal electorates had been in actual practice for a period of 12 years in many provinces in India when the Southborough Committee wrote their report.

Chairman: I do not attach so much importance to that now. I understand what you are referring to is that the Minto-Morley system, though on the whole it was not based on communal representation, made a small addition of Mahomedans by separate electorates in the case of certain provinces. So, for my own part, I do not attach so much importance to that as I should have done earlier in the afternoon before I heard you.

Dr. Narang: I have one explanation to make, sir. Why the idea of communal electorates came to the fore about 1924 or just about that time was this that if you would look at this official document "Communal Disorders," the first riot reported here is on 11th April, 1923. Then the story goes on as to the causes that led to the riot, how people joined hands and so on; and it is very likely that they thought that this was one of the reasons which went to swell it.

Chairman: I think it is very important to be clear, and we could not have a more authoritative evidence to help us about the history of this question than Mian Sahib's.

276. Lord Burnham: Sir Muhammad, may I put you one question on a different matter, but one of great importance, in which I should like to have your considered opinion. Do you think, from the Mahomedan point of view, that so far in the political arrangements of this Province dyarchy has worked smoothly and to the public advantage?—I think, taking the whole history of the working of dyarchy in all the Provinces of India, this is the one Province in which it has been more successful than in any other Province in India.

277. In Bombay also we had evidence to the same effect; but, of course, you are not speaking for Bombay Presidency, but only in regard to this Province?—Lord Burnham, you know that dyarchy was introduced in India on 1st January, 1921. Until 31st December, 1924, I was a member of the Government of India; so that for those years I had intimate and direct opportunities of studying the situation so far as the working of the Reforms scheme in all the Provinces was concerned. After that, on reversion to private life, as I take keen interest in public affairs, I have watched carefully the working of this system almost everywhere in India, and I can only express my own personal opinion, and that is that in my opinion dyarchy has been worked more successfully in the Punjab than in any other Province in India. Next to the Punjab, come Bombay and Madras, where this has been worked successfully.

* * * * * * * * * * *

278. Lord Strathcona: In your document from the All-India Muslim League, Mian Sahib, you say, in paragraph 13, sub-section (a): "The League is, on the whole, of opinion that this experiment should now be scrapped and a unitary form of Government should be inaugurated in the Provinces." Does the expression "on the whole" indicate that some of your members consider that the time for the scrapping of dyarchy has not yet arisen, and, if so, is that body of opinion what you call an influential one?—No, I do not think it is. You see, Lord Strathcona, we were weighing the pros and cons; something is to be said for and something is to be said against.

279. Chairman: I think, Sir Muhammad, you wanted to say something at the end.

Witness: Yes, Sir. While expressing my gratitude to the Commission for the very patient hearing they have given us this afternoon, I wish to say, on behalf of the deputation, that we have heard with the deepest regret and pain that a certain deputation this morning stated that, if separate electorates are not abolished, they would rather not have any reforms in the Punjab. (Sir Muhammad Iqbal: In the whole of India.) Did they say in the Punjab or in the whole of India?

280. Chairman: The opinion expressed this morning by the spokesman of the deputation was that, unless certain conditions were fulfilled, the view of his party was that they would prefer no constitution advance.

Witness: Without any reference to the Punjab or India? Well then, we have received, if I may venture to say so with all deference to my learned friend, the statement which sounds to me like the statements sometimes made by children——

281. Chairman: Please do not criticise; if you want, you can express dissent.

Witness: What I wish to say is this: If we were not sincere well-wishers of constitutional advance in our country, we might have countered that statement by saying that if communal electorates are abolished we would rather that even Montford Reforms were taken away. But, being sincere well-wishers of the country, we want constitutional advance, and at the same time we insist upon the retention of separate electorates because we believe that that is the only way of bringing into existence in this country really representative government and to avoid the creation of an oligarchy.

282. Chairman: Mr. Muhammad Ali, I take it, is the spokesman of the deputation which represents the Ahmadiyya community. We have all got your memorandum, but would you like to say anything either in support of, or to draw a distinction from, what has been said by the rest of the deputation?—Maulvi Muhammad Ali: I agree in principle to what has been said, but I want to add this, that in the future constitution, religious freedom and the freedom of profession of faith as well as adoption should be included as an integral part of the scheme.

283. Chairman: You would like some provision made in the statutory constitutional structure to that effect?—Yes.

284. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: What do you mean by "religious adoption"?—Everybody should be free to declare to which ever religion he belongs.

285. Chairman: Does the other gentleman, Mr. Bashir Ahmad, wish to add anything?—(Mr. Bashir Ahmad): I would just like to say, Sir, that we are in favour of Dominion Status if the rights of the Mahomedans are protected.

Memorandum on Sikh Representation submitted by the CHIEF KHALSA DIWAN, Amritsar.

This memorandum is submitted, on behalf of the Sikh community, in accordance with the invitation, issued by the Royal Indian Statutory Commission in their notification No. F-143/28, dated 8th March, 1928. It is not intended to be a complete review of the system of Government which at present prevails in this country, nor does it purport to deal with all the questions which fall within the scope of the enquiry on which the Commission are now engaged. It is proposed to set out in this memorandum the views of the Sikh community on such matters as particularly concern them or which are closely connected with such matters.

2. Before, however, dealing with these matters, it seems necessary to make a retrospective review of the treatment accorded to the Sikh community in the past. Without this, it is feared, the grievances of the community will not be fully appreciated, and the case of the community is likely to be seriously prejudiced. It is needless to say that the Sikhs are a virile, young community who have, in the past, cared more for shouldering the burdens and responsibilities of the Empire than for political agitation for reforms. They have been profusely spilling their blood in defence of their country against foreign aggression and internal turmoil, and fighting for the Empire in all quarters of the globe. It is not necessary to amplify upon this subject. The Sikhs have received a rude shock by having had to realise that, when time came for the extension of reforms in the administration of the country, those who talked loudest and manœuvred agitation could alone be listened to only if they could put up an appearance of a "United demand." It seems to be exactly in this latter spirit that the Lucknow Compact of the Congress and Muslim League was approached by the authors of the Montford Scheme of Reforms in the winter of 1917-18. It is not proposed to deal exhaustively here with all the efforts which the Sikh community put up to have their case considered on its merits, but it is necessary to state that in all stages of the enquiries, whether in India or finally in England, they were often met with the reply that the Congress League Compact of Lucknow stood in the way of the just recognition of their claims, in spite of the fact that the Sikhs were neither parties to it nor were they even consulted by those who were responsible for drawing it up. Copies of the memoranda, which were then submitted on behalf of the Sikh community, attached hereunto (annexures A, B, C and D),* would sufficiently explain the position which then existed. It is now a matter of some relief that both Hindus and Mahomedans, who were then responsible for such an inequitable division of power among themselves, purely on the basis of negotiation, as remarked in the Montford Report, have found the Compact faulty, and have now repudiated it, though from their different standpoints and for reasons of their own. Certain further schemes are now being drawn up, again by negotiation. In these schemes also Sikh interests are being ignored. It is therefore necessary to strike a note of warning at the outset against any such plausible schemes of division of power being now accepted unless these make due provision for all interests and parties.

3. Sikhs are a young community, with a strong dynamic force running through their nerves, which fortifies them to suffer and die for a just cause, but they are also of a most democratic frame. Of the three main communities inhabiting the Punjab they are the most literate and were its rulers before the advent of the British. They occupy the highest economic status in the Punjab, to whose revenues they contribute the most. They have the highest stake in the country, and cannot entertain the idea of having to live at the mercy of the two sister communities in the province. Their political and economic importance cannot be exaggerated. It is therefore necessary not only in the interests of the success of the scheme which the Parliament may eventually evolve for the governance of this country, but also for the harmonious development and advance of this country towards responsible government, that all these aspects are scrupulously kept in view when the scheme is prepared and matured.

4. When saying all this, the Sikhs do not wish to make any proposals in a spirit of narrowmindedness. They are fully aware of the essentials of a healthy national growth in the country. While anxious to maintain their individuality as a separate community, they are always ready to co-operate with their sister communities for the development of a united nation. They would therefore be the first to welcome a declaration that no considerations of caste or religion shall affect the matter of organisation of a national government in the country. They are prepared to stand on merit alone, provided they, in common with others, are permitted to grow, unhampered by any impediments, in the way of reservations for any other community. Some other communities, however, still seem to persist in one form or other for the recognition of religious factions in the constitution of the country, and, if their claims are recognised and creed forms an integral part of the basis of representation in the administration of the country, the Sikhs apprehend danger to their very existence, unless adequate safeguards are provided for them. The tyranny of majority is an expression not wholly unknown in the political history of the world, and when such majority is based on religion, the extent to which such tyranny might go is unlimited. A simple case may perhaps be quoted how that has taken place in the Punjab Legislative Council under the existing constitution.

5. The Mahomedan community forms majority of the population of this province, and Hindus and Sikhs are minorities, being only about 32 and 11 per cent. of the population. Although as a majority community, Mahomedans were not under the necessity of any safeguards for their protection, yet they succeeded, by clever manœuvring and in the absence of Sikhs, to secure for themselves separate electorates in the Punjab, with half the elected seats, amongst the Indian population, to be reserved for them, in the Lucknow Compact, which surprised even the authors of the Montford Report (page 105). In spite of strong protests against this proposal, more particularly on behalf of the Sikhs, whose existence was absolutely ignored in this Pact, and warnings addressed to the authorities against the creation of a standing religious majority, against not only each of the other two communities in the province, but even against a combination of both, this proportion was secured to the Mahomedans in the province under the constitution framed. The result has been most disastrous, not only to the natural growth of national feeling in the province, but in many other ways. Secure against any defeat by the other communities, or even against their combined strength, the Mahomedan minister, backed by his co-religionists in the Council and often by Government, which had to depend upon this Mahomedan majority for its own maintenance, trampled the cherished rights of the other communities under his feet. Even Government was defied at times by this majority, and was insolently told that its very existence could be made impossible by the Mahomedans, upon whose vote it had to rely so much for its continuance.

6. The passing of the Sikh Gurdwaras and Shrines Act of 1922 is a case in point. It is not intended to give a history of the struggle that the Sikhs had to make to rescue their holy places from the clutches of immoral and extravagant Mahants and priests. Despairing of all legal efforts that they had made for over half a century under the existing laws, the Sikhs organised themselves to assert the force of public opinion, and, opposed by the selfish priests and Mahants, they had even to suffer massacres, which opened the eyes of Government to the necessity for special legislation. The Mahomedan Minister of the Punjab Government happened to be in charge of the portfolio, and he whittled down all reasonable proposals for a healthy provision being made whenever such an attempt appeared to be nearing success. He brought out a Bill of his own to deal with the situation, which was, to say the least about it, a useless piece of legislation. It was unanimously opposed by the Sikhs whom it concerned. It was also opposed by the overwhelming majority of the Hindus. And yet the Mahomedan Minister was able to pass it in the Council, backed by his standing Mahomedan majority and the official block, and it was placed on the Statute Book as Act VI. of 1922. It is, however, interesting to add that the Act remained an absolutely dead letter till it was repealed, about three years later, by Act VIII. of 1925, though after considerable further sacrifices and sufferings which the Sikhs had to make and undergo. Another point worthy of note in this connection is the manner in which the Mahomedan Minister set up a curious formula by which different communities were given representation on Municipal Boards, and his formation of new constituencies for District Boards, by which the interests of his own community were furthered and those of the Sikhs were prejudiced.

7. So far as the Punjab Legislative Council is concerned, instances like this, though, perhaps, not so glaring, can be multiplied to prove the mischief of allowing a standing religious majority to trample upon the feelings and interests of the two minority communities. The argument is often advanced that a majority of population cannot be permitted to be reduced to a minority in the legislature, in any provinces and that as the Hindus, where they form a majority of the population in other provinces, are allowed to retain that majority in them, why should not the Mahomedans have the same majority here? The analogy, however, is not correct. In other provinces there are two important communiteis, Hindus and Mahomedans, to be considered; while in the Punjab we have three distinct communities. Hindus, Mahomedans and Sikhs, whose respective interests have to be safeguarded. The Mahomedans in the Punjab may be allowed a majority against each community, but in the interests of fair play they cannot claim a majority against any combination. Needless to add that it is against the fundamental principle of democracy to provide safeguards by a statute in favour of a majority community. It may also be pointed out that Hindus, in other provinces, such as Madras and Bombay Presidencies, where they form majority of the population, are themselves divided into two well-defined sections, Brahmins and non-Brahmins, differences between whom are as keen as between any other two entirely different religious communities. The tyranny of one majority community over another is thus minimised there. But such is not the case in the Punjab. The mischief of allowing a majority to a community over any combination of minority communities is too obvious to require further comment.

8. It has already been mentioned that the Sikhs, in spite of being the smallest of the three communities in the Punjab, are prepared to forego all communal representation if this can be knocked out of the constitution of the country. Mahomedans, depending upon their majority, should welcome such a proposal, but if they do not, it is but reasonable that the division of seats should be made in the province on other than numerical considerations, and the existing proportion of Sikh seats in the province should be considerably increased. It is subject to these reservations that the Sikhs beg to offer the following criticism regarding the present constitution and make their proposals about its future development. In making these proposals, it will be necessary to briefly refer to past experience, based so far as this Memorandum is concerned, on the working of the system in the Punjab.

9. It seems that in the Punjab it is somewhat difficult to say that dyarchy has either succeeded or failed. While heads of Government have generally been pleased, it is said, to hold joint meetings of both wings of Government, and while the responsibilities to administer the departments were distinct, the ministers have all along been controlled by the Finance Department, which was a reserved subject. The ministers, thus, could not act independently when they were hampered in their actions, not only by the moral influence exercised by the Head of Government, inspired often by the Secretariat, but also by the standing constitutional check of the Finance Member, who has also been a member of the Indian Civil Service, to which service and its cognate services the Secretaries have always belonged. It is also an open secret in the province that the ministers have not always had complete and loyal support from the heads of departments under them. Bureaucracy still holds the powers it had, and the Governor, as their head, is still as autocratic, if not more, as he used to be. Ministers have been unable, in spite of their earnestness, to carry out their schemes of development, partly for want of funds and partly on account of the unsympathetic attitude of the bureaucracy. In addition to these facts, another impediment in the efficient and impartial discharge of responsibility by the ministers in this province has been the communal bias. The constitution had, itself, recognised the principle of communal representation, and it appears that some ministers, at any rate, have considered that they could feel secure in their seats only if they could hold their own community at their back, and for this purpose they have had to take measures and initiate policies which were designed to placate their community alone. Such measures and policies have naturally evoked considerable resentment and consequent ill-will, which have very often prevented the full fruition of those measures. It is thus clear that the existing system has been inherently defective, and if the partially responsible Government, as the present administration under the Reform Scheme is called, has not hitherto led to the greatest happiness of the people, the fault lies mainly in the system itself, and not so much in the men who were selected to work it out. The ministers were not always selected on account of their capacity or popularity, but many other considerations seem to have prevailed in their appointment. Under these adverse circumstances, the surprise is not that the system has failed, but that it has worked at all and has achieved an amount of success. The experiment has, anyhow, proved that Indians have got the capacity to govern themselves, and would be able to work their country's salvation, if the impediments in their way were removed.

10. As regard the growth of parties, the existence of watertight communal compartments, both in the electorates and in the Council and Assembly has naturally prevented their formation and development in the proper sense, and the same cause has adversely influenced and, in fact, retarded the growth of public opinion in the province. Every one has had to consider the system in terms of communal gains and losses, and no one has had his vision taken beyond such limits. Subject to this, it is impossible to say that, in spite of the low level of education and the illiteracy of the masses, the electorates have not taken intelligent interest in the working of the constitution. They have formed reasonable opinions upon public matters of interest and have insisted upon their representatives to press their views in the councils. Education has advanced and people have begun to realise that the power of vote is not to be entirely thrown away. No doubt such votes have often gone on sectional considerations, but this is the fault of the constitution and not of the electors. The latter have not had occasion to think otherwise. The Sikhs, therefore, while they welcome an extension of the system of responsible Government, feel that any extension that may be decided upon should be accompanied by the removal of circumscribing adverse conditions, and if these latter cannot be removed, they feel that no radical extension of the present system will be useful to the country. It would merely extend the area of mischief.

11. The first Reform that is needed in the body politic, therefore, is to remove the drawbacks of the present system by

(a) Removing communal representation altogether.

(b) Defining the Governor as a purely constitutional head, without any direct hand in the administration, except power of veto.

(c) Allowing the legislature full control over the finances; and

(d) Subordinating the executive and bureaucracy to the will of the legislature.

12. A scheme of communal reservation of seats with joint electorates has recently been put forward in the country and has been freely discussed to take the place of the present separate communal electorates. Although this is an improvement upon the present system, of which the evil effects will be removed, to some extent, it will afford no remedy for the ailments of the body politic, which have been described above. Should, however, this be decided upon, or the present system were allowed to continue, the Sikhs would earnestly pray for relief from the tyranny of the majority, by the amendment of the present constitution, so as to increase the proportion of Sikh seats in the Council, as well as in the Assembly and the Council of State and a similar representation in the administration of the country.

13. The case of the Sikh community has been stated fully in the communications and memoranda, which were presented to Government when the Montford Scheme was on the anvil both in India and in England, copies of which are hereunto attached.* The Sikh community desires that the Commission may be pleased to refer to the Records on this subject in the offices of the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India in Council, for, as mentioned in the Report of the Sikh Deputation that had been sent to England in 1920 (copy attached hereunto as annexure E),* the Sikhs believe that the justice of the claim of the Sikh community was acknowledged in England, but effect was not given to it mainly because of the iniquitous division of power as proposed in the Congress League Compact of Lucknow, to which Sikhs were no party. But for this injustice done to the claims of the Sikhs, the history of the relations between the Sikh community and Government might, perhaps have been different in many respects than it has been during the last eight years.

14. The Sikhs claim that the proportion of seats in the Punjab Legislature, as between the three main communities — Mahomedans, Hindus and Sikhs — should be 40, 30 and 30 per cent. respectively, and the same should be the proportion of their representation from the Punjab in the Central Legislature. This will give a clear majority to the majority community against each of the other communities, but not a standing tyrannous majority against a combination of the others. That the Mahomedans can apprehend no such combination against them in the Punjab will be evident from the fact that the Sikhs have hitherto thrown in their lot more often with Mohamedans than with Hindus, especially as their interests, as a rural and agricultural community, have coincided with those of the Mahomedans.

15. In Sind, Delhi, and in the North-West Frontier Province we have a fairly large Sikh population and of persons believing in the Sikh Gurus. We would request that the claims of Sikhs in Sind be specially recognised. Demand has, however, been made in certain quarters for the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency. We are not in favour of such a proposal. But if such a step is to be taken then Sikh claims for adequate representation in the newly formed Province should be fully recognised. In Delhi and the North-West Frontier Province similar representation should be conceded to the Sikhs in the new constitution that may be formulated for these Provinces.

16. Subject to the above reservations, under which no one single community can oppress members of another, the Sikhs would recommend a system of Federal Government being established in the country, under which each Province will have full independence in all internal affairs, but will be subject to the control of the Central Government in matters pertaining to the defence of the country and constitution against both foreign aggression and internal commotion, other than ordinary breaches of the peace. The foreign relations and the questions relating to tariff, external trade, and other cognate subjects, such as communications, post, telegraph, etc., must remain within the entire control of the Central Government.

17. No member of the permanent services of the country should ever be appointed as Governor, and Ministers should always be chosen so as to represent the various elements constituting the Legislature, and should exercise joint responsibility in all matters, subject to the vote of the Legislature. The heads of departments and secretaries to Government should under no circumstances be allowed to go to the Governor direct.

18. There should be a complete separation of the executive and judicial functions in the administration of the country. The judiciary should be entirely under the control of the High Courts.

19. Franchise should continue on the same basis as it is at present. Provision, however, should be made in the constitution itself for gradual extension of franchise with the spread of education and crystalisation of informed public opinion.

20. Under no circumstances should system of communal representation, whether through communal or joint electorates, be allowed to exist in local bodies, but minorities should have adequate representation on these bodies.

21. Governors in the Provinces and the Governor-General in the Central Government should have exactly the same position and powers as they possess in self-governing Domnions, like Canada, Australia and South Africa.

22. Crown, through the Governor-General and a Commander-in-Chief, as the case may be, must continue to control the Army, Navy and Air Force, as well as relations with foreign and Indian States, but all other subjects, both in the Provincial and Central Government, should be subject to the vote of the Legislature.

23. All constitutions, both Central and Provincial, should be bicameral, i.e., there should be a Chamber of Senators where the Acts of the representative body should be subject to revision, and the constitution of such revisional chamber should be based on higher electoral qualifications, with the addition of a limited number of members appointed by nomination to represent classes and interests which might otherwise remain unrepresented.

24. Services should all be recruited through a Public Service Commission, set up in each Province, and one at the Central Government, and endeavour should be made to increase the representation of Indians to 75 per cent. of the total vacancies. The Public Service Commission shall, in each Province, see that all classes of the population are fairly represented in the services, but the criterion of appointment in all cases shall be merit and efficiency for the work expected to be done.

LAHORE.

Dated 6th November, 1928.

MORNING.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT COLONEL LANE-FOX), OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND), AND OF THE PUNJAB PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the CHIEF KHALSA DIWAN, Amritsar.

The Deputation consisted of:—

1. Sardar Bahadur Sir Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia, Kt., C.I.E., Amritsar.
2. Sardar Mohan Singh Ji, Rais and Landlord, Rawalpindi.
3. Sardar Teja Singh Ji, B.A., LL.B., Advocate, Rawalpindi.
4. Sardar Sant Singh Ji, B.A., LL.B., Advocate, Lyallpore.
5. Sardar Man Singh Ji, B.A., LL.B., Advocate, Lahore.
6. Lieut. Sardar Raghbir Singh, O.B.E., Sandhawalia, Raasassi.
7. Sardar Mangal Singh Man, Rais Kot Shera, Vice President.
8. Sardar Jodh Singh, M.A.
9. Capt. Lakka Singh.

* * * * * * * * * * *

189. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Time is very short, and I hope you will give your replies as briefly as possible. It was said yesterday that the Sikhs were not a distinct community, but were part and parcel of the Hindus. Do you agree with this view?—(Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): Sikhs have been a distinct community. From the times of the Gurus they have been a distinct community, and I cannot accept the statement from a rival community that we are not a distinct community; I cannot accept it at all. Facts are facts, and we have to recognise facts as such. We, as Sikhs, are interested in safeguarding the rights of the Sikh community, and it could not be expected that in doing so we should allow ourselves to be merged into A, B or C. I will not name them, but simply say A, B or C. With the communal outlook as we have got it here it is very difficult for our community to safeguard its interests. Religiously and socially we are a distinct community, and as such our interests are not identical with those of any other community at all.

190. Can you give me an instance (part from what you have already said) in the pre-Reform or post-Reform Councils where the Sikhs have sided with the Muslims as opposed to the Hindus?—If instances are required I can give you a number.

191. Yes, briefly?—Take the debates, for example, in 1922. On the resolution regarding the amalgamation of the North-West Frontier Province with the Punjab and the grant of Reforms in the North-West Frontier Province (Debates, Volume IV., page 195) they sided with the Mahomedans. On the resolution regarding holding summer sessions in Simla (Volume II., pages 355 and 356) they sided with the Mahomedans.

Chairman: That last illustration does not sound an important one!

Witness (Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): Then in another question, about the emoluments of the zaildars and lambardars they sided with the Mahomedans. Another important question which was dealt with in my department was the resolution regarding schedules of occupiers' rates on the canals in the Punjab. There also they sided with the Mahomedans. These instances could be multiplied if you like, Sir.

192. Sardar Ujjal Singh: In the pre-Reform council?—In the pre-Reform councils. Perhaps I may not be disclosing anything which is not right, but I, as one of the representatives of the Punjab, was returned with the help of the Mahomedan members, and the idea used to be that once a Sikh should go and another time a Mahomedan should go. In fact, there was a great complaint on behalf of our Hindu friends that this was not right at all, as they had not a chance of being returned.

* * * * * * * * * * *

193. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Can you tell me whether a party system on political lines can be evolved with the system of communal electorates?—I am afraid not. Under the present separate communal electorates no such party system can be evolved unless there is a change in the outlook.

194. You think the parties in the council are based on communal lines?—They have been in the past.

195. Supposing separate communal electorates are maintained, do you want them to be confined to the legislatures or would you extend them to local bodies?—I would certainly not extend them to the council, but I shall have objection to their extension to the local bodies. You mean making an experiment there as well?

196. You mean that you would confine them to the legislatures?—No, not at all. What I meant was that I would not extend separate electorates to local bodies.

197. Would you then make an experiment of the system of proportional representation in local bodies in place of separate electorates?—Perhaps that will be the best method. That experiment might be tried in the local bodies first, and if it proves successful there it might be extended later on.

198. Under a system of communal electorates would you have a chief Minister in the Council forming his own Ministry?—Well, as I have said before, if communalism were to remain you cannot possibly expect that a chief Minister would carry the confidence of all the members of the Legislative Council. At any rate, he will have to be supported by his own members, and there may be members representing the other communities in the Cabinet, so to speak, and they would be supported by their own members. If communal feelings have to remain, naturally this would not work.

199. The demand has been made that separate electorates should be maintained, and that seats should be reserved for all communities on the population basis, even for a majority community. May I know your views on this point?—Well, it would lead to this, that the majority community would practically have the whole show. It gives the majority community the statutory right to govern the country independently of the wishes of the people as a whole. This could not possibly be done, I am afraid. Then the next point is, would the Sikhs like this? The Sikhs were the rulers of the Punjab and they fought with the British for their country. They did not give up the Punjab without a struggle. Do you expect that we shall like ourselves to be subordinated to another community to rule over us?

200. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Would you like to rule?—Like to rule? All the communities should join together and rule. Unless they do join together they cannot rule.

201. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Would the rule of one community be communal raj or swaraj?—The answer is evident. I need not reply. That will be a peculiar sort of swaraj.

202. You have been in the Council for three years, I believe, Sardar Jodh Singh? Do you think the Sikh minority has been able to protect their interests? (Sardar Jodh Singh): I am afraid it has not been able to do so. I can give you some glaring instances. The dearest rights of the Indian people are the religious rights. In 1923 a Minister with the block of votes of his own community forced the Gurdwara Bill on the Sikhs in the teeth of their united opposition. The Bill was so much disliked by the community that it could not be brought into force even after its passage. Then another thing was done to reduce the importance of the Sikhs in the local bodies. You know perhaps that, compared to their numbers, their voting strength is very large; to reduce that voting strength a formula was invented, that on the local bodies the representation should be according to the mean of the voters and of the population. Separate electorates were not introduced, but orders were issued on behalf of the Ministry of Education to the effect that the constituency should be cooked in such a way as to produce that result, and the Sikhs suffered in consequence. These are the two glaring instances. If you want minor instances I can quote more.

203. You will be prepared to make a sacrifice if communal representation in any form is not given? But if it is to be kept alive in any shape or form you would have your representation weighted in excess of your number. What are your grounds for this weighting?—(Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): First of all we do not want communal representation to be removed simply for the sake of show and to show a sort of unity which is really not there. But if it is possible to remove it throughout the country as a whole—I do not want to be understood by the use of the word "country" simply the Punjab, but I mean the country as a whole, India as a whole—then Sikhs would be prepared to sacrifice themselves for the sake of nationalism. But if this communal representation is concealed or exists in any peculiar way all round, and it is only shown to have been removed in the Punjab, very cleverly removed in the Punjab, I am afraid I cannot accept that. Nobody expects that would be kept out of the Punjab.

204. Chairman: I would like to be entirely clear about this. I understand you to say on behalf of your deputation that if the principal of communal representation is entirely removed from the constitutional structure of British India, in all its parts, then the Sikh community, so far as you are able to speak for it, would be prepared to abandon the separate Sikh electorate in the Punjab?—They will be prepared to sacrifice for the sake of nationalism.

205. That is to say, they will abandon the separate electorate. But, on the other hand, I understand you to say that unless there is a complete removal of communal representation everywhere the Sikhs are not prepared, as far as their own request goes, to abandon separate representation?—Yes, sir. That we have said.

206. Sardar Ujjal Singh: You want representation in excess of your number?—You know in our representation we have provided 40 per cent. for the Mohamedans, 30 per cent. for the Hindus, and 30 per cent. for the Sikhs. My grounds are these. First of all we are only in the Punjab to any appreciable extent. Outside we are only a very small community, and as such we have everything, our hearths and homes and everything in the Punjab. So in this province we could not be expected to be placed in any position which will be detrimental to the interests of the community as a whole. In other provinces the other communities can bargain for the sake of majority in one or minority in the others, but we have not any such considerations outside the Punjab. That is the first reason. Then we have besides that very large gurdwaras with endowments attached to these gurdwaras which are not only existing in the Punjab. These gurdwaras exist outside the Punjab as well, even in some of the native states. For example, the last resting place of the 10th Guru is at Nander (Hyderabad, Deccan). Then we, as a military community, have fought the battles of the Empire and sacrificed for the upkeep of the Government. We have shed our blood not only on the frontiers of the Punjab, but even outside at great distances. In the last war in the frontiers of different countries where the war was raging. Then our military strength in the past has been nearly one-sixth of the whole army. As regards the revenue, we pay in the province, I believe, something like 40 per cent. of the total land revenue. The Hindus and Mahomedans are in the majority in some of the provinces. In some provinces the Hindus are in the majority and in some the Mahomedans are in the majority. In that way they can keep the balance of power in different places, but we, being simply in the Punjab, unless we are given special weightage for our representation, we cannot keep the influence of the community, or we cannot exert any real influence in the debates, or we cannot make ourselves properly felt. Then no minority community should be at the mercy of a majority community and no majority community should be in a position to tyrannise any minority community, and, against such contingency, there should be a combination which should be able to defeat that contingency should it arise. Coming to our services in the war, I think we have given nearly one out of every four men that went from the Punjab. And as regards the rewards we have won I think one-third of the rewards as a whole.

207. Do you think, Sardar Sahib, that one of the causes of this late agitation was the disappointment felt by the Sikh community on account of the inadequacy of representation given by Government?—Naturally. I think we were promised in the Joint Report of the Right Honourable Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford that this community will be represented on the same basis as the Mahomedan community, but when the actual time came the promise made was not fulfilled.

208. You mean according to the calculation based on the representation given to the Mahomedans?—That average was whittled down.

209. Do I understand that the proportion of representation given to the Mussalman minorities in other provinces was far in excess of their number? Was it 30 per cent. proportion calculated on that basis?—I will give you the figures. Take the example of Bihar and Orissa. The Mahomedans in Bihar and Orissa are 10 per cent. of the population and they have been given 27.5 per cent. in the compact, and I think the Government gave them 29 per cent.

210. Do you think that the constituencies in the Punjab are unmanageable?—They are; yes.

211. What measures would you suggest to decrease the size of the constituencies?—There are two things. I would suggest the increasing of the number of members in the council. The other thing is we can do away with urban and rural distinction. That distinction, I understand, is not seen anywhere except in Bengal, and perhaps this has been removed in Bengal also.

212. Chairman: What do you mean by removing the "urban and rural distinction," Sardar Sahib?—We have got rural constituencies and urban constituencies. I would certainly like that this distinction might be done away with.

213. But, of course, obviously the towns must have representation. You would not suggest that Lahore should have no representation?—They will come in. You can form a constituency.

214. I think what you mean, perhaps, is this, that you do not like towns up to 10,000 inhabitants being thrown into a rural constituency. Is that so?—Not exactly that. What I mean is that it introduces a sort of distinction. We have already got many distinctions.

215. You say then that there must be members of the legislature who represent great towns like Lahore. And there must be members of the legislature who represent districts like Lyallpur. What do you mean by saying that you want to get rid of the distinction between urban and rural?—We have got some special constituencies as well, and we can form other constituencies if need be and group them together.

Sardar Ujjal Singh: I think what he means is that different towns are grouped together, one town here and another town at a distance of 20, 30 or 40 miles. What he means to say is to do away with that distinction. If you take Lyallpur district, include Lyallpur town also in it and make two constituencies instead of one.

Witness: I will give you another example. Take the Sikh urban constituency. The whole of the Punjab is lumped together for this one seat. How can you expect a man to go about from place to place for long distances to canvass votes during elections?

216. What would you do in that particular case?—I would do away with the distinction between urban and rural constituencies.

217. Would you do that for all communities?—My idea is for all communities. I do away with all those distinctions. The less of these distinctions, the better.

218. Are you in favour of retaining the special constituencies, such as the universities constituency, industries, etc.?—Yes.

219. The landholders' constituency?—Yes, excepting one here which I myself have not been able to understand—the Tumandars' constituency with ten voters.

220. Do you want provinces to be set up as independent sovereign states?—You mean that all the residuary powers should be taken away from the Central Government and given to the provinces?

221. Exactly?—I am afraid I am not in favour of that.

222. Could you give the Conference some idea as to how diarchy has been working in the province? You were in the Government for some time, for five years, I believe?—

Chairman: I should like to make that point clear. When were you in office?—I was Executive Council Member, sir, from the 3rd of January, 1921, to the 2nd of January, 1926, that is, five years.

223. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Could you give the Conference some idea of the working of dyarchy?—I said that diarchy has worked fairly satisfactorily. But in some respects you cannot say it has worked all right. I should be committing myself too much, and may be divulging certain things, and so I should rather say nothing further.

224. How did you like the idea of departmental heads or secretaries approaching the Governor over the heads of Members like yourself, or the Ministers?—I did not like it at all.

225. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Are we clear, Sardar Sahib, that that happened?—It always happened.

226. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Are you in favour of entrusting the question of recruitment to the services to an independent body like the Public Service Commission?—Yes; I think we have said that in our Memorandum.

227. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: Sardar Sahib, I should draw your attention to page 137, paragraph 16, of your Memorandum, which is signed by you, of course, and you must know the recommendations which have been made by you. You say: "Subject to the above reservations, under which no one single community can oppress members of another, the Sikhs would recommend a system of Federal Government being established in the country, under which each Province will have full independence in all internal affairs. * * *" Since when have you changed that view?—Of course, full independence in certain subjects, but not in all.

228. Am I to understand that in your answer with regard to residuary powers given to Sardar Ujjal Singh what you really meant was what is given in this paragraph? Do you want to amend it?—I think we have said something about residuary power when we considered the question in connection with the Nehru Committee's Report. I think we said that residuary powers should not be taken away from the Central Government.

229. Since you signed this Memorandum, your view has undergone a change?—Not a change. In some cases certain power should remain with the provincial Government, but there are certain other powers which should remain with the Central Government.

230. Does paragraph 16 continue to represent accurately your view on that point, or does it require modification?—It is subject to what I have said just now.

231. It is modified to that extent?—You take that interpretation in the wrong way. But from my point of view there are only certain powers which should be exercised by the Provincial Government, but the residuary powers should remain with the Central Government.

232. At page 135 of your Memorandum, in the last sentence of paragraph 5, you said: "Even Government was defied at times by this majority, and was insolently told that its very existence could be made impossible by the Mahomedans upon whose vote it had to rely so much for its continuance." Will you cite either some document or some declaration where that was said?—In the open council, one of the Mahomedan members said so.

233. Will you give me a reference? That is a very serious allegation?—I could not do it at the moment, but it could be given.

234. I will be very glad if you will. You say that Government was defied by this majority. Do you mean to say that the Mahomedans were in a majority?—You can see that from the number of Mahomedans.

235. I will put it in this way. Out of the elected and nominated members, apart from the official bloc, the Mahomedans were 36 out of 79, including nomination. Do you call that a majority?—As I said, with the communal bias which has been rampant throughout the Punjab Council, they were nothing else but a majority.

236. You call 36 out of 79 a majority?—You are lumping together the Hindus and the Sikhs. I do not take it in that way.

237. In order that a majority should have its own way it has to be an absolute majority. Other people combined together can defeat any bloc which is less than half. What is your meaning with regard to this majority? I understand that, so far as absolute majority was concerned, the Mahomedans were in a minority?—I am doubtful if they were.

238. You think these figures are not correct?—I do not think that these figures are correct. But I say that when you lump together the Hindus and the Sikhs into one bloc and take the Mahomedans separately, they are in a minority.

239. Can you tell me as to whether during the latter part of the second council there was no Mahomedan Minister?—I cannot give you any reply to that because I was not in the council.

240. But do you know as a matter of fact, as an outsider, after you had resigned?—You might put that question to my friend Sardar Jodh Singh, who was in the council.

Sardar Jodh Singh (witness): Yes, I could inform the Conference about that and give the reasons for that also.

241. I am not asking reasons. I am merely eliciting facts?—(Sardar Jodh Singh): The fact is known to everybody that there was no Mahomedan.

242. During that short time did the Mahomedan bloc support the non-Mahomedan ministers?—(Sardar Jodh Singh): The Mahomedan bloc tried its best not to support, but the Hindus and Sikhs joined together and because Government wanted to keep that Ministry in power with the help of the official bloc it remained in power in spite of the Mahomedans.

243. Can you refer to any important divisions (one or two will do) in which the non-Mahomedan ministers were opposed by the Mahomedan bloc during that period?—(Sardar Jodh Singh): I told you that the Mahomedans did not have that combination. To begin with, the circumstances were these, that the Sikhs were under the influence of the Akali agitation, and they did not support the Government, and the Hindus had among them some Congress members who were pledged to non-co-operation. So those who wanted to co-operate with the Sikh and the Hindu bloc were in a minority. Hence the Mahomedans were the only party who supported the Government as a bloc. But after the Gurdwara Bill the situation changed. The Sikhs also began to support the Government on occasions, and the official bloc had the majority. Therefore the Mahomedans did raise that question once or twice. When Sardar Jogendra Singh was appointed Minister they attacked his Excise policy, but to their surprise they found that the Sikhs, on whose help they counted, would not support them, and they failed. There is one thing more. Chaudhri Chhotu Ram had the support of the Mahomedans. He had no support of the Hindu bloc. The Mahomedans supported him on principle because that bloc contained the majority of Mahomedans.

244. Sardar Sahib, to resume the questions addressed to you, under the principle which you have postulated, that in no legislative council should one community have a majority as against all others combined, how would you distribute the seats in the Legislative Council of this province where there is only one minority and one majority? Would you turn the majority into a minority and a minority into a majority?—(Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): It is not possible

245. What would you do in these councils?—A question like that does not arise in other councils like the Punjab.

246. So that it is only in the Punjab that you would follow that principle and not in any other province?—Because we have got three important communities here. Take the case of Madras * * *

247. The Mahomedans are, of course, only one party?—The remedy is with the Mahomedan community.

248. I am not asking about the remedy.—In the balance of power they have got the remedy. In some provinces they have a majority.

249. In Madras, you know, again there are three communities—the Indian Christians, the Mahomedans and the Hindus. Would you in Madras give to the Indian Christians and the Mahomedans combined 51 per cent. of the seats in the council?—Do you not count in Madras the non-Brahmins, who are an important community?

250. They are Hindus.—All the same, there is an important division among the Hindus, the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins. You shall have to count them. You cannot possibly avoid counting them.

251. And what would be your situation?—There the Mahomedans, the depressed classes and all others could combine and form a majority.

252. In the United Provinces?—In the United Provinces it is practically the same thing. You have got about 40 per cent., if I am not mistaken.

253. The next question I would like to ask you is this: You say in your Memorandum at page 137, at the end of paragraph 14: "That the Mahomedans can apprehend no such combination against them in the Punjab will be evident from the fact that the Sikhs have hitherto thrown their lot more often with Mahomedans than with Hindus, especially as their interests, as a rural and agricultural community, have coincided with those of the Mahomedans." Would not that show that you have less to fear from the Mahomedans with whom your interests coincide than from the Hindus with whom your interests do not coincide?—What about the special Gurdwara Bill which was forced upon us?

254. If you give me an answer I will tell you that.—A thing might happen like that in certain cases. In the important case that I have suggested here the Sikhs sided with the Mahomedans, but in other cases it may be quite the reverse. Take the case of the Gurdwara Bill. There, of course, the Hindus and the Sikhs made a stand against the official and Mahomedan majority. In spite of that, they were defeated and the Gurdwara Bill was passed.

255. But ordinarily you think your interests will coincide with those of the Mahomedans?—The interests are different. In rural interests we may go with Mahomedans, but there may be other interests as well.

256. I should draw your attention to paragraph 19 of your Memorandum at page 137. You say that the franchise should continue on the same basis as at present?—Yes.

257. You recommend no extension of the franchise?—No; already it is low.

258. The voting strength of the Sikhs, as compared with their population, is very high and should be reduced?—Is that a reason why it should be reduced? It is not a reason at all.

259. Which do you think, universal franchise or a much lower franchise?—What I feel is that at present the people are not taking as much interest in the elections as they should.

260. You are aware that in the elections to the Gurdwara Prabhandak Committee there is universal suffrage for the Sikh community?—(Sardar Jodh Singh): Universal suffrage has been given to the Sikhs under the Gurdwara Act, but the result is that in spite of the fact that there were two rival parties engaged in a very keen contest in the last election with an Akali agitation, in spite of the fact that the agitation was there for the last 40 years, and in spite of the fact that the issues were made as live as possible and the franchise simple, it is found that the polling of the votes was only 14 per cent. This shows that when they take so much interest in an issue, even when universal suffrage is not appreciated by the people, and in this case the issue was religious, which every Sikh understands; but to understand complicated political issues it requires a higher standard of education, and we think that that standard has not been reached yet.

261. So that the point, I understand, is this: that for the political education of the people you would seek to exclude the majority of the people from the franchise, waiting for the general advance in education of the people?—Nothing like that. What I feel is that in the Punjab, if the cream of the society and the best educated cannot yet understand that it is digging at the root of nationalism, and hence at the root of democracy, to insist on special electorates and along with them a fixed majority by law and that majority a communal one, I cannot be very optimistic of the general outlook of the general masses, and hence I say that until the educated people who are leading the masses have got the right spirit, I do not think there is any use of this pumping of communal virus into the masses who are now living peacefully.

262. I wish to draw your attention to paragraph 20 of your Memorandum on page 137. You say: "Under no circumstances should system of communal representation, whether through communal or joint electorates, be allowed to exist in local bodies, but minorities should have adequate representation on these bodies." How would you achieve that?—Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): By proportional representation by single voting system.

263. You are aware that the franchise in the local bodies is much lower than in the legislatures?—Yes.

264. Do you think that these people with a much lower franchise would be able to understand the working of the proportional representation by single transferable vote?—Not transferable vote, but proportional representation by single voting.

265. You put forward the proposition that persons with a much lower qualification than is required for the Legislative Council would be able to properly appreciate the working of the proportional system of single voting, but the same people are not at present fit to exercise the ordinary franchise for the Council?—They are two separate things. The area in the one case is not the same as in the other, and the problems are not the same.

266. Will you explain what you mean by proportional system by single vote? (Sardar Jodh Singh): There are books on the subject, and there is no use of my wasting the time of the Conference on it now.

267. I wish to draw your attention to paragraph 22. You say: "All other subjects, both in the Provincial and Central Governments should be subject to the vote of the Legislature." Do I understand that whatever the division of the subjects may be, they should all be transferred in the provincial legislature? That is your meaning?—(Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): Yes.

268. You recommend a second chamber in the provinces?—(Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): Yes. But if that is going to be very costly, we may not press for it.

269. That is an important qualification. Then towards the end of your Memorandum you suggest that the "Public Service Commission shall, in each province, see that all classes of the population are fairly represented in the services, but the criterion of appointment in all cases shall be merit and efficiency for the work expected to be done." Do you recommend that there should be a certain minimum qualification, and provided that is possessed by the candidates the Public Service Commission shall proceed to make the appointments with regard to communal considerations?—Yes.

270. One of the considerations put forward—I do not want to go into that at any great detail now—one of the considerations put forward by you to which you say special importance should be attached with regard to the Sikh claim, is that the Sikhs were the rulers of the Punjab immediately before the British. Now, would you give special representation on those lines to the British element in the Punjab as soon as you get responsible self-government, on the ground that they have also been and still are the rulers of the country?—I have no objection if you want it and if you think it will work better.

271. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Can you give any instances, besides the case of the Gurdwara Act, which came up for discussion before the Punjab Legislative Council in which religious interests of the Sikhs were concerned?—I do not know if I can give you any such instances without hunting up the records.

272. You cannot recall any instances from memory at present?—There was the Kirpan question and the release of the Gurdwara prisoners.

273. You have stated that the Sikhs have thrown in their lot with the Mohamedans more often than with Hindus. Is this not due to the fact that most of the questions that come up for discussion before the Council are of a secular and economic nature, and so far as secular and economic interests are concerned the Sikhs have the same interests as the Mahomedans, generally speaking?—Not always.

274. But generally speaking?—The reply is already there. How can you make a differentiation and draw a line. You cannot do so. I do not know what will happen in the future.

275. There is no question of the future. What is the reason which has accounted for the Sikhs making common cause with the Mohamedans more often than with the Hindus in the past?—Do you think the Sikhs are so devoid of sense as not to know how to protect their interests and which way their interests lie?

276. Do you mean to say that their interests have coincided more often with those of the Mahomedans than those of the Hindus?—Not very often. It may happen at any time. It has happened like that in the instances I have given.

277. Are not the Sikhs essentially and pre-eminently an agricultural community?—Mostly they are.

278. And so are Mahomedans?—Yes.

279. Therefore, so far as the agricultural interests are concerned, they are in the same boat?—They have been like that, there is no doubt about that.

280. You have stated that the present distinction between the rural and urban constituencies should be abolished in order that the size of the constituencies might be decreased?—Yes, so that they might become manageable.

281. It comes to the same thing. Do you think that that represents the view of the rural Sikhs?—Do you think that the rural Sikhs would not get their representation?

282. That is not the question.—The rural population amongst the Sikhs is there no doubt, and when these constituencies are formed they would have their representation.

283. You cannot say that the rural Sikhs would dislike these constituencies being removed?—These are the instructions.

284. Instructions by whom?—From the Diwan, which is a representative body of the Sikhs.

285. Will you kindly tell me whether it is the Central League which represents the Sikhs better or the Chief Khalsa Diwan?—I cannot give a reply to that. The Central Sikh League has also put forward the same demands that we are putting forward.

286. In respect of the abolition of this distinction?—Yes.

287. They have not made any representations whatsoever?—Not to you.

288. You said that, very soon after Sardar Jogendra Singh had been appointed Minister for Agriculture, the Mahomedan members brought a motion in order to censure him on the question of excise policy. Do you remember whether those Mahomedan members made it quite plain in their speeches that they did not mean that motion to be a censure motion on the Minister at all, but that they simply wanted to discuss the policy?—(Sardar Jodh Singh): They did that when they knew they could not censure.

289. When did they come to know of it?—In the lobby discussions the whole thing was plain to them.

290. Was not the very first speech on the motion indicative of the fact that the motion was not meant to be a censure motion against the Minister?—The honourable member knows that lobby discussions take place long before the resolutions are moved and before the speeches are made.

291. Raja Narendra Nath: The Sikhs are, I presume, one consolidated, well-organised body? They are not divided into different castes?—(Sardar Sunder Singh Majithia): We do not believe in castes.

292. Dr. Narang: The Central Sikh League is also represented on this deputation by Sardar Sant Singh, who is a member of that body?—Yes.

293. And he is present here?—Yes.

Sardar Sant Singh: I do not come here on behalf of that body.

294. Dr. Narang: It has been stated in the Conference that the Mahomedans will have no objection if the Sikhs wanted weightage, and they may take it from the share of the Hindus. You say, on page 135, that you want to get rid of the tyranny of religious majority. Will that tyranny of religious majority be removed by a partition inter se between the Hindus and the Sikhs?—(Sardar Sunder Singh Majithia): No.

295. It is also stated that joint electorates, if introduced in this Province, will lead to fights, riots, bloodshed and the dissolution of the whole system of this Province. Do you agree with this view?—That has been the case even in provinces where there is separate electorate.

296. You think the joint electorates will contribute to smooth working?—At any rate we can have a trial in the local bodies and if it succeeds there we can extend it later on.

297. I want to put one question, on which a great deal of emphasis has been laid. I just want to know from you, Sardar Jodh Singh, what is the effective majority in the Punjab Legislative Council. Is it the Muslim representation or any other combination, in spite of their being in the majority in point of numbers?—(Sardar Jodh Singh): They are the most united single block numerically. Hence, whichever side they cast their votes that side wins.

298. So they are in an effective majority?—Yes.

299. The Hindus are divided into groups?—Yes, the Congress men and the non-Congress men.

300. And also the Rohtakwalas?—Yes.

301. So there are three distinct groups of Hindus?—Yes.

304. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: Do you include Ramgarhia and Ramdasi Sikhs as Sikhs?—(Sardar Sunder Singh Majithia): Yes, we do.

305. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: Much of the ground has been covered by the questions put by my friends opposite. I would like you to say something—and I think the members of the Conference would like to know—of the representative character of the Chief Khalsa Diwan, how the Memorandum which is submitted was prepared and so on?—We called a representative meeting of the Sikhs from the different parts of the province and they met together on the 27th of May and discussed the draft Memorandum in that meeting and passed it.

306. So it is the general demand of the Sikh community that is embodied in this Memorandum?—Yes. It has support of the Sikhs Association and also the support of the Sikh League as well.

307. Sardar Shivdev Singh: I think it would be interesting for the members of the Commission to know the Diwan's position, when it was constituted and what interest it has been taking in the political and educational advancement of this province.

Chairman: I should like to know.

Witness: The Chief Khalsa Diwan, which is a registered body under Act 21 of 1869, was established in 1902. It has nearly 100 associations (Singh Sabhas) attached to it which are scattered over in different parts of the country. The Diwan has an educational committee of its own to which the majority of the members are sent by the Diwan, but there are other interests also represented on that educational committee. That educational committee controls nearly 275 educational institutions. Those 275 educational institutions comprise 93 secondary schools, 43 high and 50 middle schools, including eight schools for the girls. The schools are managed and run by the local efforts of the Sihks and they receive grants-in-aid from the educational committee of the Diwan. We have up to this time given nearly Rs. 3,32,366 as grants-in-aid to these different schools. I should not be understood to mean that these institutions depend upon the grant-in-aid that the educational committee gives; but they give them this help besides the money that is collected by local efforts, a substantial amount is also collected in the shape of fees and Government also gives grant-in-aid.

308. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: You have stated about the educational activities, but I would like to know what activities the Diwan has shown in the political advancement of the community and what part it played during the investigation of the present Reforms?—When the Reforms were to be introduced by Lord Chelmsford and the Rt. Hon. Montagu, we submitted, on behalf of the Diwan, a Memorandum on the subject of Reforms, a copy of which we have annexed* to our present Memorandum to the Commission. Besides that, we took a deputation to the Rt. Hon. the Secretary of State and to the Viceroy in Delhi on behalf of the community, and we discussed the matter with those two high officials. Then we sent a deputation to England comprising, amongst others, two friends of ours here, Sardar Shivdev Singh and Sardar Ujjal Singh. They went to England and had occasion to meet Sir Sankaran Nair, who was a member on the Advisory Committee in England. The report that these gentlemen submitted also forms part of the annexure* to our present Memorandum. So you see, in the past we have done our best to represent the interests of the community in the sphere of politics so far as it lay within the province of the Diwan.

309. Do you remember that in that deputation which was sent to England there was one member who was the President of the then Sikh League?—You mean Sardar Sohan Singh?

310. Yes.—Yes.

311. Do you think that the demands which have been put from time to time in these memoranda have been met by the Government to the satisfaction of the community?—I am afraid not.

312. One of your demands, I understand, has always been to have a Sikh in the Executive Council of the Viceroy?—Yes.

313. Has that demand ever been met by the Government?—No, not at all.

314. Dr. Suhrawardy: You have complained of the standing tyrannous majority of the Mussalmans in the Punjab Legislative Council. Is it not a fact that the standing tyrannous majority of the Mussalmans in the Council is reduced to a helpless minority in the event of the combination of the Sikhs and the Hindus?—I have said already that many a time things have happened when Sikhs and the Mahomedans have joined together.

315. That I know. But my question is this. You have given examples where on account of community of interests, Sikhs have joined the Mahomedans in the council, but you have complained of the standing tyrannous majority of the Mussalmans. As an illustration you yourself have said that where the question of your religious interests was concerned, namely, the Gurdwara Bill, the Mussalmans stood on one side and the Hindus and the Sikhs on the other side. Is it not that numerically the Hindus and Sikhs combination was stronger than the Muslim so-called standing tyrannous majority? Is it a fact that it was with the help of the official bloc that you were defeated and not by the standing tyrannous majority of the Mahomedans?—If the official bloc also did not then agree to the measure, even then we could have been defeated.

* Not printed.

316. Even when Sikhs and Hindus were combined?—Hindus and Sikhs were not in favour of the Gurdwara Bill.

317. What I want is the numerical strength, that is, if the official bloc were to remain neutral, cannot the Hindus and the Sikhs combined together reduce the Muslim standing tyrannous majority into minority?—I do not think so.

318. You have said, if I have not mistaken you, that where there are only two communities in the provinces other than the Punjab, the Muslim minority have got a remedy inasmuch as they are in a majority in other provinces. Will you please inform me whether the Muslims are in a majority in any of the provincial legislatures?—Take the case of the Punjab. You are asking for Sind to be separated. We have suffered in the Punjab in our own homes and we have no appreciable interest outside the Province. The Mahomedans would have a compensating thing later on in the other provinces which are being asked to be made.

319. Let me tell you that even in Bengal we are in a minority?—I admit that.

320. You claim a number of seats for the Sikh community in excess of their numerical strength in the Punjab on the same basis as the Mahomedans in Bihar, who are about the same strength numerically as you are in the Punjab have been given representation. Is not that your point?—Yes.

321. That is on account of your historic importance and loyal service during the war?—Economic importance as well. I will give you an example * * *

322. I do not want any example. Is it a fact that, because certain amount of representation in excess of their population is given to Mahomedans in Bihar you want for the Sikh community similar representation?—What I mean is that for Mahomedans special representation was conceded by the Montford Report, and we were promised by two responsible officers of Government consideration on the same lines. We have been pressing for that consideration all this time, but it has not been conceded.

323. If you get your concession, you do not mind the Mahomedans of other provinces getting similar concession?—I will not mind at all.

324. You also will not mind if in Sind, Delhi and North-West Frontier Province similar protection is given?—No. We only want that we should have some protection.

325. What is the protection you want? You simply say you want "similar representation." Do you want separate electorate?

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: What my friend Dr. Suhrawardy wants to know is whether by separate electorate or by joint electorate you want reservation of seats?—By any method that could be devised for us. If you want that the method should be suggested by us we will do so.

326. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You have been five years a member of the Executive Council. What is your view, has the growth of communalism in the Punjab become more acute since the advent of the Reforms than it was before? Do you think that since the introduction of communal representation, communal tension has grown?—Naturally, it has grown. Am I to give the reply as a late Member of the Executive Council.

327. Chairman: No, no. I do not think the question was asked for the purpose of getting from you what may be called an ex-official view. It was merely introductory, to call attention to the fact that you have been much interested in politics in the Punjab. The question, if I may say so, is a very good one. It was really put in two forms. I would prefer the first form. What he is asking you is whether in your opinion, since the introduction of the Montford Reforms, the communal tension in this Province in the political sphere has increased?—Certainly it has.

328. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Is it due to the introduction of separate communal representation in your Province?—Well, at any rate I cannot say that it has smoothened the spirit.

329. The point I wish to ask you, Sardar, is how far in your opinion the introduction of separate electorates has contributed to the growing tension between the various communities?—It has accentuated to a certain extent.

330. Has the growth of communal tension been conducive to the lowering of efficiency in the services?—Certainly, there is favouritism.

331. Has it also prejudiced the determination of public questions in the local legislature?—Take the case of admission into the educational institutions; it has been done on communal lines. Whether the community requires protection or not I cannot say, but things like giving more jobs to certain communities which are not well represented has brought about this tension.

332. You mean to say that the various communities try to put in their own candidates and nobody thinks about the State or the nation?—At any rate that has been so in the Punjab.

333. You have said that if communal representation is abolished you are prepared to sacrifice the interests of your community in favour of the larger interests and nationality?—Yes, provided it is removed from the country as a whole.

334. Of course, you have said that. Are you prepared to do that not only as regards communal representation in the legislature but also communal representation in the services?—When that spirit of nationalism comes in the country as a whole these things would go, but as long as we are hidebound by these different communal considerations you cannot expect one community to sacrifice for the sake of another. If it is removed from the whole country we are prepared to stand on our merits.

335. Mr. Hartshorn: Including the services?—Yes.

338. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: I should like to know your view, Sardar Saheb, about the origin of communal riots. Whether it is due to separate electorates or whether it is due to any other causes?

Chairman: What date are you taking about the origin of communal troubles?

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Since the inception of the Reforms, i.e., 1922.

339. Chairman: Let me put the question myself. What is your view, Sardar Saheb? There have been, unfortunately, on occasions very serious outbreaks in this part of the world, let us say, within the last seven or eight years from time to time. The question put to you by Sir Zulfiqar is whether you think that those unfortunate outbreaks have been—I think he suggested—caused by communical representation?—Take the case of the riots that took place at Amritsar in 1919. There was no communal representation at the back of it; political teachings and all that sort of thing were there. But take the case of the riots in Multan. There was certainly Mahomedan feeling against the Hindus and the Sikhs. So I cannot say that all riots are caused by communal representation.

340. Chairman: Communalism and communal representation are quite different things. As I understand it communalism is a state of tension, of mutual suspicion or mutual antagonism between different communities. The question is, do you think that that situation was aggravated by the fact that there were communal electorates?—(Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia): I think, sir, they helped to fan them to some extent.

341. You think they helped to fan the flame?—Yes.

342. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Do you think a system of joint electorates will remove that tension?—It may do so. I cannot prophesy for the future.

343. For example, between two Sikh candidates standing for election, does not that very spirit of rivalry between the two Sikh candidates create bad feeling between them?—What is happening in the district boards just at present?

344. I want to know as between Hindus, Sikhs and Mahomedans.—At any rate, a Sikh candidate will have to get the support of Mahomedans and Hindus as well to get elected.

345. That is merely theoretical?—The other side is theoretical, too.

346. You say that the Sikhs made sacrifices in the cause of the Empire and therefore must get something in excess of their due share. Do you not think that Mussalmans and Hindus have also sacrified in the Great War?—Comparisons are always odious, but take what we have done, and we base our claim on that.

347. Others have also done the same thing, but they are not wanting more than their shares.—They are asking for 55 per cent.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: On the population basis.

348. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: Every community has rendered service in the last war, but what my friend the Nawab Sahib wanted to make clear was the extent of help given by each community.—Well, sir, if you study the speeches of Sir Michael O'Dwyer at the time that will make the point very clear. Sir Michael O'Dwyer gives the figures of the different communities recruited during the war. Please see what he says. I need not say anything more.

AFTERNOON.

1. Chairman (to Sardar Sunder Singh Majithia): Just a few questions I would like to put to you to concentrate attention on the view you present. As I understand your Memorandum you point out that here in the Punjab the difficulties connected with communalism are increased by the fact that you have this very important Sikh community to provide for?—Yes.

2. And what we have noticed is this, that, compared with the other two communities, the voting strength of the Sikh community in comparison with their population is very high. Is that not so?—Yes, sir.

3. The figures that we have been supplied show that the voting strength of the Sikh community is 24 per cent.?—Yes, with the present franchise.

4. Whereas on a population basis they would be 11 per cent.?—Yes.

5. So that their voting strength is more than double of what we might suppose to be their population?—Yes.

6. Will you just tell me why that is so and how that has come about?—Because we have got many landed proprietors among us and we have a large number of people who pay land revenue.

7. I suppose that the main reason must be that in the rural districts the Sikh proprietor is, on an average, a more important occupier than the average occupier of any other community?—Yes, Sir.

8. Anyhow, that is the fact; 24 per cent. voting strength to 11 per cent. population. On the other hand, you see that the Mahomedan community is an absolute majority in population?—Yes, Sir.

9. They form 55 per cent?—Yes; that is an established fact.

10. Whereas the Mahomedan voting strength I see is only 43 per cent.?—Yes, sir.

11. I have just been making some tables and the figures when put together are very impressive. I put the "population percentage" in one column, "voting strength" in the second column, and the suggestion of your deputation as to the distribution of seats in the third column. That works out like this. The Sikhs form 11 per cent. of the population; they have a voting strength of 24 per cent. and your deputation is putting forward on their behalf a proposal that they should have 30 per cent. of the seats?—Yes, sir.

12. Then take the Mahomedans. The Mahomedans are 55 per cent. of the population; they are 43 per cent. of the voting strength, and your proposal is that they should have 40 per cent. of the seats?—Yes.

13. Then if I may call the remainder Hindu—strictly speaking, it is not Hindu, but a great mass is Hindu—calling it Hindu, you get population 33 per cent., voting strength 32 per cent. and the seats you propose 30 per cent. Do you observe that if that proposal held the field, the Hindu community would have seats which are, roughly, in proportion either to their population strength or to their voting strength, and it follows really that your proposal is a proposal by which the number of seats to be allotted to the Sikhs, which is 30 per cent., is to be secured really by a reduction of the proportionate Mahomedan representation?—Also from the Hindus.

14. I do not see how that is to be done, because you see the Hindus are 33 per cent. population and their voting strength is 32 per cent. It is only two seats you get from the Hindus?—My idea was this, that they were also a distinct minority in the Punjab, and in reducing their seats I could not reduce them much.

15. I see the idea. Of course, one must face the result of this?—We are lowering the Mahomedan seats only by four.

16. One has always to remember in these things, of course, that whatever may be the force of the argument for giving a disproportionately high number to one community, the proposal can only be carried out if you are prepared to give a disproportionately low number to the other community?—There is one thing to remember. In the other provinces the Hindus and the Mahomedans are to be considered. Take Madras. In Madras the Mahomedans are about 6 per cent. and the rest are Hindus. Therefore, a greater representation of the Mohamedans is possible in Madras. But here we have got three communities to consider and, therefore, you have to take from both.

17. It is really a very elementary mathematical observation. If there are two hours of time which is divided between the Commission and the two Committees, it is manifest that if one of the bodies take more than its proportionate time it can only be at the expense of the other two?—Quite, sir, but there is no other remedy for it. On the other hand, this time is a time divided in the other provinces by only two communities. We do not come in there for sharing this time.

18. That is quite right. I appreciate entirely the special importance of the Sikh community in this province. The result of your plan is this, that although on a population basis if you added the Sikhs to the Hindus they would be less than the Mahomedans, on your proposed distribution of seats if you added the Sikhs to the Hindus, then you would have more seats than the Mahomedans?—On the other hand, let us take another case. Supposing the Sikhs as a body were transferred from the Punjab into Bihar and Orissa and a similar proportion were to be got out from Bihar and Orissa, the Mahomedans there on the one side are 10 per cent. and the Sikhs 11 per cent. The Hindus would be the remaining portion of the percentage. What would you do in that case?

19. I will reply by saying that, fortunately, we had better confine ourselves to the Sikhs in the Punjab!—

My argument is this. In Bihar and Orissa you have got only two communities to consider, whereas in the Punjab you have three communities to consider. Therefore you cannot very well lay down a formula which would apply equally in the other provinces. Our case is a special one.

20. At any rate, you do not dissent from my figures?—I do not dissent from them as they stand.

21. I shall just ask you two other things. You see this is another point which is in the mind of some of us. In the district boards of this Province there is no communal electorate. Is there?—In regard to that, of course, my friend (Sardar Jodh Singh) just told me that there the constituencies are manipulated in such a way. . . . .

22. Don't let us use question-begging words. But what you mean is that in the district boards you consider that the boundaries are so arranged as none the less to produce a particular result?—That has actually happened, sir.

23. And I think that the particular thing you were disposed to suggest was that they were so arranged as to benefit the Mahomedans?—That is my contention.

24. If I take the district boards and try to find out how many seats the Sikhs ought to have if the right number is to be got at by taking an average between their population and voting strength, I find that the number that they ought to have is 141?—Yes.

25. Do you know how many they actually have?—Not the exact number, Sir.

26. I will tell you. It is 186. I have got it here at page 142* of the Blue Book, and I see that it is rather a striking fact. Is that not so where the Sikhs have got no communal electorate?—But has it not been, Sir, mostly in the central districts?

27. Would you give me an explanation for that? If I understand the facts rightly, it seems rather a striking fact in the district boards, where there was no communal electorate and where, as a matter of fact, you are disposed to think that the boundaries of the constituencies would rather favour the Mahomedans, it looks as though the Sikhs would, in fact, get in, no doubt, on the strength of their authority and influence in the district. They are occupying 186 seats, as against 141, according to what is called the formula?—But have you seen what was the number of seats in the district board to the Sikhs before, and what was the number of seats to the Mahomedans before, and what effect this formula had on it?

28. But the formula was not applied at all?—In the district board, sir, the manipulation has been done in such a way as to give a larger number of seats to the Mahomedans now than they themselves ought to have had.

29. Notwithstanding the fact that, in your view, there has been such an artificial arrangement as to favour the Mahomedans at the expense of their rivals, none the less the Sikhs have secured 186 seats, whereas on what is called the formula basis, they ought to have had 141. That rather makes me think that at any rate in the district boards the Sikhs are able to hold their own?—Yes, they have been able to hold their own here because in the central districts they were the chief factors who were represented on the district boards before.

30. Can you tell me offhand and speaking quite generally which community is it in the district boards that has in this result had to give way, as it were, to the Sikhs? You said that the Mahomedans got a very good deal.' It must be the Hindus then?—I cannot say anything offhand. The possibility is that Hindus had not had so much landed interest to safeguard, and, therefore, they were not so much represented.

31. I have only one other question to put to you and I want to put it clearly, and then I hope we may be able, for the afternoon, to pass from the communal argument, which, after all, cannot occupy the whole of the political and public interests of a very great country. You were asked by my friend Sir Hari Singh Gour a question just before we broke up. He argued thus: He said: "Did you think that communal electorates were the cause which had increased communal tension and even riots and violence in recent years?" I understood your answer to be—but tell me if I have understood it aright—you thought that it had contributed?—That is what I thought, Sir.

32. Do you think that this has anything to do with it, that the position was that in previous times, when the prospect of a rapid advance to more self-government seemed very distant, the different communities were less prepared to try and get full political representations for their own special case, and do you think that in recent years, when the prospect was opened out of constitutional advance, the different communities are becoming increasingly eager to (what I say call) dig themselves in before the later stages are reached? Do you think there is anything in that?—Quite right, Sir. That may be due to it. But all the same previous to the pre-Reform days we had in this country no legislative council as now, and the administration in municipalities and district boards was carried on by Government officials. The people did not take so much interest in those Westernised institutions before as they are taking now.

33. I am just following out your line of thought, and it seems rather to confirm what I have suggested, that in those days communal feeling in connection with politics was less important because, even if you did not get your co-religionist returned, he had not much opportunity to influence political action?—Quite so.

34. And now he has more opportunities to influence political action?—Not only that, Sir, but even the principle now followed in regard to the representation in different services has accentuated it too.

35. Because you mean that, if you get what you regard as an adequate representation of your community in the legislature, that, in its turn, enables increased pressure to be exercised with the object of securing what you regard as adequate representation in the services?—Yes, Sir.

36. And so the wheel goes round?—Not only that, Sir. We cannot drive out from our minds what we were before in this Province.

37. Who were the last rulers of the Province before the British?—The Sikhs. The fact is we cannot afford to be relegated to the position of being dependent on other communities.

38. It is rather striking and, in all circumstances, not a very encouraging fact that, when we had the deputation from the Hindu party yesterday morning, the spokesman expressed a strong view that, unless there was a complete abolition throughout India of communal representation, they would go so far as to say that they did not want any constitutional advance. Yesterday afternoon we had a very strong expression of view from the mouth of Sir Muhammad Shafi, I do not say insisting, but at any rate very powerfully and emphatically demanding that the joint electorates should not be substituted for separate electorates. Now I see, in the Memorandum of the Sikh deputation, on page 137: "The Sikhs, therefore, while they welcome an extension of the system of responsible government, feel that any extension that may be decided upon should be accompanied by the removal of circumscribing adverse conditions, and, if these latter cannot be removed, they feel that no radical extension of the present system will be useful to the country. It would merely extend the area of mischief." Now tell me, what do you mean by that sentence, "By the removal of circumscribing adverse conditions"? Do you not think, if I may make a suggestion, that every community in this Province must really do its utmost—I do not lecture, but I merely make a suggestion with the greatest humility—to cultivate a spirit of give and take?—Certainly, that is what we want, but I do not want it at the risk of depriving the Sikh community of their legitimate rights, as has been done by the Nehru Committee.

39. Lord Burnham: I wish to ask you one question with regard to the report concerning the Sikh deputation which went to England in 1920. I see great disappointment is expressed at the failure of that deputation owing to accidental circumstances to achieve its ends. They arrived late. That is all set out, and they were not satisfied with the one additional member or two. Could you tell me what else they expected?—What happened at that time was that we get practically two members and one member by nomination, making three in all, and three members were given to the Mahomedans. Our deputation demanded proper representation, that is, proportionately to our community. But our friends benefited and we do not grudge them; but still we felt that we had not been dealt with adequately and the promises held out to us by the responsible officials, that is, the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India and the Viceroy of India, have dwindled down and they were not fulfilled.

40. It is set out here, and I have no means of testing it, and I have no doubt it is true, that Lord Selbourne, who received the deputation as chairman of the Joint Committees of both Houses of Parliament, said, I think—I am not quite certain—that it was too late to make the amendment that you asked?—Yes, that is what he said.

41. You do not think you had a fair hearing on that occasion?—We had no fair hearing, and we were told at that time that our claims would be duly considered on the next occasion. Now is that time, and it is in your hands to give us.

42. Do you mean as a community to be represented in England when the Joint Committees of both Houses considers any proposals that are made?—If a Committee is appointed there to consider this question we shall be delighted to represent our case.

43. I have no power to invite, but I ask you whether you mean to go?—Certainly, we shall be delighted to go, if occasion arises, to press our claims.

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: If I am permitted to say a little on this matter as I happened to be one of the members of the deputation, I may say it was then stated by the responsible authorities, the Right Hon. the Secretary of State and the Viceroy that the case of the Sikhs was quite just, but they feared it was not the time when the whole question should be considered.

44. Major Attlee: On page 137, paragraph 17, of your Memorandum you say, "No member of the permanent services of the country should ever be appointed as Governor." Where do you think the Governor should come from?—From England, and later on from this country itself.

45. In the next sentence you say, "Ministers should always be chosen so as to represent the various elements constituting the legislature." By "element" do you mean communal elements or political elements?—We are dealing particularly with our province and we cannot get rid of the idea of the different communities being represented on the Legislative Council.

46. Do you not realise that that means you cannot have in this province a parliamentary system such as we have it in England, because you do not provide for an opposition, which is quite an essential thing?—Not under the present circumstances. How can you possibly have it when the system of election is on communal basis and when even the appointment of ministers and members is on a communal basis? You can have that possible only when the majority of the House have a Prime Minister and the Prime Minister selects his colleagues. Then there will be an opposition which will take office when called upon to do so. But that could not be had here under the present circumstances. It is not possible for us to have a chief minister who will select his colleagues.

47. But the difficulty is, you want joint responsibility?—Yes.

48. That would mean a homogenous body of ministers. On the other hand, you want ministers to represent different communities?—But still ways and means could be found to make it homogeneous. What did you do in the case of the Coalition Government when Mr. Lloyd George formed the Ministry?

49. I do not cite it as a good precedent. But apart from that the point is, you are trying to adapt certain Western institutions to this country, and in this paragraph 17 you put forward two proposals that seem to my mind to kill the idea of a complete representative system. Do you not think that the time will come when the present conditions will go?—But as long as the present ideas are there we cannot have anything more than we suggest. But we welcome a suggestion of the nature you have indicated. When we get rid of this communal problem, as we hope we will, then we can think of that.

50. The interim period is a little difficult?—Yes. (Sardar Jodh Singh): I may say that along with that proposal we have another proposal that, if in the Constitution you do away with the communal electorates, then we agree to the principle which you have suggested. Our present proposal is only a kind of solution to meet the present difficulty. When you have got your members elected on a communal basis you cannot select a man who represents the whole community, because he has been elected by one community, and by no stretch of imagination can you call him to be a representative of all the citizens. As things stand at present, we must yoke together people of several communities and ask them to find a way out of the difficulty by way of compromise. After all, it is a question of give and take.

51. Lord Strathcona: Who was the first Indian member of the Executive Council of the Punjab Government after the Montford Reforms?—I happened to be the first member.

52. I only wanted to be quite certain. In paragraph 16 of your Memorandum, on page 137, you indicate your desire for full independence in the Province subject to the control of Central Government in matters pertaining to the defence of the country, etc. Then you refer to internal commotions. Does that mean that you do not favour the handing over of law and order in the Province, but you would like to devise some authority under central control for law and order?—It follows.

53. That is your desire?—Yes.

Memorandum submitted by the Punjab National Unionists Party.

1. This Memorandum represents the views of the National Unionist Party of the Punjab Council. The strength of the party is 36.

It is not intended to deal in this Memorandum with all the topics set forth in the Commission's invitation for memoranda. Nor is it intended to discuss in any great detail even the topics which have been selected for immediate treatment. The object of the present Memorandum is to convey the general views of the National Unionist Party on certain important topics as early as possible to the Commission.

It is also felt that before any specific questions are touched a brief reference may be made to a few circumstances about which it is well to have a clear conception while approaching the question of constitutional development.

India's Attitude Towards the Commission.

2. The first point which comes uppermost in one's mind in this connection is the varying attitude adopted towards the Commission by the various sections of the Indian community. This attitude has two aspects, outer and inner. The outer aspect is represented by the bitter hostility of one section and the willing co-operation of another. The inner aspect is marked only by a difference of degree, and not of kind. All those who take an intelligent interest in the subject of the Commission share a common feeling of disappointment and resentment at the exclusion of Indian element from the personnel of the Commission.

The reason for this resentment is obvious. All Royal Commissions appointed in the recent past to enquire into any question of importance have contained an Indian element. The exclusion of Indians from a Commission which is to conduct an enquiry into a question of the greatest moment to India's future as a whole could not fail to evoke the keenest resentment.

The time for the announcement of the Commission was not well chosen either.

Repeated earnest demands when made by the representatives of the people for hastening the appointment of the Statutory Commission had failed to evoke any response from the Secretary of State. When the demand had ceased the announcement of a Commission came and coincided with the existence of a strong wave of communal tension in the country. An announcement of this character at such a time was likely to be viewed with misgiving and distrust. The exclusion of Indians from the Commission tended still further to confirm the suspicions of the people.

The explanation for this exclusion that no Indians acceptable to the whole of India were available, and that the inclusion of Indians would have excluded the chance of a unanimous report, does not carry conviction. Human nature being what it is no one individual, even no set of individuals, would be acceptable to a whole country in any part of the world. Are there no men in England who criticise the personnel of the present Commission? Will the members of the committee which the Legislative Assembly has been invited to elect be acceptable, individually or collectively, to the whole of India? What could reasonably be insisted upon was a substantial measure of agreement among the people with regard to Indian members, and as this substantial measure of agreement is expected to be indicated by a vote of the Assembly in the election of committee the same measure of agreement could have been achieved by the adoption of a similar method in the choice of Indian members on the Commission. The part of the explanation relating to the solicitude of the Secretary of State for a unanimous report instead of explaining anything has the effect of mystifying the situation still further. In fact, it places the Commission in an embarrassing position. Has the Commission promised to produce a unanimous report? If not, what does this part of the explanation mean? The detractors of the Commission can base every plausible argument on this explanation to prejudice an average Indian against the Commission.

Communal Tension.

3. A very strong wave of communal tension has swept over the country during the last two or three years. This wave was the result of a reaction against the unity brought about in the palmy days of non-co-operation. That unity did not rest on very solid and reliable foundations. For three or four years common hatred for a third party had been preached violently from the Press and the platform and our unity was built on the foundation of that common hatred. Before the leaders of the people had had time to substitute a foundation of better material, e.g., a clear perception of common citizenship and of common secular and political interests, the crash came and the pendulum swung violently to the other extreme. The communal tension, however, affected, almost exclusively, the urban section of the people, who, after all, constitute only ten per cent. of the entire population. The communal virus did not spread to rural areas, where mutual relations of Hindus and Muslims continued to be marked by toleration, good will and even cordiality. Another encouraging feature was that excesses were everywhere committed by ignorant and irresponsible individuals, the very scum of society. A further cause for gratification is that men of responsible position were not wanting who openly and strongly denounced the mad acts of their own co-religionists. The very nature and extent of excesses, deplorable as they were, serve to rouse the conscience of the people. In fact, the revulsion of feeling caused by these excesses is so genuine, so keen and so widespread, that it may be said with confidence that the tide of communal bitterness has definitely turned.

The Indian Press.

4. In all civilised countries the Press is supposed to discharge two main functions, that of reflecting public opinion and that of moulding and guiding it. The Press in India may be said to discharge, more or less, the same functions. But there are two or three factors which distinguish the Indian Press from the Press of an ordinary Western country, and as the trend of Press comments is likely to be watched by the Commission and in some measure to influence its judgment, it will not be amiss to draw attention to these distinguishing features. The English section of the Press is divided into two parts, that owned or managed by Europeans and that owned and managed by Indians. The European-managed section will, generally speaking, be found to be either luke-warm or hostile in the matter of extension of reforms. This section is a champion of the permanent service and European capitalists, and views with cautious concern or disfavour any further political advance. The Indian-managed section of the English Press is frankly communal. There are just a few papers, a mere drop in the ocean, which keep their general policy untainted by a spirit of communalism. But the whole host of the rest are either frankly and avowedly communal or communal in spirit with a thin veneer of nationalism. Another feature of the Indian Press is that it is entirely manned by men of urban extraction both among Hindus and Muslims. The net result of this is that while urban interests receive ample attention and protection rural interests remain unnoticed and uncared for.

The Real India.

5. The real India is not the India of the Press nor the India of the town. The real India is rural India, where ninety per cent. of the Indian population reside and sweat and toil to earn a precarious living. The humming streets of Calcutta and the buzzing quarters of Bombay are no indications of true Indian life. The stately mansions of these cities give no clue to the actual economic conditions which prevail in the country-side. The cultured and well-dressed gentleman of Delhi or Allahabad is a phenomenon unknown in rural India. The well-appointed roads and gardens of Amritsar and Lucknow find no parallel in villages. The palatial public buildings in large towns are mere symbols of self-complacent human vanity which refuses to see beyond its nose. The real India is ill-fed, ill-clad and ill-looked after. It lives in miserable huts. It is served by very few good roads, schools and hospitals are few and far between, and ordinary amenities of civilised life are practically non-existent in rural India.

Bureaucracy's Stewardship.

6. The Indian bureaucracy generally claims to be the sole trustee of the masses. But it has not a very good account to give of its stewardship. The urban intelligentsia is frequently twitted by bureaucrats for its neglect of care of rural masses. The charge against the urban intelligentsia may not be incorrect substantially, but what about the charge against the bureaucracy itself? Has the bureaucracy, which receives handsome salaries for an efficient and equitable discharge of its duties, done justice to the claims of rural India? The reply is an emphatic negative. The bureaucracy has listened only to the clamorous townsman and patted and hugged him in entire oblivion of the fact that the real India, i.e., rural India, is being neglected and starved in the interest of only 10 per cent. of the general population. It is true that since the inception of the Reforms popular ministers, particularly in the Punjab, have turned their attention to rural interests, but the beginning that has been made is all too moderate and, unless vigorously and consistently followed, cannot yield any very substantial and permanent results.

Separate Communal Representation.

7. One of the most important problems which has excited a great deal of heat and controversy, and which the Statutory Commission will have to decide, is the question of separate communal representation. In general, the attitude of the National Unionists towards this question may be summarised as follows: If the communities principally concerned are able to reach an amicable settlement on the main points of their difference and decide in favour of joint electorates, our party will welcome such a decision. But if these communities fail to arrive at a mutually acceptable settlement separate communal electorates will be absolutely necessary as a safeguard of the rights of minority or backward communities. It has sometimes been stated that, under the present system, the members selected are more likely to have a communal outlook and are under no particular obligation to respect the susceptibilities of the communities to which they do not belong, and that if they were to be elected by a joint electorate they would have to bear in mind the sentiments of all the sections of their voters equally. The necessity of appearing before the bar of a joint electorate at each successive election will, it is asserted, be an effective remedy for the development of any marked communal bias in individual members. But while all this may sound plausible the other side of the picture cannot be ignored. The existence of communal feeling is a stern reality and while this feeling exists in any appreciable degree elections will run on communal lines even if the electorates are joint. This being so, the communities which are better educated and have a more powerful Press will sweep the election booths. That this danger is no mere illusion but an undeniable and actual reality is borne out by the election results of district boards and those municipal committees where electorates are joint. Nominations to redress communal inequalities which result from joint elections are no remedies. Voters are entitled to have representatives of their own choice, and this privilege of voters should not be lightly disturbed by having resort to nomination. Another serious disadvantage of joint electorates under existing conditions will be increased communal bitterness as a result of election campaigns. At present the contest is between candidates of the same community and there is no occasion for appeal to common passions. Under a system of joint electorates candidates from various communities will find themselves arrayed against each other and the whole countryside will be convulsed from end to end by appeals to the worst communal passions for months together. This will mean a very serious extension of the scope and area of communal bitterness. At present there are only occasional outbursts of communal feeling in the Council Chamber or the Press on the part of persons more or less educated. Communal contests during elections will directly affect vast areas at a time and this will draw into their vortex the most ignorant and easily excitable elements of the population.

The general situation having been briefly surveyed, a few specific questions may now be taken up.

The Representative System as Applied to British India.

8. (a) The Basis of the Franchise.—The present basis of the franchise is very narrow. The vast bulk of the population goes unrepresented while the representatives of a microscopic minority are supposed to voice the true feelings and sentiments and safeguard the interests of India as a whole. The basis of the franchise requires to be widened very substantially and to be so adjusted as to give to rural India a representation commensurate with its stake and importance. The Assembly, as at present constituted, is a packed body, entirely dominated by urban elements. While ninety per cent. of the Indian population resides in rural areas the number of the members of rural extraction in the Assembly will be found to be in inverse proportion to the rural population. The burden of taxation also falls mainly on the rural population while the disposal of the proceeds of taxation rests with the urban people. The supreme obligation of citizenship, namely, the finding of men in the time of war is also practically exclusively discharged by the rual population, but their voice in the chief legislative body of the country is very feeble. To remove this defect it is essential that the franchise should be materially liberalised in favour of the rural population. This can be done by lowering the land revenue qualification to a greater relative degree than property qualification in towns. A further device is to enfranchise all members of village panchayats, all office bearers of co-operative credit societies in rural areas and all holders of His Majesty's and the Viceroy's commissions among retired military officers. In the case of landowners the franchise should be lowered to people who pay Rs. 10 as land revenue annually. All rural tenants who occupy land paying Rs. 25 as land revenue annually should also get the franchise. [The man occupying such land will himself be actually paying only Rs. 12-8 per annum, the other half being paid by the landlord.] In urban constituencies the rent qualification should be lowered from Rs. 96 to Rs. 72 annual rent and similarly the ownership franchise should be lowered from persons now owning property worth Rs. 4,000 to Rs. 2,000. Separate urban and rural constituencies should continue, and all towns with population of 5,000 or above to be included in the urban constituencies. The number of non-official members of the council should be increased to 125. This will decrease the size of constituencies and thereby create a closer touch between the member and his constituents. Nomination of non-official members should be altogether done away with.

(b) Methods of Elections.—Election by a direct vote as now should continue, but a certain proportion of the members of the Assembly should be returned by the members of provincial councils.

(c) Methods whereby Particular Interests may obtain Adequate Representation.—In the absence of a clear understanding reached and approved by the communities concerned separate communal electorates must continue.

The representation of special interests, such as industries, commerce, universities, landholders, labour and depressed classes through the creation of special constituencies is not desirable. These interests are sufficiently represented by members returned by general constituencies. The scope of special representation should be confined within as narrow limits as possible. The creation of special constituencies is a stumbling block to the growth of nationalism. But wherever it is found essential to give representation to any special interest the representation should be secured through election and not nomination.

(d) The Relationship between Representatives and Constituents.—This relationship, in the case of the members of the Assembly, is, generally speaking, very intangible. The constituencies are so large in area that it is not practicable for a representative to maintain any real touch with his constituents. But in the case of provincial councils the relationship between representatives and their constituents is real. The area of the constituencies, though large, is not altogether unmanageable in the case of most constituencies. During an election campaign the candidate has (where the contest is keen) to make a series of rounds of visits, and has to address public meetings, and distribute posters and other literature to show why he should receive the confidence of the constituency. Where, however, the rival candidates are uneducated the election campaign consists of various parties of their supporters going about in the constituency. After the election is over the touch between the representatives and their constituents is maintained. The constituents know that they have a claim on the attention and help of their representatives, and, not unoften, assert their claim by bringing forward their grievances to their representatives and asking them to take steps for redress. There is, on the whole, a real and living touch between the representatives and their constituents unless the representative hails from outside the constituency.

(e) Nomination of Officials and non-Officials.—Representative institutions lose their real value and significance if their decisions are influenced by officials and their proteges. The nomination of officials and non-officials as additional members of elected bodies only serves the purpose of emasculating those bodies, and, if it is intended to give full life and vigour to elected bodies the nominated element should be entirely eliminated.

The Provincial Government.

9. (a) Working of Dyarchy.—Dyarchy is a difficult system to work. Government should be one organic whole, imbued with the same ideals and sentiments, having a common policy, a common responsibility and a common allegiance. Under dyarchy the case is entirely different. The organic whole of Government has been cut up into two, the Reserved half and the Transferred half. The Reserved section is responsible to the Governor-General in Council and the Secretary of State for India. The Transferred section is responsible to the Governor as well as the Council, and has thus a dual allegiance. The ideals and sentiments of a popular and responsible Government cannot be expected to be the same as those of bureaucratic and irresponsible Government, and, therefore, an element of friction between the Reserved and Transferred sections is inherent in the system of dyarchy. The Ministers, being responsible to the Council, are supposed to carry out the policy that appeals to the popular house, but being also responsible to the Governor, and holding office during his pleasure, they are also expected so to frame their policy as not to come into direct and open conflict with the views of the Governor. Thus, the Ministers find themselves in an awkward position, and, in their attempt to reconcile the claims of their conflicting allegiance, are compelled to steer a middle course which may, according to the temper of the times, please both sides or displease both sides.

Difficult and delicate as the task of the Ministers is, given mutual goodwill and co-operation on either side, and given a reasonable council willing to recognise the difficulties of the situation, the system of dyarchy can be made to yield good results. But it must be conceded that these good results are not due to the merits of the system, but flow, in an attenuated degree, in spite of its defects, from the constant exercise of tact, forbearance and patience and from a determined will to work a difficult system.

Dyarchy in the Punjab has worked better than in any other Province of India, and the progress made by departments under the control of Ministers is very remarkable and gratifying. But this result is due to a rare combination of circumstances. The two Governors who have held the chief executive charge of the Province during the post-Reform period have been exceptionally far-sighted men, who seem to have decided to follow a policy and a programme which will be of direct and obvious benefit to the people. The majority of members of the council are drawn from landholding and rural classes, and are more practical, more level-headed and less noisy and less sentimental than their urban brethren. There has been a greater readiness on the part of the Governor and his Ministers to appreciate and recognise the difficulties of dyarchy, and to minimise and overcome these difficulties by exhibiting greater mutual sympathy and co-operation than have fallen to the lot of other provinces.

But the rare combination of favourable circumstances referred to in the preceding paragraph cannot be expected to occur in every province or at all times even in the Punjab. Therefore, a system like dyarchy —which is inherently defective—should be abandoned and full provincial autonomy should be introduced in its place.

(b) Position and Powers of Governor.—The position of the Governor under the Government of India Act is supreme, and his powers are very wide. He is, to all intents and purposes, a perfect autocrat. He is not responsible to the legislature, and his responsibility to the Governor-General in Council is merely nominal. He can disallow any question or any resolution. He can veto any Bill passed by his council. He can certify any expenditure disallowed by the council, and can certify any legislation rejected by the council. No private Bill can be introduced except with his consent. He can direct any Minister and dismiss him when he wills. He can direct any action to be taken by his Ministers or Executive Councillors. He is the sole arbiter in matters in which there is a difference of opinion between the Finance Department and a member of his Cabinet. He is also the final authority in matters in which the head of a department or a secretary differs from his Minister or Executive Councillor. There is no statutory obligation that the position of the Governor should be that of a constitutional head and not that of an autocratic ruler.

(c) The Position of Ministers in relation to the Governor is virtually that of complete dependence and subordination. In the absence of any statutory provision in this behalf the Governor is free to appoint whomsoever he likes as his Minister, and can maintain him in office with the help of the official and nominated non-official block in the council. Further, the Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the Governor. Whenever the Ministers differ with the Finance Department, their secretaries or heads of departments and commissioners serving under them the last word rests with the Governor. All these factors make the position of a Minister in relation to the Governor one of complete subordination.

The position of Ministers in relation to members of the Executive Council is, in theory, one of equality. But as members of the Executive Council are appointed under a Royal Warrant and are not removable by the Governor, they are generally considered to hold a more honourable and better-respected position.

(d) Relationship of Ministers to each other, and Question of Collective Responsibility.—The principle of collective responsibility has not been formally recognised in any province. The practice in Madras seems to have been in consonance with this principle. The formation of the present Ministry in the Central Provinces also appears to have proceeded on the same principle. The second Ministry of the Punjab was based on the same principle. But, speaking generally, the principle of joint responsibility has not been followed.

Each Minister is in charge of separate groups of departments, and is not required to act in consultation with his brother Minister. He is free to act independently, and follows his own policy and programme without reference to the remaining Ministers. Individual members of the Ministry need not have common views, and may even have diametrically opposite views on important questions and vital principles. The present Punjab Ministry is a case in point. One of the three Ministers belongs to no party. Another represents the Hindu-Sabha Party in the council and the third represents the National Unionist Party. These two parties hold entirely different views, and there is hardly any question of importance on which they can see eye to eye with each other. In fact, a glance at the proceedings of the Punjab Legislative Council will convince the most casual reader that the debates of this council are one unending record of the conflict of views held by these two parties. On all questions of vital importance, political or economic, the two parties hold views which are nearly irreconcilable. The Punjab Land Alienation Act, Pre-emption Act, and the Moneylenders Bill have all been the subjects of the keenest and most bitter controversy between these parties. The distribution of the burden of taxation, the distribution of patronage, the methods of recruitment to public services, the question of communal or class representation on self-governing bodies or in public services, the distribution of the beneficent activities of Government have, whenever they have formed the subject of debate in the Council in any connection, invariably found the two parties arrayed on different sides. In fact, these two parties are the nearest approach (in the Punjab) to capital and labour in the West.

That the ministers should have a collective responsibility is obviously just and essential. They should act together and should stand or fall together. They should have common views on all important matters, and should follow a common policy and programme, drawn up in consultation with one another and approved by their party. They should all be drawn from the same party and owe a common allegiance. One minister drawing his support from, and owing allegiance to, one party and another minister drawn from, and owing allegiance to, another party is a travesty of representative government.

(e) Growth of party system in the Provincial Councils.—How far party system has sprung up in other provinces is difficult to say. In the Punjab a genuine beginning of a party system was made when the second ministry was formed. There were three groups in the Council: (a) the Nationalist Group, consisting of most of the Sikh members and Khilafatists; (b) the Hindu Sabha Group, consisting of Hindus of urban extraction and urban sympathies, and (c) the National Unionists Group, consisting of men of rural extraction and rural sympathies, irrespective of caste and creed. The National Unionists Party was the strongest in numbers and included men of all faiths, Hindu, Muslim, Sikh and Christian. The outstanding feature of their policy was the advocacy of the rights of backward classes and areas.

Both the ministers were drawn from this party and acted in harmony and in consultation with each other.

The arrangement worked well and efficiently, but gave deep offence to the urban section of the population which, having grown accustomed to a monopoly of all power in the past, suddenly found that power slipping from their hands. This was more than they could tolerate, and being in possession of practically the whole provincial press they set up a tremendous howl and continued their loud wail until one of themselves was appointed a member of the present heterogeneous ministry. Government yielded to the clamour of the urban press, and, in order to silence a vociferous section of the population, appointed a minister, a gentleman who has the active support of only 17 out of a total of 71 elected members. This could only be possible in a constitution which does not insist on ministerial joint responsibility. This leads to formation of ministries where ministers cannot depend on receiving support from the friends of each other in various parties who are always free to oppose any item standing in the name of a minister other than the one belonging to their own party. Surely no ministry could be weaker than the one formed on these bases.

Party system is an essential concomitant of representative government, and if it is intended to introduce representative government in this country Government should do everything in its power to encourage the growth of a party system.

(f) Classification into Reserved and Transferred Subjects.—Subjects entrusted to the care of ministers are designated as transferred subjects while the rest are known as reserved subjects. To divide the field of government into two water-tight compartments is wrong in principle. All the departments administered by a local government are so bound up with each other and the administration of one department reacts on that of another so closely that the classification into transferred and reserved subjects is highly artificial and even mischievous. Another defect of this classification is that almost all the earning departments are under the control of Executive Councillors and most of the purely spending departments have fallen to the share of ministers.

(g) Desirability of Second Chambers.—Second Chambers are not at all desirable. They will prove a reactionary institution and will always be viewed with suspicion and distrust. They will also be expensive. In view of the power of veto possessed by the Governor no Second Chambers are needed. Moreover, in the Punjab Council most of the members come from landholding classs and these classes are conservative by instinct.

(h) Question of Provincial Autonomy.—Provincial autonomy should be granted to all the major provinces. Indian ministers have administered their departments with tact, patience and judgment. Efficiency has not suffered, and more progress has been made in transferred subjects that in other subjects. The pace of progress in the post-reform period has been quicker than in the pre-reform period. Where the departments of Finance and Law and Order have been made over to Indians they have been administered with equal success and efficiency. The experience of the last eight or nine years fully justifies grant of provincial autonomy. Whenever an attempt has been made to work the Reforms the Councils have shown commendable sense of responsibility and restraint. The experiment has been particularly successful in the Punjab.

We regret we cannot agree to the principles underlying the Nehru Committee's report. In that report the future constitution contemplates entire centralisation of all power. This is negation of provincial autonomy. The civil and criminal laws should be provincial subjects, otherwise the Assembly may tomorrow pass an Act abolishing the Land Alienation Act, because in the Assembly the agriculturists will possess a very poor strength and voice. The subjects on which the Central Government can legislate should be specified and the residuary powers should vest in the provincial legislatures.

(i) Finances of Provincial Government and Financial Control.—The remission of provincial contributions has considerably eased the situation. But the measure of control exercised by the Central Government and the Secretary of State is very stringent. The powers of borrowing in the open market and the powers of imposing new taxes are unduly limited. New projects estimated to cost more than a certain amount cannot be undertaken except with the previous sanction of the Central Government or the Secretary of State. The restrictions should be removed or materially relaxed.

(j) Financial relations between Reserved and Transferred Sides of the Government, including the question of the joint or separate purse.—There is a feeling that reserved departments are treated more leniently and liberally than transferred departments. Possibly the scrutiny to which new proposals of expenditure emanating from reserved departments are subjected is less stringent. Possibly these departments are treated by Government as peculiarly their own, and proposals from these departments are less liable to delay on the part of Finance Department. But in the Punjab no serious difficulty has been experienced by transferred departments in this connection, and the Punjab will prefer a joint purse.

The Position of the Services.

10. There is a distinct feeling that all services are being pampered, particularly All-India services. The emoluments allowed to the members of the Indian Civil Service and other All-India services have been pitched too high for a poor country like India.

The measure of control which can be exercised over the services in general is too meagre to ensure good discipline. A minister or a member cannot even censure a member of an Imperial or a Provincial service without the concurrence of the Governor. It may be contended that members of the Executive Council, being in the same position, ministers have no just cause for complaint. But it is no consolation to the ministers to find the members of the Executive Council in the same position of helplessness. When public servants know that they have nothing to fear from a minister under whom they serve, the question of maintaining discipline becomes very delicate, and it is a wonder that the ministers have achieved a fair measure of success under very adverse circumstances.

(b) The Question of Recruitment and of Public Services Commission.—The question of recruitment should be left entirely to local governments. The Central Government may have a Public Service Commission if it feels that it requires one. Provincial governments should be left to frame their own rules and to devise their own methods of recruitment.

(c) Indianisation.—Indianisation should proceed at a quicker pace than it has done in the past. Indians know their countrymen better, they understand their language and appreciate their difficulties far better than Europeans. They are in a better position to get at the truth than Europeans. They are also more easily accessible. Over and all this Indians will be a cheaper agency.

But Indianisation should not mean the dominance of one class. At present the benefit of Indianisation in the Punjab goes mostly to the urban Hindus. Indianisation should be so adjusted and regulated that all classes will receive adequate representation in the public services of their country commensurate with their numbers and importance.

LAHORE.

Dated 6th November, 1928.

AFTERNOON—continued.

Deputation from the Punjab National Unionists Party.

The Deputation consisted of:—

1. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram, M.L.C. (Member of the Punjab Provincial Committee).

2. Sheik Faiz Muhammad, M.L.C.

3. Chaudhri Duli Chand, M.L.C.

54. Chairman: I was going to suggest that in view of the fact that the party for which you are going to speak is a party which claims to be formed not on a strictly communal basis, but includes people from the three communities, we should try, in this part of the inquiry, as far as possible not to go over the communal dispute. It is quite relevant to ascertain to what extent a particular community is represented in the party, but I hope very much we will be able to avoid raising afresh from different angles the communal issue. Would you like to address us or would you like some questions being put to you?—(Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram) : I will just say a few words in the beginning and then questions may be put to me. You have remarked just now that the deputation which is now before you represents a party which is entirely non-communal. I base the claim of my party to be non-communal on the following grounds. There is absolutely nothing in the principles, programme or policy of this party which prevents anybody from joining the party on the ground of his creed or caste. The ranks of this party are open to everybody who subscribed to certain well-defined views. Secondly, the composition of our party will show that all the communities are represented in it. Of course, the majority now happen to be Muslims, but that is a mere accident, and there is absolutely nothing in our principles which will prevent non-Muslims from becoming a majority in our party. There are some Muslim members of the Council who do not belong to our party. They are as many as five or six. There are five Hindus who belong to our party, and there is one Sikh who belongs to our party. This is in respect of the third Council, that is, the present Council. In the last Council, i.e., the second Council, there were four Hindus, thirty Mahomedans, one Sikh, one Indian Christian, and one European belonging to our party.

Apart from this, there are some among us who do not belong to agricultural tribes, i.e., statutory agricultural tribes, as, for instance, Dr. Sir Mohammad Iqbal, and Shaik-Faiz Mohammad, who are sitting to my right at present.

Another ground on which I claim a non-communal character for my party is that this party lent its support consistently to a purely non-communal Ministry in 1926 throughout. The last ground which I should suggest for claiming a non-communal character for this party is that the programme of the party is to advance the interests of backward classes and backward areas wherever they exist.

55. Chairman: Might I interrupt you, because I would like, as far as may be, to have evidence directly on matters one has in mind, if it is not inconvenient to you. May I ask you two questions? First of all, is it possible for a man to be a member of your party and also at the same time to be a member of any of the other organised parties in the Council?—So far as Council parties are concerned, if he is a member of our party he cannot be a member of any other party.

56. The other question is this. Have you noticed —I have no doubt that you have—that in the Government Blue Book on page — there is a paragraph on the subject of the Punjab National Unionist Party running over about half a page? I think it may save a little time if I were to ask you whether you regard that to be an accurate account, so far as it goes, of the party?—I think it is fairly correct.

57. I thought you would say so. We have all read this, and I thought it would save you perhaps from having to give a description of the objects of the party or of its political history. Now, what are the points you wish to make?—The main points to which we should like to draw the attention of the Commission are the following: That the Province should be granted complete autonomy, i.e., full responsible government, that residuary powers should rest with the provincial Government, that the official bloc, at least as a voting factor, should be removed.

Chairman: If I may say so, the first and the third of your points, to my way of thinking, at any rate at this stage, are far more important than the second. There are a great many people in this country who attach enormous importance to this question of residuary powers. Allow me to point out that if a Constitution is perfectly and completely drafted there is no need to provide for residuary powers; if you can draw up a Constitution which allocated every subject either to the Central or to the Provinces, and you are sure that you have not left out any, then there is no need for residuary powers. In my humble judgment, rather too much importance, is attached to the residuary powers. The reason why in most federations a provision is made as to residuary powers—in some cases leaving them to the centre and in some cases leaving them to the circumference—is because it is difficult to make a list of everything; and not only that but new subjects may afterwards turn up. But it is not really, if you will allow me to suggest, a fundamental question at the stage when you are considering the principles of the Constitution. It is a point that arises later on when you are trying to express your ideas in actual concrete form.

Witness: The reason why I wanted to stress the point was only this, that no element of uncertainty should be left about it. If there are any residuary powers they should rest with the Provincial Government.

Chairman: I quite follow that, and we know that it is adopted in the system of some, though by no means in all, federations.

Witness: Another point to which I should like to draw the attention of the Commission is that nomination of members to the council should, as far as practicable, be eliminated; there may be cases in which it may not be found to be practicable. The third point to which I would draw your attention is the subject of joint responsibility. The Ministers should have a collective responsibility to the House and not individual responsibility to their various parties, as has been the practice so far.

Another very important consideration from the point of view of the Punjab Province is that the distribution of subjects between the Central Government and the Provincial Government should be such as to enable the Provincial Government to redistribute the present burden of taxation in a manner which will afford reasonable relief to the landowning classes, which have to bear the brunt of taxation under the present system.

58. Chairman: I have not been able to follow. Are you calling attention to something in the existing constitution or are you emphasising the principle which you think ought in the future to be secured? Do you mean that this is a thing you want to be provided for in the constitution of the future?—Yes.

Raja Narendra Nath: That means there should be greater freedom of taxation by Provincial Governments.

59. Chairman: I understood him to say that he thought it was an important object for those who are interested in the future structure of the Indian Constitution to bear in mind that the Provincial Legislature should have such powers in financial matters as would enable them to adjust the burden and to prevent it falling too heavily, for example, on rural interests. Is that so?—Yes, Sir. Then I would also like to draw your attention to the principles under which land revenue is assessed at present. It does not take into account the ability to pay and whatever may be the extent of one's holding one has to pay a certain amount every six months to Government. If possible, there should be some provision in the constitution which would allow the Provincial Government to assess land revenue on the same principles as are applied to the assessment of income tax.

60. Do you really suggest that that ought to be in the constitution?—One of the difficulties so far has been that the Government of India would not allow the Provincial Government, even if the Provincial Government wished, to alter the present basis of taxation in respect of land revenue, and my point is that the Provincial Government should be allowed a free hand to change the basis of the assessment of land revenue if and when the Provincial Government found it practicable.

61. May I just ask you one question, though it is only, I think, incidentally relevant? I understand that your view is that in the future the Punjab Legislative Council should no doubt contain predominantly rural members and should be exclusively or almost exclusively elected, and that the Ministers should be responsible to the House. Then you add that there ought to be power in the council—I suppose you would wish the power to go to the length of refusing to increase land assessment and insisting on the land assessment being reduced or exemptions or abatements being granted. Do you think that in a council where the members are predominantly rural—and no doubt they may very properly represent the feelings of their constituents—do you think that it is likely that such a council would support the exaction of land revenue or would it be encouraging constant remissions?—If the past conduct of the rural majority or agricultural majority in the present council is any guide to its conduct in the future, I think the majority in the future councils will behave just as reasonably as it has done in the past.

62. You do not think it would make any material difference if the person who is responsible for the land revenue, instead of being a member of the Executive Council who is irremovable, was a Minister returned by a constituency and belonging to a party and directly responsible to the House?—No, it will not make any difference. Even under present circumstances, when the Ministry is not in possession of full powers, a suggestion was made by our party that the land revenue basis should be changed and brought into line with the basis of income tax in the course of the next forty years, and I expect that, if full responsibility were granted, it would in itself have a great sobering and restraining influence.

Another thing to which I would refer is that nothing should be inserted in the constitution which would make such economic measures as the Land Alienation Act ultra vires of the council or any other measures of economic importance which may be necessary in future to protect any section of the population, whether rural, urban, agricultural or non-agricultural. With regard to franchise, I should like that the franchise should be very considerably lowered. Now, payment of land revenue to the extent of Rs. 25 a year would enable a man to have a vote. I should like this to be reduced to Rs. 10 a year. In a general way I may state that the present franchise qualifications for rural areas should stand, except in respect of land revenue and immovable house property qualifications, and the franchise should also be extended to tenants who occupy land which will be assessible to land revenue of Rs. 10.

63. Chairman: If I follow you rightly, whether the land assessed at Rs. 10 is giving a vote to an owner or a vote to a tenant, in both cases you would fix at the same level?—Yes.

64. Lord Burnham: I should like to ask you a question with regard to the answer you have just given as to the land revenue being assimilated to income tax. Whether you mean by that that in future the land revenue should be a tax on the profits of agriculture?—Yes.

65. Raja Narendra Nath: You said that the local Government should have power to adjust taxation?—Yes.

66. Removing taxation of one kind under one head and imposing taxation on another head?—Yes.

67. That means that the powers of taxation of the local Government should be wider than they are at present?—Yes.

68. To what extent would you remove the control of the Central Government altogether, or would you give any power of control to the Central Government?—In respect of the subjects which are provincial I would not allow any control to the Central Government.

69. In the case of land revenue, if land revenue were made a provincial subject—you yourself advocate that it should be made a provincial subject—would you allow any powers of control to the Central Government?—No.

73. Now, the question is this. Except with regard to the subject of the Land Alienation Act, is there anything to which any citizen can object in that programme?—I think reasonable people should not object, but the world has not an excess of reasonable people.

74. All the members of the council would subscribe to your creed if you were to strike out that controversial matter?—I wonder whether all the members of the council would subscribe to the view that the basis of taxation in respect of land revenue should be changed.

75. Chairman: Which Article is that? I do not see that in your Constitution?—There must be some reference to a just distribution of the burden of taxation.

76. "Placing the burden of taxation, as far as possible, in an equitable and fair manner." Everybody will say that they want to do that. The trouble is they do not agree as to what it is?—Perhaps it is expressed in general terms. But the object is plain. The present distribution is not just.

77. Raja Narendra Nath: The real matter that divides the party in the council in the matter of your programme is about the Land Alienation Act and nothing else?—I will not admit that.

78. Communal goodwill, franchise, services, labour and capital—anybody will admit that?—You won't agree with me on the question of a due share being reserved for members of the agricultural tribes in the various branches of the public service.

79. All that hangs on the Land Alienation Act?—No.

80. That is the central pivot on which the programme of your party hangs. That is what I wanted to impress on the Conference. Of course, the matter has been cleared up to a certain extent by the questions of the Chairman. You object to the present ministry as not having been formed on proper lines? Quite.

81. Because all the members of the Cabinet do not belong to your party, which is the party constituting the majority?—That is not the ground of complaint. The precise ground of complaint is that they do not all belong to the same party or to the same group of various parties with a common programme, with a common policy and common views.

82. The second ministry on which you have put your seal of approval consisted of the members of your party?—Yes, it did.

83. And that you think ought to continue for ever?—Well, if our party continues to be in the majority that is the consequence which ought to follow.

84. You say in one place that, in fact, there are two parties and that these two parties are the closest approach in the Punjab to capital and labour in the West. Which party represents labour and which capital?—The urban party in the Punjab Council represents more or less capital and the National Unionist Party represents more or less labour.

85. And under the Land Alienation Act the agricultural labourer who is not a member of an agricultural tribe is permanently debarred from being a member of the agricultural tribe?—No, agricultural labourers often belong to agricultural tribes.

86. Is there any group in the agricultural tribes notification which contains a large number of agricultural labourers?—Well, all are labourers. Peasant proprietors are labourers. They work with their own hands.

87. I am referring to those men who do not depend upon their earnings from land. You do not call them labourers. They are landowners. They are owners of property.. Labourers and landless labourers who depend for their living upon their daily wages?—No, I don't agree.

88. That is not your definition?—No. I mean that actual workers, even if they own land, are labourers.

89. Barristers, clerks and subordinate judges who belong to agricultural tribes?—Certainly not, I never said that.

90. Well, then, how do you define Labour? I have not quite understood the definition although I believe the Conference has realised what you are aiming at. But the agricultural labourer, the landless labourer is excluded from the benefits of the Land Alienation Act?—In many cases, not.

91. In the majority of cases?—No.

92. You say on page 151 that "In that (Nehru) Report the future Constitution contemplates entire centralisation of all power. This is negation of provincial autonomy. The civil and criminal laws should be provincial subjects, otherwise the Assembly may to-morrow pass an Act abolishing the Land Alienation Act because in the Assembly the agriculturists will possess a very poor strength and voice." I believe you have read Section 65 of the Government of India Act?—Well, I have not got these things by heart.

93. Section 65 of the Government of India Act gives wide powers of legislation to the Legislative Assembly?—Perhaps it does.

94. And in spite of that the Land Alienation Act has been allowed to remain intact. The Assembly has not nullified it or repealed it?—I hope the Legislative Assembly will continue to retain that reasonable attitude.

95. There is sufficient guarantee even at present. What further guarantee do you want? The Legislative Assembly does not interfere with matters which are purely provincial, and the Land Alienation Act is a measure which is purely provincial?—If I have been able to form a correct estimate from what you have said in your Memorandum and from the evidence that was led by your party yesterday, you would like to have a right under the Constitution to have the Land Alienation Act repealed or declared ultra vires?

Raja Narendra Nath: No, I want more. This right already exists.

Chairman: Well, I think the answer is not an unfair one. Is it? Let us see whether we have got the position right with the help of Raja Narendra Nath. The view put forward by his party yesterday and by himself in his Memorandum* is this, that he wants to see enacted in the statutory structure of the future Constitution of British India a clause which says that no provincial legislature can validly pass any law which provides for differential treatment in the matter of property, of which the Land Alienation Act is said to be an example. I think that is the point.

96. Dr. Narang: Chaudhri Sahib, you are a member of the Committee and I have to treat you with all possible deference. With respect to the constitution of your party you say that there are five Hindus. May I know how many of them are elected?—Four are elected and one nominated.

97. Even at present?—Yes.

98. Are there any Hindu members of your party who do not belong to the notified agricultural tribes?—No.

99. And there are some who are members of notified agricultural tribes, and they are not members of your party?—Yes, that is so.

100. Notably a member from Rohtak?—Exactly.

Now I come to the questions in the order you have mentioned, Chaudhri Sahib, with respect to the Central and Provincial Governments—the question of really residuary powers as the Chairman has pointed out—the question whether you would like the Punjab or any other province to be so independent, with the exception of some specified subjects, that the Central Government should have absolutely no right of guidance, control and direction over the Provincial Governments. This is the real crux of the whole matter?—In matters which react on the sphere of the Central Government or on the sphere of other Provincial Governments I won't mind interference by the Central Government, but in all other matters I should like the Provincial Government to be independent.

106. In other words, am I right in inferring that you would like to give to the province more autonomy than the Feudatory States, or as they are called, Native States, enjoy. For instance, than the Maharajas of Patiala, Bikaner, Hyderabad and so on enjoy?—I am afraid it is difficult for me to form a correct estimate of the measure of autonomy enjoyed by these States.

107. Dr. Narang: Now, Chaudhri Sahib, as regards the transfer of subjects to local Governments, won't you like to keep some power of control in the hands of the Central Government in case of maladministration, misrule, breach of the spirit of the Constitution, tyranny exercised by the most powerful group, for instance, in the Council or by the Ministry that knows that it has the support of the largest section of the Council at its back? Would you like to leave some such power with the Central Government or not?—The Governor is there to dissolve the Council if the Council is found to behave unreasonably.

108. Chairman: The Governor should dissolve the Council?—Yes.

* See pp. 163-190.

109. I do not think that really quite faces, if I may say so, the difficulties. May I quote an instance. Take this class of case which, unfortunately, as we know, happens from time to time in this province. There have been very sudden and serious outbreaks which meant the breach of the peace, and, it may be, created a very dangerous situation. Somebody has got to deal with that. I understand that your view is that we have reached the time when there ought to be a transfer of law and order along with everything else to a Ministry. I quite follow that. Now it is always possible, if not in this province—you must imagine the possibility, you know—that the thing is not, unfortunately, very well handled. It may be badly handled by any Government. We must assume the possibility. It is even conceivable that it may be necessary to call in the military. Now, is the military, in your view, to be under the Central Government or under the Provincial Government?—Under the Central Government obviously.

Chairman: Then it seems to me there is a difficulty if you make the province too absolutely self-contained, because that would mean that the provincial Minister, or the Provincial Ministry rather, would invite the assistance at a time of crisis of the military, although, as you just told me, your view is that the military is to be under the Central Government. That is the sort of difficulty, I think, Dr. Narang, if I may say so, it is absolutely no use at all to deal with these complicated subjects by merely general phrases. We have got to think how the thing is going to be best arranged with the strains of life and temper and passion. That is the only sort of Constitution building that is worth doing.

110. Dr. Narang: After the remarks which you have heard from the learned Chairman, would you like to modify your views?—Not in respect of the subjects which have been allotted to Provincial Governments, or which have not been specifically allotted to the Central Government. If there is any widespread disorder, the Provincial Government must of necessity request the Central Government to lend them the military, because the military forces have been placed under the Central Government. And when opportunity arises for the use of those forces, it is for the Central Government to come out with those forces. It necessarily follows from the distribution of subjects between the Governments—Central and Provincial.

111. Do you mean that even the Viceroy's power of vetoing a local Bill should be abolished?—Certainly.

112. You think that the Governor's power of veto is quite a sufficient safeguard?—Yes.

113. I find from a Memorandum* which has been sent to the Commission by your colleague Rao Bahadur Chaudhri Lal Chand (I am referring to it because in the preface he says his views could be very well presented by his friend Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram) he says, in the course of his Memorandum, that there should be joint electorates with reservation of seats. Do you agree with that view?—As we have stated in our Memorandum, if there is a substantial measure of agreement between the communities concerned, our party would welcome it. If there is no such agreement, then separate electorates have to be maintained.

114. Then you do not agree with Chaudhri Lal Chand?—No, I do not.

115. May I just put to you one question? Do not you think that now in the Punjab we have gone far beyond the purely communal question, and we have come to questions of sectional preference, caste preference, and territorial preference? Have we not come to that?—No.

116. I would explain to you what I mean by sectional preference. For instance, it is not now a question of, say, Hindus versus Mahomedans, but it is a question of the rural section of the Hindus versus the urban section of the Hindus. Is that not correct?—In certain very vital matters agricultural Hindus have interests which are distinctly different from, and in some cases even opposed to, the interests of urban Hindus.

117. So there is this further cleavage also?—Yes.

118. Then I said there is the caste cleavage. You must be familiar with a number of questions put in the council, such as, how many Jats, and how many Rajputs are there in such and such an office, and so on. Is that not a fact?—Yes.

119. Then about the territorial cleavage. Questions are asked as to how many persons belonging to such and such districts are on the cadre of sub-judges, or police inspectors, or in the co-operative department, and so on?—Yes, such questions are asked.

120. I will just ask you one question whether these further cleavages are not the result of the original main cleavage, viz., the communal cleavage?—No.

121. They are independent of that?—Yes.

122. I shall just ask another question which I consider to be a very important one. For instance, you say at page 151 of your Memorandum, under the head (c) "The National Unionist Group, consisting of men of rural extraction and rural sympathies, irrespective of caste and creed. The National Unionist Party was the strongest in numbers, and included men of all faiths." That is one thing. It is correct, is it not?—Yes.

123. And then what you have put down at page 151 is also correct—"The debates of this Council are one unending record of the conflict of views held by these two parties"?—Yes.

124. Now, keeping these two facts in view, viz., that the Unionist Party is the most numerous, and it is best organised, and there is really a crowd of cleavages, if I may so put it, in the council, and there is discord at various points between the various parties—keeping these two facts in view and the further demand that you have made that the Ministry should be joint and should have collective responsibility, and that it should be responsible to the council, does it not mean then that the Ministry, if it is made responsible, would be responsible to the Unionist Party?—In your question you have made so many assumptions that I find it rather difficult to answer. You say there are innumerable cleavages. I do not admit it. If you put your question more clearly, point by point, I shall be in a position to answer.

125. Chairman: I see what the question is exactly. If you are going to have a Ministry which is responsible to the majority, and the party you represent is the majority, does not that mean that the Ministry will be from your party and nobody else?—Yes, that is true.

126. Dr. Narang: Then you ask that all the subjects should be transferred, do you not?—Yes.

127. Then, thirdly, you ask that the Central Government should have absolutely no control over subjects which have been transferred to the Provincial Governments?—Yes.

128. Now, keeping all these facts in view, and also the fact that you also want the power of taxation and of adaptation of taxes and readjustment of taxes, what safeguards do you provide for those who do not belong to your party?—Safeguards against what?

129. Safeguards against the majority tyranny?—So far as I can form a judgment, the majority will not tyrannise over the minorities, and if it seeks to do so I think the conscience of the people will revolt against it, and that majority will not be returned to the council next time, as happened in Madras.

* * * * * * * * * * *

130. Dr. Narang: This great movement in which you are also taking a part (and your Memorandum shows that you are taking a very keen interest in it) is a movement for self-government in India?—Yes.

131. And you want the power to administer your own affairs, do you not?—Yes.

132. Is it due to the tyranny of those people who are in charge of it now, or is it in consonance with the natural principles of justice and self-determination that you are asking for these rights?

* Not printed.

Chairman: Even so rhetorical a question as that, I suppose, is intended to be answered. What is the answer?—(Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram): I have not followed exactly the significance of the question.

133. Dr. Narang: You say your party will not tyrannise?—Yes.

134. And therefore no safeguards are necessary?—Yes.

135. Then why do you want power?—What power?

136. Why do the Indians want power? Why do the Punjabis want power? It is going on all right. You can depend upon the conscience and the sense of duty of the people who have the power now?—But the analogy does not hold good.

Dr. Narang: He did not really give an answer to my question, what safeguards are provided. The answer is, no safeguards are necessary because we are very good people.

137. You say you are very solicitous for this, that there should be no provision in the Constitution which might interfere with such legislation as the Land Alienation Act. You said that, if I followed you?—Yes.

138. Because, you said, it was an economic measure?—Yes.

139. Can any measure be called economic the application of which depends upon caste, and to the exigencies of which no one by his own free will can adjust himself? I can become a Mahomedan if I like, I can become a Christian if I like, but I cannot become a member of an agricultural tribe?—No, because your tribe does not, as a class, follow the profession of agriculture.

140. Then do you call it an economic measure?—Yes, it is an economic measure, because it seeks to safeguard the interests of those sections of the population which are, as a class, economically very backward, educationally very backward, are ignorant, in debt, and cannot really look after their interests themselves without the help of some such measure.

141. I have only one more question. At page 149 you say about the question being settled by amicable arrangement, and so on, "but if these communities fail to arrive at a mutually acceptable settlement, communal electorates will be absolutely necessary as a safeguard of the rights of minority or backward communities." That is what you say?

Chairman: What is the question?

142. Dr. Narang: The question is, would you include the Hindus in your definition of "minority" as used here, or not?—Yes; why not?

143. And the Sikhs also?—Yes.

Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: On page 149 of your Memorandum you say: "In the case of landowners the franchise should be lowered to people who pay Rs. 10 as land revenue annually"?—Yes.

144. And you say, "All rural tenants who occupy land paying Rs. 25 as land revenue annually should also get the franchise"? I want to be quite clear that your view is definite that this should be lowered to Rs. 10?

Chairman: He said Rs. 10 in each case.

145. Chaudhri Zafrullah Khan: A little lower down on page 4 you say: "The number of non-official members of the (legislative) council should be increased to 125." Have you any particular objection if it is larger than 125?—No. As a matter of fact I should like it to be larger, say about 150.

146. Then in the summary given by you before the cross-examination started, you put down certain things which you wanted?—Yes.

147. With regard to the paragraph beginning "The representation of special interests," do you want any special constituencies to continue?—No.

148. Of course, you know that in recent years there has been an enhancement of taxation in the form of land revenue and rural taxation, and so on. Did your party, as the rural party, give support to these enhancements or did they oppose it in the legislative council?—Our party lent its support to the proposals for enhancements.

149. You have suggested that there should be power in the Provinces to readjust taxation so as to grant relief to landed interests. Would you be opposed to such power being given to the Provincial Council to grant relief to any section of the people whenever such relief became necessary, or only to landed interests?—Certainly not; I have no objection if the Government possesses the same powers in order to give relief to other sections of the population if they happen to be overtaxed.

150. With regard to agricultural labourers, certain questions were put to you. Is it not a fact that the vast majority of these labourers belong to the notified agricultural tribes themselves, but in the course of time their holdings have either been lost altogether or reduced to such an extent that they cannot make a living out of agriculture themselves?—Exactly.

151. And consequently those people are still members of agricultural tribes?—Yes.

152. A suggestion has been made in one of the memoranda received here—and no doubt you have gone through that also—that the Central Government should have power to suspend the Constitution of any Province which behaves unfairly. What is your view with regard to such a power being in the Central Legislature?—I would object to it strongly.

153. The Chairman of the Commission has very clearly defined the various forms that might be adopted with regard to the distribution of subjects between the central and provincial governments, and you have generally given your view with regard to the residuary powers; but I should like to put to you this question: In any distribution of powers between the Central Government and the Provincial Government, could you tell the Commission generally, without naming any specific subjects, what class of subjects you would like to be reserved for the Central Government, and what class of subjects to be allotted to the Provincial Governments?—Class of subjects without specifying any of them?

154. I do not want you to name all the list of subjects, but what class of subjects would you leave to the Central Government?—The Army, Navy, Foreign Relations, Relations with Indian States, Customs, Railways, Posts and Telegraphs, and other matters which should naturally fall within the scope of the Central Government.

155. All-India subjects?—Yes.

156. And with regard to taxation—perhaps the residuary powers may not be important anywhere else—what would be your policy? Would you not prefer that certain taxes be allotted to the Central Government, and the residuary power of taxation with regard to all other subjects to remain with the provinces?—Yes.

157. And in case the Central Government was in need of larger funds than were supplied by the taxation allotted to them, how would you make up that deficiency?—By levying contributions from provinces more or less on the basis of their population.

158. With regard to the question of the transfer of law and order, is it not a fact that the Army is a Central subject at present?—Yes.

159. Is it not a fact that law and order is a provincial subject?—Yes.

160. Do you think there has been any difficulty in dealing with many difficult situations that have arisen in the Punjab owing to the fact that law and order are provincial and the Army is central?—No difficulty has been experienced so far.

161. Now with regard to your party's majority. Are you sure that in all provincial legislatures henceforth your party is bound to be in the majority?—Certainly not.

162. Is there not, apart from the National Reform Party and the National Unionist Party, a sort of cross-bench composed of what I might call Nationalist members, including Hindus, Mahomedans and Sikhs?

—Yes, and there are more than half a dozen members of agricultural tribes who do not belong to our party.

163. Is there anything to prevent the growth of that bench so that they might form a majority in the Council?—None.

164. Is there anything to prevent members from your party, say urban Mohamedan members, finding that their interests are identical with the National Reform Party or the Nationalist Party joining them? —There is nothing to prevent them joining any other parties.

165. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Chaudhri Sahib, you have suggested that land revenue should be assessed on the same principle as income tax, and possibly that means also that land revenue assessment has to be made annually; but there is a further demand on behalf of the zamindars that the period of assessment should be enlarged to be 40 years, and sometimes a demand for a permanent setlement. How do you reconcile that demand with the annual assessment, if it is brought on the basis of income tax?—I am putting this forward as an ideal towards which we should work, so that in the course of time land revenue should be brought on the same basis as income tax.

166. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I have very few questions. You have said that so far as the Central Government is concerned, it should not interfere at all with the good or bad government of the autonomous provinces, but nevertheless it should provide armed forces to quell any disturbances in the provinces?—Yes.

167. That is your position?—Yes.

168. The Central Government, though it has no controlling voice and no power of ensuring good government in the provinces, still remains liable for the purpose of quelling any internal rebellion that may occur in the provinces?—Yes.

169. You recognise that conflicts with the principle of constitutional law, that he who is responsible for quelling a rebellion is equally responsible for seeing that good government is carried out, so that there may be no cause for rebellion?

Chairman: That may be a maxim of good government, but it is certainly not properly described as a principle of constitutional law.

170. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Is it a principle of good government? I will put it in that way.—The duty of keeping the peace in general and preventing any rebellion, or suppressing it when it occurs, has been definitely assigned to the Central Government, whose business it should be to suppress any rebellion.

171. It is to be the bludgeon of the provinces and no more? Is that your position?—Yes. In this particular respect.

172. You say the Land Alienation Act has been placed permanently on the Statute Book?—Yes.

173. Do you not foresee the possibility in the remote future of the time arriving when the agricultural tribes who have been protected under this Act will no longer require any protection?—Yes, quite.

174. In that case you would give the province which has enacted the Act, power to repeal it?—I would give that right to the provincial Government.

175. But you said it should be made part of the Constitution, and the provincial Government should not have the right to interfere?—I meant the Central Government; it may have been a slip of the tongue on my part. The Central Government should not have the right to interfere.

176. But the Act is an Act of the Central Government; it can be repealed only by the Central Government. One question about assessment. You said that land revenue should be assessed on the profits; that is to say, on the basis of income tax, on the profits which a man makes?—Yes.

177. Would not that make all assessed land in reality freehold? That is to say, any ordinary non-agriculturist man pays income tax on his profits, and an agriculturist will equally pay tax on his profits, so that he will pay nothing at all for the holding of the land?—Why should he pay?

178. I do not wish to argue that; the fact is he will not?—He will not.

179. The position would then be that all holdings here would be freeholds?—I am not quite sure as to the exact significance of "freehold."

180. Freehold means free of rent, of revenue and everything else; it will be freehold, that is the position?—Yes.

181. Your party therefore stands for the establishment of the principle of free holdings throughout the Punjab?—Yes.

182. It comes to that?—Yes.

183. You have said that the Central Government should have no power whatever to suspend the local Acts. If the Central Government has to go to war with a foreign power to defend the provinces and to defend its own existence, and money is required, and the provincial contribution is not paid, how is the Central Government to carry on?—I am suggesting that, if need arose, the provinces ought to be called on to contribute.

184. But where is the sanction behind it?—In the constitution.

185. No; you said just now it would be a voluntary payment by the provinces. You have said the Central Government has got no directing power in the provinces?—No, no.

186. It is to have no such power of superintendence, direction and control, such as it possesses now over the Provincial Governments?—I stated that, if need arose, then the Provincial Governments should be called on to pay their quota.

187. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Yes, they may be called on, but suppose they refuse to pay?

Chairman: I do not think that is what he meant. We are dealing only with a sketch; he does not profess to produce a complete scheme. I think we understand his sketch. I think his idea was, on this particular point, that the constitution should contain a provision that in certain events (which would have to be carefully defined) then, as part of the whole structure, the provinces would not have the privilege of contributing if they liked, but would be compelled to contribute.

188. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: I want to be very definite on one point. Do you or do not you want the Central Government to be strong enough to control affairs in the provinces if need be?—Let it be strong enough to manage its own affairs, and let the Provincial Governments be strong enough to manage theirs.

189. Suppose there is anything on which the opinion in the provinces differs in regard to administration, who would adjust matters?—The provinces.

190. The provinces cannot?—Why?

191. Even in the United States of America there is a Central Government to regulate the administration in the States.—In respect of matters which are outside its scope, do you mean? Has the central authority in the United States of America the right to interfere in matters which have not specifically been allotted to it?

192. I am taking into consideration the situation of different communities all over India. I am not here taking a communal view at all, but suppose there is anything which hurts any particular community, and any community feels hurt or aggrieved, what action can the Central Government take to protect it?—Why should the Central Government take any action?

193. Which is the Government which should take it? —The Governor.

194. If you transfer law and order, the Governor will not have charge. You have said in your statement you would like law and order to be transferred? —Yes.

195. You would like to have unitary government?—Yes.

196. And there would be no reserved subjects at all. Under those conditions the Governor cannot interfere? —I have never stated that the Governor should from to-morrow be divested of his powers of veto or interference.

197. You think the Central Government should only be strong enough to manage its own affairs?—Yes.

198. If any situation arises you will not mind what happens?—I assume that the Provincial Government and the Governor will deal with it.

199. You have stated that at present your National Unionist Party is the strongest in the House?—Yes.

200. And it is likely to remain so as long as the present constitution, or the future one which you have proposed, subsists?—No. I never made any such statement.

201. If members are drawn from the rural areas (and most of them will come from the rural areas), and your party is mostly composed of members from rural areas, that follows?—Only those members who share our views join our party. Even now there are some rural members who do not share our views and do not join us.

202. There may be one or two?—There are more.

203. The majority from rural areas belong to your party?—Quite a number do not belong to it.

Lord Burnham: He has stated that.

204. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: That is what I want to confirm now. It follows that, since your party will remain in power, the Ministry will be formed out of that party. Do not you think so?—So long as it commands a majority there is no reason why it should not.

205. It follows also the Ministry will be assured of continuity?—So long as it continues to have a majority it certainly will.

206. Will that Ministry, when it is assured of continuity, become rather despotic in its behaviour?—I do not assume it will continue to command a majority for an indefinite length of time. If the party makes wrong use of its power it will probably be reduced to a minority at the next election and thus thrown out of office.

207. If you have a majority on your side it will not?—Not if the majority continues, no.

208. Do not you think that here intrigues have sometimes been started in the Ministry which the public have resented?—I am not aware of any intrigues.

209. You are not aware of them?—No.

210. You are not aware of the comments in the Press either?—It happens very frequently that comments in the Press are groundless.

211. Not always. Is it your party's intention to defend the Land Alienation Act. Is that part of their faith?—Yes, that is one of our chief planks at present.

212. You will fight for it through thick and thin?—Yes, so long as present conditions last.

213. You advocate a readjustment of taxation as between rural and urban areas?—Yes.

214. You want that because you think the rural classes are unfairly taxed?—Yes.

215. Can you tell me the incidence of taxation in rural areas?—I could not say that.

216. You cannot speak either as to its incidence in urban areas?—No.

217. There is one thing you can tell me in any case. Life in urban areas is become very expensive?—Yes, and in rural areas also.

218. That counterbalances the levying of taxation?—The agricultural classes do not get enough to eat or to maintain their families, and if they could afford it they also would like to raise their standard of life. My point is that the bulk of the provincial revenues comes out of the pockets of the agricultural classes, while the commercial classes pay precious little.

219. It is the business of everybody to defend the rural classes under those conditions?—Yes.

220. Sir Arthur Froom: I shall be very brief, but I want to make reference to one point in your Memorandum to which I think reference has not hitherto been made, so that it is striking altogether fresh ground. I refer to the question of finance. You say on page 152, under paragraph (i), Finances of Provincial Government and financial control, "The powers of borrowing in the open market and the powers of imposing new taxes are unduly limited." Would you tell the Conference what you mean by "the open market"? Do you mean in the Punjab, in India, in London or all over the world?—The provincial governments cannot resort to borrowing without the sanction of the Central Government.

221. I do not think you quite understand my question. You complain you cannot borrow in the open market. What do you mean by "the open market"?—We should not be obliged to borrow only from the Central Government or not to float our own loans.

222. You still have not got my question. I will put it in this way. What are your ideas of an open market?—Let us say the whole of India.

223. You mean India?—Yes.

224. And possibly going to foreign markets too? That would be the open market, would not it?—Not necessarily for provincial purposes.

Lord Burnham: The "open market" must mean the money markets of the world.

Sir Arthur Froom: I do not think that is what he understands by it.

225. Let us confine ourselves to the money market of India. Can you tell us, supposing the Punjab and Bengal and Bombay all wished to borrow at the same time, the interest you would have to give for your money would be very much larger on account of the competition?—We are unduly restricted.

226. You said that the restrictions should be removed or materially relaxed?—Yes.

227. Would you like to have the power of borrowing in the open market except through the Government of India?—There should be some sort of an understanding between the Central Government and the provincial governments.

228. You appreciate that if every provincial government came into the market at the same time, up would go the price? That is ordinary business?—Yes.

229. You propose that law and order should be a transferred subject?—Yes.

230. At the same time, you recognise that an occasion might arise when the minister wants the help of the military?—Yes.

231. The military is under the Government of India, whose executive officer is the Commander-in-Chief?—Yes.

232. Supposing you had a riot, and it got out of the control of the police, and you applied to the military, it might take a week to get military assistance in the way you suggest, and in the meantime there might be great bloodshed and loss of property?—It does not take long now.

233. Of course not, because it is a reserved subject. It is all the difference in the world?—It should not make any difference.

234. You do not suggest that the General at Lahore, for instance, should be empowered by the Government of India to place the military at the disposal of a minister responsible to the local council whenever the minister asks for it?—If it has been possible so far for the Central Government to place its military resources, when needed, at the disposal of a Member of the Executive Council who is not responsible to the legislature, there is no reason why the same should not be possible under altered circumstances, when the minister in charge of law and order happens to be responsible to the legislature.

Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: May I say that the present practice is that even the district magistrate, when he wants the help of the military, can go and ask for it, and they have to supply that help.

Sir Arthur Froom: That is so, with law and order a reserved subject.

235. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: Do you think there is any probability, or I would go further and say any possibility, of there being a communal cabinet in the Punjab Council, even if all the communities were returned on a population basis?—No.

Chairman: Thank you very much for having given so much assistance and so much of your time.

LAHORE.

Dated 9th November, 1928.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND), AND OF THE PUNJAB PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Lala HARKISHEN LAL, First Minister of Agriculture, Punjab.

1. Chairman: We are very much obliged to you, Mr. Harkishen Lal. We know, of course, that you were the first Minister of Agriculture in this Province?—Yes, Sir.

2. I should just like to put a question to you quite bluntly and boldly, and it is this. What would be your view as to the working of dyarchy, the successful or unsuccessful working of dyarchy in the Province of the Punjab?—Well, sir, there was no dyarchy. There was in some cases "quadrarchy"—four people working separately—and in some cases a unitary government.

3. Did you say "quadrarchy"?—"Quadrarchy." There were four parts of the Government; not two.

4. Well, you won't expect me to adopt that word! And then there was sometimes unitary Government?—Yes.

5. You are putting it very epigrammatically, Mr. Harkishen Lal.—That is the only way to sum up the situation.

6. Whether you regard it as four-footed, or whether you regard it as a single thing, I think the interesting question is, do you consider it worked?—It worked, I should say, to a very large extent.

7. I will put a leading question, which is a very bad thing to do as a rule. Do you think the influence and help which the Governor gave in this Province was of assistance to making it work?—I think, sir, the Governor's attitude was very helpful; and so was the attitude of the people who had to work with him.

8. We were very glad to be told in the evidence we have had that there has not been in this Province, as there has been in some, a constant succession of votes of censure on Ministers?—No, sir. One was tried but failed.

9. Is it legitimate to ask you, Mr. Harkishen Lal, in very plain terms what you recommend should be done now?—To put it very briefly, my view is this: His Majesty the King in 1921 (His Message delivered at Delhi) said that he would like to see India very soon on a footing of full responsible government; and it was also said in the despatches that the present concession, the Act of 1919, was a substantial instalment. Well, so far as the provinces are concerned, I think, sir, the second instalment ought to be paid and the debt cleared. The whole thing should be liquidated. So far as the Government of India is concerned, if I am allowed to say, I should fix up two instalments there, one now and one later.

10. Now it comes to this then, that your view is—you are speaking, of course, from great experience of the Province—that the time has come to take a step forward in this Province, which, you think, should go to the full length of provincial autonomy?—Quite so, sir, and also the provincial autonomy should be defined. It should not be power in the hands of the Governor entirely. That would also be autonomy; but the power should be in the hands of the Ministers or the people.

11. Lord Burnham: Would you be in favour of extending the powers of the Governor in regard to veto supposing autonomy were granted?—Well, sir, no; because the autonomy would mean the joint responsibility of the Ministers, and I would not, excepting in very, very exceptional cases, give power to the Governor to override the Cabinet.

12. Mr. Cadogan: Would you indicate what those exceptional powers would be? To what extent would you give the Governor overriding power?—In times of trouble and turmoil I would give him exceptional powers.

13. Disorder?—Yes. And sometimes when a war is on the Government of India may have really to dictate terms. In things of that kind, i.e., in very exceptional cases.

14. Colonel Lane-Fox: You said you would like to see full provincial autonomy?—Yes.

15. That, of course, means that you would like to see law and order transferred to a responsible Minister?—Yes.

16. Have you ever considered—several witnesses have suggested it—whether if law and order was in the hands of a responsible Minister, and there was a very strong majority of one community it might not interfere with the administration?—I do not think that can be possible, because the Minister will not be dealing with the matter directly. He might be dealing with the matter as a matter of appeal, but he will not be dealing with the matter as it arises.

17. But he will be dealing with the administration of the police?—He would be dealing with the administration of the police, but I do not see that even now the Governor or a member in charge of "Police" can dictate anything to the police in the early stages of an enquiry or investigation of any trouble. He will deal with it by way of appeal, no doubt. There may be influence exercised in some cases in what is called a left-hand manner, but I do not know how, openly, there would be any influence exercised. In many cases that came up when I was a Minister, and we were told by the member in charge that he could not intervene because the matter was in the hands of the subordinate magistrates and police.

18. Then you are not afraid of the administration being interfered with?—No.

19. Dr. Narang: You have said all this on the assumption that all these wrangles about communalism would disappear?—Are there any wrangles every day?

20. That is not the point. I mean the distinction; the distinction, for instance, in electorates and the reservation of seats on various bodies and all these things, and taking communal views.—Is there any trouble now?

21. Captain Sikandar Hayat Khan: Are you in favour of extension of franchise?—Yes.

22. Would you give vote to the tenants also?—Yes.

23. You are not in favour of adult franchise?—I am, but for the sake of management I would go down by degrees because the whole population cannot be managed in a day; I would have a property qualification, and would gradually reduce it.

24. You will gradually work up to adult franchise?—Yes.

25. Would you like to see a provision in the constitution that it should be done after every election, that the extension of franchise should be made after every election?—If sufficient time is fixed it may automatically extend; but if sufficient time is not fixed, as the Indian Parliament or the provincial councils see fit.

26. Sardar Ujjal Singh: Are you in favour of keeping separate communal electorates or are you in favour of joint electorates?—I will have joint electorates.

27. With regard to full provincial autonomy, would you keep the control of the Central Government over the provinces to some extent if all the subjects are transferred?—That will have to be worked out in detail, because now the control of the Government of India in some cases is not healthy; for example, in the matter of tramways. It is not an easy thing to say straight off what control the Government of India should have and what not. I do not know whether you are aware that there was a great deal of trouble with the Government of India over the question of tramways, and eventually the Government of India turned us down. We had some trouble with the Government of India over the question of excise legislation. Therefore, I cannot say offhand, but I would reduce it to a minimum.

28. What I meant to say was this. Now the provision is that you have got to get the previous sanction of the Government of India before introducing legislation. Would you like to do away with that or would you like to retain the power of veto over provincial legislation? Now you pass a Bill and then it requires the sanction of the Governor of the province, and then it goes to the Governor-General? —It depends on what class of legislation it is, I have not worked out the details. This is a matter of detail. There are so many laws and so many matters which are now with the Government of India and would always remain with the Government of India. When the list is put before me whether I would like to have the veto of the Government of India is another matter. I cannot at present say in matters of detail whether I would keep the veto or not.

29. Supposing communal electorates are kept alive in the Councils, would you like them to be extended to local self-government or would you confine them to the local legislature only, supposing they are thrust upon you?—I used these words before the Muddiman Committee, that "I will not kick at it." I use the same words again.

30. You would confine them to the local legislature only and not extend it?—No. I would reduce it even there.

31. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Did you pull well with your colleagues?—Yes. I was dining with one of them only three nights ago.

32. Raja Narendra Nath: And even with Secretaries?—With Secretaries also, except with one head of a department.

Chairman: Need we go into that? What particular constitutional point do you wish to raise on this subject?

33. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: I was simply asking him whether he pulled well with his colleagues.—There was absolutely no friction. But we had on certain subjects differences of opinion.

Chairman: Most people have. We have in this Conference.

34. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Mr. Harkishen Lal, you said you would do away with communal elections. What are your reasons for that?—One reason, and the chief reason which I have mentioned before in some documents is that responsible government and communal elections or communal members are what is called negative of one another. There would be no responsible government based on political views if the people are divided and the members in the Council are divided on religious or communal basis.

35. That of course is your theoretical ground?—That is a practical ground.

36. Did you put this theoretical objection to test during your Ministry? You had communal electorates and you had representatives of various communities in your Council. Did you find that because they were returned by the communities they placed the interests of the communities in the forefront before the general interests of the public at large?—Not in all matters. It depended on how a matter affected them.

37. Were they influenced by communal considerations?—Sometimes they were.

38. Do you think they possessed the confidence of the whole House?—You mean the Ministers?

39. I am talking of the members.—Members had the confidence of the whole House.

40. To the same extent as they would have possessed if they had been returned by general electorates?—I do not understand.

41. My point is this. You are against communal electorates; and I am helping you to give an answer. One of your answers is a theoretical answer, and the next question that I put to you was whether the fact that they are a priori bad elections were in view of the fact that you were practically all working in a council formed on communal basis. Did you find that communal electorates produced men who had better not have been in the council at all?—Some. Not all. One could not say what proportion.

42. You would like to have general electorates. Would you give reservation of seats?—No.

43. You will leave the minorities alone?—I do not know of the minorities. The minorities have been created. There are no natural minorities. Minorities have been created on the basis of religion and economic ideas. From the political point of view there are no majorities and no minorities.

44. For instance, there are people who are not so politically minded as the rest of the community. I will give you the depressed classes as an example. You have got 22 lakhs of depressed classes in the Punjab. They have no representation at all, nor are they likely to have?—Why?

45. Because they are depressed classes scattered all over the province?—It depends on votes. If they get votes then they will have representation.

46. Would you give them special help so that they could come up?—To come up to what?

47. To secure votes?—I have said that I am for adult suffrage. That includes the depressed classes.

48. You are for adult universal franchise?—Yes.

49. Both male and female?—Quite.

50. If you give adult universal franchise do you think that you will get a better class of men into your council than you get at present. A more intellectual class who will carry on the work of government much better than they are able to do at present, or at least as efficiently as they are doing at present? —I think there would be the same standard. I do not think the standard will be lowered. I do not know whether a higher standard exists in the country. I thought we got the best men into the Councils already.

51. You think that that standard will be maintained if there is adult suffrage?—I think so.

52. Do you not think that the intellectual people, the busy people, like yourself, will find it much more irksome to get returned to the Council because the constituencies would be such populous constituencies? —That would depend on how many members are being returned.

53. Would you increase the strength of the Council? —Yes.

54. To what extent?—At least to 200.

55. Sir Arthur Froom: Amongst your other activities, Mr. Harkishen Lal, might this Conference regard you as a great financial expert?—If they please.

56. I will put it the other way. You are a big banker?—I do not say I am a big banker, but I am a banker.

57. For that reason I attach great weight to the answer which I hope you will give to my question. Would you regard that the Finance Department of the Government of the Punjab under provincial autonomy should be entirely separated from the Central Government?—The department is already separate. The functions in some cases are not well defined, but otherwise it is.

58. Finance is reserved?—The subject is reserved, no doubt, as between the members and ministers; but not in relation to the Government of India.

59. May I put a direct question. Would you visualise the Province of the Punjab or the Punjab Government in the future or the government of any other province being allowed to bring out loans without any consent from the Central Government?—My own view is that generally in ordinary cases the province should be allowed the borrowing power. But there may be cases of stringency or of famine or war and so on, in which cases the Government of India might very well be consulted or may have control.

60. At present no province can raise a loan without the consent of the Government of India?—Yes; at present they cannot.

61. My point is this. Supposing there was entire freedom in this respect you might have all the provinces in India bringing out loans at the same time. and the price of money might go up?—They would be very foolish to do so. In banking we find every day that the Imperial Bank tries to beat us. We are really trying to escape them. We do not go together into the same field. Where they lend money at 6 per cent. we cannot afford to lend at 6 per cent. We take our precautions and they take their precautions. I do believe that the Finance Department or the Finance Administration will not be wise enough to visualise the times and the resources of the country. Otherwise I do not think that will be a good department. I have no fear that they will cut each other's throats.

62. But, after all, perhaps the question of a loan for a province is bigger finance than your competition with the Imperial Bank. Each province will want money and possibly by means of loans—it is the usual system of financing governments. Now I cannot help thinking that without some central control or advice there may be a race to get into the field first?—That is what I say. Some one no doubt will get in first and everyone else will have to wait. That is what is done in the London market where there is no central control. Are not the people there keeping back schemes for years because the other men have got ahead? Do they not study and adjust much better and larger finance than India as a whole or a province will have? In the London market, so far as I know—and I know it from inside also—there are schemes, and very good schemes sometimes, but the men are not really active enough or vigilant enough to push them. They have to wait when other people come along. That will happen here also. No one has suggested that there should be central control over the London market or over the New York market. They are working all right.

63. I cannot quite agree that the two are exactly alike. At any rate your answer is that you have no fear that without some sort of central advice of control a province will have to pay more for its loans—a larger interest than is the case at present? Even one per cent. means a lot of money to a province?—The rate of interest when a province takes a loan will depend on the security—on the income and resources of the province. You have to see the other side also. At present the Government of India cannot very well render equitable service to all the provinces. That is one thing. And the other thing is that the Government of India itself requires money and its requirements have preference generally because they have the power in their hands.

64. I will just put one more question to further elucidate my point. At the present time any loans the Punjab brings out are backed by the Government of India. Are they not?—You mean that the Government of India has to give the sanction?

65. No; the security of the Government of India. Your provincial borrowings are arranged by the Government of India?—It includes the resources of the province.

66. Your provincial loans are raised by the Government of India and have the security of the Government of India behind them. Have they not?—They have.

67. Chairman: I do not think it is correct to say that every loan which is raised by the Provincial Government is necessarily backed by the Government of India. The Provincial Government may raise a loan on the security of its own revenues?—Yes, if allowed by the Government of India.

Chairman: Certainly. I am not speaking of the question whether there must be a sanction for what it does. The question is, sanction being obtained, what is it that is being done. In certain cases the Provincial Government may, and I think has, raised loans on the security of its own revenues.

Sir Arthur Froom: That is to say, if sanctioned by the Government of India.

68. Chairman: I thought you used the word "backed." That would mean, I suppose, that the Government of India's resources are pledged to repay the loan. All I am saying is that there are cases in which a Provincial Government may raise a loan without the Government of India pledging its own resources?—Yes; it has been done so in the Punjab.

69. Lord Burnham: As a matter of fact, are there not two cases in which the Government of the Punjab did raise loans on its own account?—Yes.

70. Chairman: I understand there are only one or two such cases. I must say I feel some difficulty in this matter as I think Sir Arthur Froom also does. Might I put what is a purely hypothetical case? You know in London each department of State is not permitted to go into the London money market and raise money for itself. The Treasury insists upon co-ordinating their demands and the money will be raised through the Treasury?—May I make myself clear? We were not talking of the departments.

71. I was only saying it as an analogy?—I will give an illustration. The local bodies in England do borrow independently of the Treasury and here the Provincial Governments would be the local bodies in that sense, the Government of India being the Treasury. In India also you are aware that the Port Trusts and the municipal corporations in many cases raise loans independently of the Government of India.

72. Do I understand your view to be that, if there are nine or ten provinces in India and also a Central Government, the whole system being federal, you still think that each provincial unit should be perfectly free to raise its money by loan without any co-ordination organised by the Government of India?—Theoretically it is possible, and it ought to be done. But in practice there might be some difficulty. Just as the bankers put their heads together, the provinces might put their heads together under the guidance of the Government of India. Again, there are more than one private bodies. There are Port Trusts, about four or five in number; Improvements Trusts about half a dozen, and municipal corporations about half a dozen. They go into the market from time to time along with the Government of India.

73. Sir Arthur Froom: What I wanted to find out from you is whether, without this co-ordination—which is the word that the Chairman has used, and I would also like to use it—you would not find that you have got to pay more money?—Yes, possibly, more interest has to be paid.

Memorandum on the Rights claimed by Hindu Minority in North-West India, by Raja Narendra Nath, M.A. (Punjab), Member of the Punjab Legislative Council, Ex-President of Hindu Mahasabha (1926), Fellow of the Punjab University, formerly a Statutory Civilian in the Punjab, President, National Reform Party, Punjab Council.†

PREFACE.

For the last 12 years I have been taking a deep interest in the social and political welfare of the Hindus and have been in touch with Hindu thought and feeling in the Punjab and outside. Though the opinions expressed in the following pages have been formed after close contact with the leading Hindus of the Punjab, and correctly represent what I understand to be the view of most of them, yet this Memorandum is being submitted by me in my individual and not in my representative capacity. I am solely responsible for what has been said therein, and for such proposals and suggestions as it contains. The Memorandum will be circulated to all the leading Hindus of the Punjab and to organised associations, and their opinions, when received, will be sent to the Commission.

SECTION I.—THE PROBLEM STATED.*

Lord Birkenhead and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and other public men in England have more than once given assurances that, in any scheme for self-government which may be evolved for India, the interests of minorities will be duly protected. Up to a recent period only one important minority, viz., that of Muslims, has attracted the attention of the publicists in England. The depressed classes have lately begun to receive some consideration. It is, however, not generally recognised that Hindus in North-Western India also form a minority, and an important minority, in a country which derives its name from them. In Bengal, too, the Hindus are in a minority, but presumably they have no grievances as the Hindus of North-West India, and, therefore, have not raised their voice. The case of the Hindus in the Punjab, North-West Frontier Province, and Baluchistan has some peculiar features of its own which must be explained to the Commission. I will deal first with the Punjab.

The Punjab, excluding Native States, has a population of 20,685,025, of which 11,444,321 are Mahomedans, 2,294,207 Sikhs, 6,945,972 Hindus and others, including Jains, Buddhists and Christians. Excluding Christians, who are 329,050, the Hindus form 31.9 per cent. of the population. The Punjab Council consists of 93 members, of whom 71 are elected and 22 nominated. Of the latter, 15 are officials, excluding two Ministers and seven non-officials. The elected members are returned by 64 territorial constituencies. Seven members represent special interests, one is returned by the "University," one by "Industry," one by the "Chamber of Commerce," three by "Landholders" (one Sikh, one Hindu, one Muslim), paying Rs. 500 or more as land revenue, and one by Tumandars of Dera Ghazi Khan, all of whom are Mahomedans. In the territorial constituencies 32 seats are assigned to Mahomedans, 12 to Sikhs, and 20 to Hindus; Mahomedans and Sikhs being returned by separate electorates. Besides this division on the basis of religion there is a division between urban and rural members which, owing to circumstances to be related hereafter, has great importance and significance. There are 51 rural and 13 urban constituencies.

It will thus appear that, out of 64 elected members returned by territorial constituencies, 44, which constitute more than a majority of two-thirds, or nearly 69 per cent., are returned through separate communal electorates. The policy of communal representation through separate electorates has, therefore, a special bearing on the Punjab, and it is necessary to say a few words about it.

Communal representation through separate electorates was introduced in the Punjab in some municipalities before the inauguration of the Reform Scheme of 1921. Whilst Lords Minto and Morley were considering the question of the expansion of councils an address was presented on the 1st of October, 1906, to Lord Minto by Mahomedans, under the leadership of His Highness Sir Aga Khan. The general trend of this address, as also of the reply given by Lord Minto, indicates that special electorates were asked for on the ground that the Muslims formed a minority in most Provinces, and for that reason, unless special electorates were recognised, the Muslim members returned would represent the views, not of Muslims, but of the majority of Hindu electors. I may be excused if I give some extracts from the address presented to, and the reply given by, Lord Minto. The request for communal representation through separate electorates was made in the following words:—

"As for the results of elections, it is most unlikely that the name of any Muslim candidate will ever be submitted for the approval of Government by electoral bodies as now constituted, unless he is in sympathy with the majority in all matters of importance. Nor can we in fairness find fault with the desire of our non-Muslim fellow subjects to take full advantage of their strength, and vote only for members of their own community or for persons who, if not Hindus, are expected to vote with the Hindu majority on whose goodwill they would have to depend for their future re-election."

In Lord Minto's reply the following passage occurs:—

"You point out that in many cases electoral bodies as now constituted cannot be expected to return a Muslim candidate, and, if by chance they did so, it could only be at the sacrifice of such candidate's views to those of a majority opposed to his own community, whom he would in no way represent, and you justly claim that your position should be estimated, not merely on your numerical strength, but in respect to the political importance of your community, and the services it has rendered to the Empire. I am entirely with you."

It is true that the deputation which waited on His Excellency asked for communal representation everywhere in council, in local bodies and in services. But the argument which appealed to Lord Minto was that a minority community, which held a position of importance in the country, needed separate representation in councils, and that representation in excess of the proportion of its number.

In the Minto-Morley scheme of reforms there was no direct election. The principle of the responsibility of the Executive to the Legislature was not introduced. The question whether a community, which is not in minority, can justly claim separate electorates, did not arise. It is, however, noteworthy that in the Punjab, where Muslims form a majority in the population, they were not given separate communal seats. In Bengal, where also Muslims form a majority in the population, out of 27 elected seats the Muslims were given five, for which separate communal electorates were introduced.

These facts indicate how the announcement made by Lord Minto was interpreted immediately after it was made, or the policy inaugurated by him was worked soon after it was introduced. Separate electorates were recognised only in the case of a limited number of seats forming a small minority quite disproportionate to the numerical strength of the community in the population. Bengal, where Muslims are in a majority in the population, was no exception to this general rule.

* Parts of this section of the Memorandum are verbatim copy of a paper which I read under the auspices of the Tilak School of Politics on 16th May, 1926.

† The Appendices to the Memorandum have not been printed.

Casting a glance outside India, I find that communal representation through separate electorates existed in the Province of Moravia, in Austria, and in Cyprus (para. 228 of the Report on Constitutional Reforms by Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford, also Lord Morley's speech in the House of Lords delivered on the 23rd February, 1909). Although the present Government in Cyprus was introduced under circumstances of a peculiar nature, yet it is significant that here also Muslims, who have separate electorates, are in a minority, being 61,422 out of a total population of 310,709.*

In Austria, as far as I am aware, separate electorates were recognised for Germans only in one out of several Provinces which constituted Austria before the war, viz., Moravia. In this Province the figures as to the population in 1890 were as follows:—

German, 29.4 per cent.

Slavs of the various sub-divisions of the Czech race, 70.03 per cent.

Balance, Slavs of other races.†

Separate electorates, as far as I am aware, have seldom if ever been thought of for a community which is in a majority in the population or which is in absolute or relative majority in a representative body. Anyhow, for reasons to be stated in the sequel, they cannot be continued in spite of the protest of a minority community. In 1916 the Muslim League and the Congress met together, and entered into a compact, under which proportions were fixed for Muslim representation through separate electorates on the Legislative Councils in every Province, including the Punjab. The pact took no account of the Sikhs. The Southborough Committee, which sat in sections, one dealing with "Franchise" and "cognate" questions and the other with "Functions," proposed communal representation, through separate electorates, for Sikhs, in accordance with their demand. The result now is that more than two-thirds of the members of the Provincial Council are elected through separate communal electorates.

The Report on the constitutional reforms knows as Montford Scheme describes communal representation as "opposed to the teaching of history, perpetuating undesirable class divisions." But the Congress League Pact which recognised communal representation through separate electorates for every Province could not be ignored. This method of election could not therefore be withheld from Sikhs in view of their demand. I doubt very much if the British Government would have introduced communal representation through separate electorates for the Punjab Council is case of Muslims, or would have recognised it in the case of Sikhs, if the pact alluded to above had not been arrived at. The mutual agreement of the parties concerned was the main, if not the sole, factor in determining the decision of the Government.

Apart from the consideration that communal representation retards the process of nationalisation, there is the fact that separate electorates deprive those outside the community, which forms the electorate, from a voice in the selection of representatives to whom the fate of all is entrusted. Should any section of the people be deprived of this important right when that section claims to exercise it? In a democractic system of government a minority must submit to a majority. Various devices are employed to safeguard the interests of permanent minorities, specially where parties are formed on a religious basis. Is it then fair to give to the majority community special facilities for the assertion of its communal ascendancy? In course of my evidence as President of the Punjab Hindu Sabha before the Franchise Committee, in 1918, I proposed mixed electorates with the number of seats fixed for different communities. I doubt if mixed electorates were proposed at the time by many witnesses. In view of the idea set afloat by the Congress League Pact, the suggestion was not accepted. But the Hindus of the Punjab have never supported separate electorates, though they have favoured the idea of fixation of seats for different communities. It seems to me highly unfair and inconsistent with the principles on which democratic institutions should be worked, that any person who under the Franchise rules has a right to vote should be compelled to desist from influencing the selection of councillors to whom his fate is entrusted, and the injustice involved becomes marked when the majority of the councillors in a Province are elected in such a way as to exclude a minority from exercising any influence in the election of that majority. It would be otherwise if the minority voluntarily abandoned that right as the Muslims wish to do in provinces where they constitute a majority. But if a minority does not want exclusion it is unfair to force exclusion on it. Such exclusions may be forced on a majority community for it loses nothing thereby, on the contrary it derives strength and is better consolidated on communal lines.

In the Punjab the question is somewhat complicated by the existence of another important minority, viz., that of the Sikhs. The attitude of the Sikhs with regard to separate electorates has undergone a change since the introduction of the Reform Scheme. They are opposed to separate electorates and perhaps even to the fixation of communal proportions in seats. Their demand is, and has been, that if communal representation were a recognised fact in representation for Councils, they as a very important community in the Province should get one-third of the seats, a proportion assigned to Mahomedans in the United Provinces, where they form 14 per cent. of the population. At the sitting of the Sikh League held recently the Sikhs have condemned communal representation in all its phases. But even if the Sikhs wanted separate electorates, it is not just and fair to deprive the Hindus of the Punjab who constitute nearly one-third of the population of the Province from the exercise of an important right on which representative institutions are based.

Separate electorates cannot be continued solely on the request of the majority community whilst a minority community insists upon joint electorates.

The Indian National Congress has condemned separate electorates and has advocated joint electorates all over the country with reservation of seats. It has, however, attached certain conditions, viz., the reconstitution of Provinces on linguistic basis, the separation of Sind from Bombay and its creation as a separate Province and the introduction in the North-Western Frontier Province and Baluchistan of a system of Government at par with other Provinces. My proposal is a much narrower one, whilst supporting the reservation of seats for communities, I leave the question of separate or joint electorates to the option of a community which is in a minority in a Province, or where the question is one of representation to a local body where the community is in a minority in the electorate. The Hindus have up till now favoured joint electorates and I am sure they will adhere to this opinion. My own experience of a separate electorate for a minority community is that it in no way benefits the community. One strong speech, imbued in a communal spirit, from a representative of minority community elicits half-a-dozen strong speeches from the representatives of the majority community, whom separate electorates for themselves or for minority community consolidates still more strongly on a communal basis. The speeches are often appeals to the gallery, and are generally made shortly before a general election. They serve no other purpose. I would not, however, force joint electorates on a minority community which does not realise this defect, or which on account of its small number in the population gets none of the advantages of joint electorate, whilst the majority community has all the practical advantages of separate electorates. The case of Anglo-Indian or the domiciled European community has some special features. Not only is their proportion in the population very small, but their culture and mode of living is radically different from ours. They have very limited opportunities of social intercourse with us, which is not likely to be promoted by the introduction of joint electorates. The case of Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs, and even of Christians, is different in this respect. Up to a very recent time in the history of the country social intercourse between Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs was very free. I have known Hindus who, in spite of restrictions on commensality, counted Muslims amongst their best friends and vice versa.

I should now like to say a few words as to the proportions in which seats are to be assigned to various communities. I see no reason for varying the present proportion in the Punjab, which, so far as the territorial constituencies are concerned, are 50 per cent. Muslims and 50 per cent. non-Muslims. The number assigned to the Hindus is in proportion to their population and cannot be lessened. The Sikhs demand weightage in the proportion in which weightage is given to the Muslim minority in United Provinces. They consider as inadequate the small weightage which is at present allowed them. Their proportion amongst voters is too much in excess of their proportion in population, as the following figures will show:—

General or Territorial Constituencies.

Muslims	305,103
Sikhs	167,899
Hindus and others	223,977
Total ...	696,979

The proportion of Sikhs amongst voters is 24 per cent. against their 12 per cent. in the population.

It is impossible to reduce the slight weightage any further as long as Muslims in Provinces in which they are in a minority get the excessive representation which the Congress League Pact for 1916 secures to them, and as long as the domiciled European community in the Bengal Council gets 18 seats out of 114 (nearly 15 per cent.) the Muslim majority cannot anywhere claim the full benefit of its members. That the Muslims are not in absolute majority in Council, or that amongst the voters their number is smaller than the total number of non-Muslim voters, is no reason for their claiming separate electorates. The question of the maintenance of their present proportion in the Council or its variation is a different one altogether from the question of separate or joint electorates. The excess of non-Muslim voters over Muslim voters or of Muslim population over non-Muslim is so small that the claim for separate electorates cannot be justified. The object of separate electorates is to prevent the voters of one class engulfing the voters of the other class, and thus vitiating the representation of a minority community resulting in the return of members who represent the majority class more than the minority class. The proportion of members of each class in the Council is fixed on considerations in which other factors also enter. In the Punjab the excess of non-Muslim voters is so distributed over the constituencies that the engulfing cannot occur. I cannot foresee what the effect of the extension of the franchise will be on different communities; but should it happen that the number of constituencies in which non-Muslim voters preponderate over Muslim voters exceed the number of constituencies, in which the case is reverse, the allotment of seats to various constituencies can be so made as to equalise the number of constituencies in which Muslim and non-Muslim voters are in majority. Supposing the territorial constituencies remain as they are, 32 Muslims and 32 non-Muslims, and supposing that, out of the non-Muslim constituencies, there are 21 in which non-Muslim voters predominate, and in the Muslim constituencies only 17 in which the Muslim voters predominate, the allotment of two more Muslim seats to the Muslim part of the Province and of two more non-Muslim seats to the same part of the Province will remove the excess. Equitable distribution of this sort cannot be done where the Muslim community is very small in number; for example, in United Provinces, where Muslim population is 14 per cent., or in Central Province, where it is 4 per cent., or in Bihar and Orissa, where it is 10 per cent. The same will be the case with the Hindus of North-West Frontier Province. It is unjust to force joint electorate if the minority is unwilling.

Therefore, separate electorates for Muslims in the Punjab only perpetuate an evil, and cannot be allowed when the non-Muslim minority protests against it. The slight excess of non-Muslim members in the Council over the Muslim members is due to special constituencies. The controversy about joint and separate electorates relates only to territorial or general constituencies, and not to special constituencies. in some of which joint electorates already exist. If special constituencies were abolished there would be no excess; but if they were retained, and even if in each special constituency seats were reserved for Muslims and other communities, the Muslims would gain nothing. In the Tumandar Constituency there is and there can be no non-Muslim voters. In the University, Industry and Chamber of Commerce Constituencies, if the principle of reservation of seats for each community were adopted, the Muslims gain no advantage. Increase in the number of voters of one community or the other is immaterial so long as the proportion of representation for each community is fixed. Therefore, so far as representation in the Council is concerned, the demand of the Hindus of the Punjab is that there should be joint electorates with reservation of seats, and the existing proportions in which the seats have been assigned retained.

The next important question to which I draw the attention of the Commission is whether the scope of communal representation should be widened. Whether the constitution should be so framed as to permit or forbid the extension of this principle, whether the principle which, according to the most reasonable and enlightened men now or before was only to be tentative, should be introduced for recruitment to services and for admission to educational institutions, and to other spheres of administrative activity. The wider the scope given to this principle the more difficult will be its ultimate abolition. Whilst communal representation in representative bodies keeps up communal differences by giving an official approval to them its application to services and other spheres immensely increases communal bitterness. There is nothing in the present constitution clearly forbidding such an extension. In the instrument of instructions to Governors there are passages here and there which forbid the adoption of any policy which would increase racial or communal animosities; for instance, in the very preamble of the instrument the following passage is found:—

"You shall further the purpose of the said Act to the end that the institutions and methods of Government therein provided shall be laid upon the best and surest foundation, that the people of the said Presidency shall acquire such habits of political action and respect for such conventions as will best and soonest fit them for self-government and that our authority and the authority of our Governor-General in Council shall be duly maintained."

Again, in para. (1) we come across the following words:—

"You shall do all that lies in your power to maintain standards of good administration, to encourage religious toleration, co-operation and goodwill among all classes and creeds."

Para. (2) of the instrument may be quoted in extenso:—

"You shall bear in mind that it is necessary and expedient that those now and hereafter to be enfranchised shall appreciate the duties, responsibilities and advantages which spring from the privileges of enfranchisement, that is to say, that those who exercise the power henceforward entrusted to them of returning representatives to the Legislative Council being enabled to perceive the effects of their choice of a representative and that those who are returned to the Council being enabled to perceive the effects of their votes given therein shall come to look for the redress of their grievances and the improvement of their condition to the working of representative institutions."

But in spite of this the Ministers in the Punjab issued orders that future recruitment of services in certain departments should be in the proportion of 40 per cent. Muslims, Hindus and others 40 per cent., Sikhs 20 per cent., and that these proportions should also regulate the admission to Government College and the Medical College. The practice in this respect appears to have varied slightly since it was first introduced. I draw the attention of the Commission to questions and answers given in Appendix I. It will appear that this rule of communal proportion does not apply to all departments, but it has not been rescinded in the case of departments to which it was first applied. It is, however, a matter of every-day occurrence in the Province that, in order to satisfy the rule of communal proportions, first-class men belonging to one community are rejected to make room for the second-class men of other communities. The following question and answer in the Council will illustrate this point:—

Extract from Proceedings of the Council, dated 11th December, 1925.

Question 2,392. Diwan Bahadur Raja Narendra Nath: Will the Government be pleased to state:—

(a) The number of new Assistant Surgeons appointed in 1925;

(b) How many of them were Hindus and how many Mahomedans;

(c) Whether it is a fact that only five appointments were made, of which only one went to a Hindu;

(d) Whether a Hindu who stood first on the pass list was superseded by persons who stood much lower on the list;

(e) Whether the proportion prescribed for admission to the Medical College of students of various communities is still enforced, viz., Mahomedans 40 per cent., Hindus 40 per cent., and Sikhs 20 per cent.

(f) whether in the appointment of Hindus as assistant surgeons this year the same proportion as is fixed for admission of Hindus to the Medical College was not kept up; and

(g) if so, why?

Mr. J. G. Beazley: (a) Five provisional appointments have been made;

(b) one Hindu, four Muslims.

(c) Yes.

(d) It is a fact that the Hindu who was first in the examination was not offered an appointment.

(e) Yes.

(f) and (g) The proportion of Muslims in the Provincial Medical Service being inadequate, it was considered desirable to take steps to increase it.

Diwan Bahadur Raja Narendra Nath: The proportion of appointment of persons other than Mahomedans is less than forty.

Mr. J. G. Beazley: The proportion of appointments in the last year is given in answer to part (b) of the question.

Diwan Bahadur Raja Narendra Nath: It is less than 40 per cent.

Mr. J. G. Beazley: The honourable member is quite capable of making his own calculation.

Needless to say that there has been heart-burning not only amongst the Hindus, but amongst Sikhs also. A policy like this was not one which could infuse "habits of political action and respect for such conventions" as would "best and soonest fit the people of the Province for self-government," or would induce them "to look for the redress of their grievances and the improvement of their condition to the working of the representative institutions." I may here state that Sir Malcolm Hailey, the present Governor, in course of his first speech in the Council in November, 1924, expressed his view on the question of the extension of communal representation to various spheres of administrative activity in the following words:—

"As for its extension to other spheres of public activity, we desire to act on clear proof of its necessity in each case. It is certainly no universal panacea and it should only be applied where there seems clear proof that the benefits will preponderate. We regard it in short as a political expedient, it belongs to the sphere of curative medicine, and our constant endeavour is to promote in the Province the state of health among all members of the body politic which will make such a remedy unnecessary."

The question of communal representation in services was referred by the Indian National Congress to a Sub-Committee consisting of Lala Lajpat Rai and Dr. Ansari. Both reported against it. It is obvious that recruitment on the basis of caste and creed lowers the standard of efficiency, and infuses into public servants who owe their appointment to caste and religious differentiation, a caste and religious bias. That there should be reservation in favour of backward communities or that no single community should be allowed to monopolise the appointments is a question with which I will deal later. But a majority community cannot simply on the ground of its being in the majority claim a certain proportion of appointments to be reserved for it. Such a community should by the force of its numbers get a proper proportion of the loaves and fishes of office. I explain my meaning by an allegory. Supposing there is a tree bearing luscious fruit, and 200 persons, 120 belonging to one class and 80 belonging to another, are trying to pluck the fruits. Then if their capacity for the necessary physical struggle involved is equal, the class constituting a majority has a better chance of getting a larger share of the fruits than the class which is in a minority. If the majority class does not get a larger share of the fruit there is something radically wrong with the class or community which the leaders should try to remove.

It is highly gratifying to find that within the last five years education has made such a rapid advance amongst the Mahomedans that they have gone ahead of the Hindus, so far as the first four primary classes are concerned, though they were much behind them according to the figures of the census of 1921, as the following figures, which I quote from the speech of the Honourable Malik Ferozekhan Noon, delivered on the 28th April, 1928, will show:—

Class.	Hindus.	Muslims.
I	112,000	210,000
II	53,000	84,000
III	31,000	41,000
IV	29,000	34,000

This has been achieved without having recourse to the highly objectionable methods adopted in Sind by practically closing in certain parts the door of primary and secondary education to the Hindus.

There is nothing in the present constitution to forbid the reduction of the proportions assigned to Hindus and others from 40 to 20. The claim that a majority community should be given special facilities for entry into Government service is incompatible with its claim for further accretion of political power, or further restriction of interference by an extraneous authority, in other words for Provincial autonomy, for what is now concession to a backward community will become an irrevocable privilege after Provincial autonomy has been given.

In the matter of recruitment to services also the attitude of the Sikhs is indicated by the following resolution, moved in the Council by Sardar Ujjal Singh, on the 19th of July, 1927. It was supported by all the Sikh members present in the Council:—

Resolution regarding Filling of Posts by Open Competitive Examination.

"This Council recommends to the Government that in future all posts under Government in all departments should be filled by open competition as far as possible; and where this cannot be done, and selection has to be made, the most highly qualified candidates should be selected without regard to caste, creed or colour."

It was pointed out to me by a Mahomedan friend that the distribution of Government posts is not to be looked upon merely as a distribution of so many beneficial posts, but should be looked upon as a distribution of civic power and should be made according to population. The bearing of this argument, when applied in Provinces in which Mahomedans are in a minority, is overlooked. I give below certain figures, extracted from the authorised Government publications, which tell their own tale:—

Name of Province.	Proportion of Muslims in the population.	Proportion of Muslims earning livelihood by State Service, extracts from Table XXI of Census Table 1921.
	Per cent.
U.P.	14	47 per cent. of the total number earning livelihood by State Service.
Behar and Orissa	10	24 per cent. of the total number earning livelihood by State Service.
C.P.	4	21 per cent. of the total number earning livelihood by State Service.

On referring to the Civil List issued on the 1st of October, 1927, for United Provinces and Behar and Orissa, I find figures which confirm the above proportions:—

From the above figures it will appear that, in the case of all the services quoted, the proportion of Muslims is much above their proportion in the population, in most cases even above the weightage allowed by the Congress League Pact for the purpose of representation in the Council. I believe that all these appointments have been made on merit, and that the authorities were not influenced by any extraneous considerations. I am not prepared to accuse them of deliberately adopting a policy of fomenting discord and of aggravating communal rivalry and jealousies, for they are ultimately responsible for maintaining law and order. It is possible, however, that in some cases they were overweighed by their solicitude to give adequate representation in services to a minority community. The claim of the Hindus in Provinces in which they are in a majority for representation in services in proportion to their number in the population would never be entertained. Why should any more heed be paid to a similar claim by Mahomedans in the Punjab? However, the point which I want to establish is that, if no limitations have been imposed (and they should not be imposed) to the admission of Muslims in services in Provinces in which they are in a minority, why should such limitations be observed in the case of Hindus in Provinces in which they are in a minority, and how can they be justified? Such a tendency is apt to be abused as much in one place as in another. A future Hindu Minister of United Provinces may limit to 20 per cent. the admission of Muslims in various services, and of Behar and Orissa to 16 per cent., 6 per cent. in excess to their population in each case, just as nearly 7 per cent. in excess of the proportion has been reserved for Hindus and others of the Punjab. With the advance of education amongst the Muslims, whose proportion in these two Provinces and Central Province in the urban population is larger than their proportion in the population in the Province, and who for that reason have better facilities for higher education than those living in rural areas the number of fully qualified aspirants for services in their community will increase. I see no justification for putting an arbitrary limit. It was perhaps on considerations like these that the rule of communal proportions was not extended to departments other than the Medical in the Punjab.

A cognate principle, the general application of which to recruitment in services in the country it will be difficult to resist if representation in services on the basis of religion is permitted, is that of distribution of appointments by castes. I may mention, for the information of those who advocate the application of communal representation on the basis of religion to services, that there are Hindu castes in certain Provinces whose number is nearly equal if not larger than that of Muslims in those Provinces. With the spread of education class consciousness is being awakened everywhere. There are numerous caste organisations apart from communal organisations on the basis of religion. It is necessary to give weight to these considerations whilst devising plans for the next ten years, proposing further advance towards democratisation and minimising interference in Provincial matters by any extraneous authority, such as the Governor or the Central Government. There are altogether about 350 castes in India. The following figures for United Province and Behar and Orissa will show how the demand by castes numerically strong will clash with the demand for recruitment by religious communities, or will reduce to a minimum standard the efficiency of the services:—

Province.	T.P. of Muslims.	T.P. of the most numerous Hindu castes.
U.P. ...	6,481,032	1. Brahmans ...	4,513,264
		2. Ahirs	3,691,294
		3. Chamars	5,842,900
Behar and Orissa.	3,690,182	1. Brahman Bhumyar	2,858,595
		2. Gawalas	3,192,242
C. P. ...	563,574	1. Gaunde	2,109,583
		2. Kurmi	1,253,306

In the Punjab, however, and in the Punjab alone, with the exception of Madras, owing to circumstances to be related below, caste is an important element for recruitment in services.

I have at the outset referred to urban and rural constituencies. The representatives of the rural constituencies naturally predominate in the Council. There is a reference to a rural party in the Council in para. 3 of the Administration Report of the Punjab for the year 1923-24, extract from which is reproduced in Appendix No. II.

I would also refer to the evidence given by Sir John Maynard before the Muddiman Committee. The relevant portions of his evidence are printed in Appendix II. A perusal of the Report and of the evidence given by the late Finance Member will lead one to think that parties in the Punjab Council were being formed in the most natural way. It is not stated in the Administration Report or in the evidence that rural and urban parties in the Punjab Council are formed on the basis of caste and not on any real or supposed difference or conflict of interest that there may be between rural and urban classes. A Khatri, an Arora, or a Vaishya owning thousands of acres of land and paying thousands of rupees as Government revenue is not and cannot be a member of the so-called rural party, but a Jat, a Gujar, an Awan, or a Mehtam, who owns no land, but has other qualifications under the franchise rules for being a voter, or who owns just enough land to qualify him as a voter, but whose principal source of income is either from one of the learned professions, such as Law or Medicine, or from salary as a Government servant, is a member of the rural party. This anomaly needs a few words of explanation.

We have in the Punjab an Act to regulate the alienation of lands, passed in 1900, during Lord Curzon's regime, referred to in para. 3 of the Administration Report as the "Magna Charta of the Punjab Zemindars," which means Zemindar castes. The Act and the Standing Orders passed under it need careful perusal by the Commission. They are given in Appendix III.

The Standing Order specifies agricultural tribes for each district. A member of an agricultural tribe may without let or hindrance sell or mortgage his land to a member of his own or another agricultural tribe in the district, but he may not do so to a person who does not belong to the privileged group notified by the authorities as such. These tribes, like the tribes of Israel, are immutable. One has to be born into them, but cannot acquire the status except by Government notification. Before sanction is given for transfer of land by an agriculturist to a non-agriculturist, an inquiry is held by the District Officer to find out whether there is any member of an agricultural tribe who is willing to purchase the land at the price offered by the non-agriculturist. If there is anyone, or if the price offered by the agriculturist is not much below the market rate, sanction is withheld. The District Officer is also expected to inquire into the desirability of sale, whether the object of the vendor cannot be met by a mortgage for a short period to a non-agriculturist, the land reverting after the lapse of the period to the owner free of all encumbrances. But a member of an agricultural tribe may buy land on half the current market price, he may acquire on mortgage land without the limitations which the law imposes in case of mortgage to a non-agriculturist. To a member of the agricultural tribes all careers are open. He may be appointed Governor of a Province, or member of an Executive Council, Provincial or Imperial. He may join any profession or he may work at the plough. He may take to trade or banking or open a factory. The disability of a member of the non-agricultural tribe is hereditary, or, described more accurately, the disparity in the right to acquire land, between an agriculturist and a non-agriculturist, passes from father to son. The Land Alienation Act introduces in a manner the caste system of Mannu in the reverse order. The higher castes of the Hindus as a rule, with the exception of the Rajputs, are under a disability, and the lower castes of Mannu's system are the privileged classes. By the lapse of time, the Hindu caste system has lost the rigidity which characterised it in the time of Mannu, so far as the assignment of particular occupations to particular groups is concerned. For centuries the Brahmins have not been confined to the profession of priests, nor the Kashatriya to that of warriors, nor the Vaishyas to that of traders. What remains of the system now is that each caste is endogamous. Caste system as it exists is no hindrance to the working of democratic institutions. So long as every man is free to take to whatever occupation he chooses, democratic institutions can be worked. With education rapidly spreading it is impossible for any particular caste to arrogate to itself a position of superiority. Secular and economic interests have created, and will create, links of union between different castes. But the Land Alienation Act not only reverses the order of caste which Mannu instituted, but places restrictions by a statute on the choice of a profitable career, so far as such choice is effected by obstacles placed on the purchase of land from agricultural tribes, who form the bulk of the landowning classes. It therefore restores to a certain extent the pristine rigidity of Mannu's system. The privilege and prerogatives which the Act confers on capitalists of certain castes which form nearly half of the population of the Province makes the representatives of these castes strictly jealous of any invasion of them. In the extract from the Administration Report of 1923-24, reference has been made as to how the Zemindar bloc threw out a Bill to facilitate the acquisition of land for industrial purposes.

The object of the framers of the Act was twofold, economic and political. The political objects are nowhere clearly stated. The bearing of the law on the introduction of democratic institutions and on the introduction of Responsible Government in India was not even dreamt of.

On the economic effects of the law Mr. Kodand Rao, of the Servant of India Society, has written a series of articles which have been printed in the form of a pamphlet and which are reproduced in Appendix IV for very careful perusal by the Commission. I need not repeat all that he has said. He has, however, clearly shown that (1) the ignorant and the poor peasant has not been protected by the Act, that, on the contrary, he has been exposed to the avarice and the land hunger of the capitalist of the classes with whom he is grouped and which comprise classes belonging to all communities, a Mahomedan exposed to the land hunger of a Sikh and vice versa. (2) That the peasant gets a lower price for his land than he would have got if he could sell his land in an open and not in a restricted market which the Act creates. (3) That a class of moneylenders amongst Hindu and Sikh agricultural tribes has come to the fore, as exacting (if not more) in its transactions with the debtor as any moneylender of a non-agricultural tribe would have been. (4) That amongst Mahomedans there is a marked tendency on the part of capitalist landowners to swallow the lands of small landowners. It is the capitalist landowner who approaches the authorities and who creates the impression that the Act is the panacea of all evils and is looked upon by the landowning classes as their Magna Charta. The ignorant peasant who gets a smaller price for his land than he would have got if the Act had not existed, and who is unable to obtain loans from his own class on easier terms than from the notorious moneylender is inarticulate. About him it may well be said that "The toad beneath the harrow knows exactly where the tooth point goes."

But the toad beneath the harrow is not heard.

Mr. Kodand Rao's conclusions are based on data furnished by Government publications and on opinions formed by Europeans who have taken the trouble of surveying the economic conditions of rural classes.

The political objects of the measure as already observed are nowhere clearly or fully stated. Some of the speeches referred to by Mr. Kodand Rao indicate that the object was to protect the classes from which British Indian Army is recruited. The Subedar or the Risaldar, or even the private who saves some money and can invest it in land is benefited, inasmuch as he acquires the privilege of getting land on easier terms; but not the classes constituting small owners who furnish the recruits. I may, however, state that only Jats and Rajputs amongst agricultural tribes belong to the martial classes. Some Gujjars and Bilochies are also to be found in the Indian Army; but their number is small. The total number of Jats and Rajputs is 5,949,693 or 6 millions in the Punjab. I reckon the total of agricultural tribes at nearly 10 millions, thus nearly two-fifths of the agricultural tribes have hardly any connection with military recruitment.

One of the possible objects of the Act was to prevent the contamination of rural classes with urban politics. The introduction of the Reform Scheme and of Responsible Government, and the power of direct election given to the rural voters, has made this object meaningless. Politics have penetrated into the villages. Political aspirations have sprung up in the minds of villagers who mean to exercise their vote in shaping the policy of Government. In the politics of the members belonging to rural and urban castes there is no difference, except this, that the former regard the Act which creates an oligarchy of rural castes as sacrosanct, whilst the latter do not. If the spirits of Lord Curzon and Sir Charles Rivaz, sponsors of the Act, were to come to the Council Chambers of the Punjab and to witness the proceedings, they would call it an irony of fate when they discovered that the majority of the members who occupied the Left Wing of the Council Chamber sitting on Opposition benches were members of agricultural tribes. Therefore, so far as even this political object is concerned, the Act is an anachronism.

A policy deemed to be expedient when a foreign bureaucracy rules ceases to be expedient when that bureaucracy surrenders part of its power to the people. The continuance of that policy becomes illogical and absurd according to all canons of administration when the question arises of further surrender (whether complete or not) of that power to the people.

I have had some difficulty in ascertaining the total numerical strength in the Province of the agricultural tribes and of the tribes in each community. The notifications specifying agricultural tribes in each district do not give their population. I have, however, ascertained the population of each tribe community-wise from Table XIII. of the Census Tables. Some of the tribes notified are not given in the Census Tables. But most of them are either sections of Rajputs or of Jats, and the total figures for Rajputs and Jats given in the Census Tables cover them. The tribes whose numerical strength I have been unable to ascertain are the following:—

Abbasi, Usmani, Kasar, Danyials, Khetwall.

They are, however, mostly Mahomedan tribes. The figures, according to my calculations, are:—

Hindu agricultural tribes	1,697,187
Muslim agricultural tribes, little more than	6,832,183
Sikh agricultural tribes	1,521,173
Total agricultural tribes	10,050,543

I have taken no account in these figures of the notified agricultural tribes of "B" group, which consist of some sections of Brahmans, Mazbhi Sikhs and Indian Christians. The Brahmans in this group preponderate. Total population of Brahmans in this Province is 991,589. But it is impossible to find out the population of sections of Brahmans, Christians and others who have been notified in the "B" group. It may, however, be mentioned that these tribes have all the disadvantages of belonging to agricultural tribes but none of the advantages. They can neither sell land to other tribes than their own nor buy from them. They probably asked to be notified as agricultural tribes of the full status; but got only the restricted right. They asked for bread and were given stone. Some of them have since been agitating for being given the full status, but have not succeeded. I do not think that they really need the restriction which has been imposed on them. They have not asked for its removal, hoping to attain some day the full status. They are, therefore, not the agricultural tribe properly so called, and my inability to obtain figures about their population does not vitiate the argument which I am going to build. The Hindu agricultural tribes are 24.4 per cent. of the total population of Hindus, including Jains, Buddhist and Christians. The Mahomedans are a little over 60 per cent., and the Sikhs 66.3 of their population. The total population of agricultural tribes on the figures given by me is less than half the population of the Province; it may be slightly more than half. Anyhow, it may be safely assumed to be half. An attempt was made by me to get the exact figures from Government, but the Honourable Revenue Member's answer to the question, reproduced below, shows that there are no Government records showing the exact figures. He refers me to records which I have already consulted:—

Question 896. Diwan Bahadur Raja Narendra Nath: Will the Honourable the Revenue Member be pleased to state the total population of agricultural tribes specified in groups "A" and "B" separately and the number of Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs in each group?

Honourable Khan Bahadur Mian Sir Fazl-i-Hussain, Kt.

The collection of complete and correct statistics of the nature asked for by the Honourable Member for all notified tribes will entail an elaborate, lengthy and expensive inquiry, and the gain likely to accrue from the statistics does not appear to justify it. The Honourable Member is referred to Table XIII. of the Census Report of 1921, Volume XV., which gives by districts the census figures for main tribes, though all the agricultural tribes included in "A"—district group and "B"—separate group in Appendix to Financial Commissioners' Standing Order No. 1 are not contained in that table.

The number of Mahomedan non-agriculturists is approximately 4,612,138, which is nearly equal to the number of Hindu non-agriculturists, which is 4,919,735 (excluding the Christians). But for various reasons the measure is considered to be a pro-Mahomedan measure. The late Mr. Thorburn, with whom originated the idea of putting restrictions on the sale of land in the manner embodied in the Act, first drew attention of the Government to the necessity of the protection of landholders from the rapacity of Hindu moneylenders in a book called Musalmans and Moneylenders. Since Mr. Thorburn's book came out the legislature has adopted other measures besides the Land Alienation Act for the protection of borrowers. These will be dealt with in the next section in which I will make suggestions for the protection of the peasantry. The manner in which classes of agriculturists have been grouped as agricultural tribes lend colour to the belief that the Act was intended principally for the benefit of Mahomedans, Pathans, Qureshi, Biloch and Mughals, all Mahomedans are notified agricultural tribes; but it appears from Table XXI of Census Tables that only 19.1 per cent. of the total population of the Pathans and 19.2 per cent. of the total population of Qureshies are dependent upon agriculture or occupations concerned with it. In the case of Biloch and Mughals the percentage is not higher than 23.8 and 21.5 respectively. In the case of Pathans, Qureshies and Mughals I have worked out the figures by taking figures of columns, 9, 10, 11 and 12 of Table XXI, and in the case of Bilochies I have worked out my figures by taking figures of columns 17, 18, 21, 22, 23 and 24 of Table XXI of the Census Tables. But the differentiation made between Brahmins and Sayads, both priestly castes, is most unfair. I drew attention of Government to this injustice by the following question, and the answer given is evasive and indicates the unwillingness of Government to take any action. It does not meet the point raised. That Brahmins in certain tracts need protection from expropriation is admitted by Government. Why Sayads should be in a better position to buy land from, say, Sikh Jats and Rajputs than Brahmins, in tracts in which Brahmins are protected is not explained.

Question No. *656. Diwan Bahadur Raja Narendra Nath: Will the Honourable the Revenue Member be pleased to state:—

(a) whether it is a fact that Sayads are notified as an agricultural tribe in the Punjab having a preferential right to purchase land from other agricultural tribes (Hindu, Mahomedan or Sikh);

(b) whether they are notified as such a tribe in every district of the Punjab in Simla and Kangra where their number is 369 and 353 respectively;

(c) whether Brahmins are notified as agricultural tribes in certain districts forming a separate group by themselves not entitled to purchase land like the Sayads from other agricultural tribes;

(d) whether Brahmins and Sayads in the districts given below have the population respectively shown against them and whether in none of these districts, Brahmins hold the status of agricultural tribes whilst Sayads do:—

District.	Brahmans.	Sayads.
Ludhiana	19,621	3,063
Ferozepur	19,642	5,011
Lahore	31,348	11,830
Amritsar	32,470	4,548
Sheikhupura	5,715	3,856
Lyallpur	11,849	5,867
Gujranwala	12,941	7,197

(e) whether the total population of Brahmins in the Punjab is 988,616 and of Sayads 247,087;

(f) whether the following comparative table is a correct synopsis of the figures given in Table XXI of the Census Tables:—

Percentage following traditional occupation of priests.		Percentage who are receivers of rent.		Percentage who are actual tillers of soil, field labourers, wood-cutters, raisers of livestock, milkmen and herdsmen.
Sayads.	Brahmans.	Sayads.	Brahmans.	Sayads.	Brahmans.
12·8	7·7	1·8	1·5	7·5	19·1

(g) whether a larger proportion of Brahmins serve in the Army than that of the Sayads;

(h) if the above facts are correct, will the Honourable Revenue Member be pleased to explain what are the grounds of differentiation between Sayads and Brahmins in their agricultural status—

(i) in districts in which they are notified as agricultural tribes, and

(ii) in other districts?

The Honourable Mian Sir Fazli-Hussain: (a) and (b) Sayads are notified as an agricultural tribe in every district of the Punjab, except in Simla and Kangra. This does not confer any preferential right to purchase lands, but merely entitles them to do so in common with other agricultural tribes;

(c) Yes.

(d), (e) and (f) The figures given in the question are approximately correct.

(g) This information is not readily available.

(h) Notifications of the agricultural tribes in each district are issued according to local circumstances, the main determining factors being—

(i) that the tribe depends mainly on agriculture, and

(ii) that it requires protection from expropriation by moneylenders of non-agricultural tribes.

For these reasons Sayads have been notified in the districts mentioned. Brahmins have not so been notified as, although there are genuine agriculturists among them the tribe as a whole is not considered by Government to be an agricultural tribe. Where Brahmins (as e.g. Gaur Brahmins) actually form a tribe which can be described as agricultural they have been so gazetted.

The Act is supposed to protect tillers of the soil living in rural areas. In my opinion it does not do so adequately, creating, as it does, facilities for the acquisition of land by capitalist landowners grouped with the tillers of soil. In the Punjab 39.5 per cent. of the total urban population is Hindu which is slightly in excess of their proportion in the total population (31.9). Mahomedans are 51.9 per cent. of the total urban population which is slightly less than their proportion in the population (53 per cent. see Table V of the Census Tables of 1921). Amongst tillers of the soil or ordinary cultivators we find that Hindus form 31 per cent. of the total number of such workers, whilst the Mahomedans form 51 per cent. But amongst receivers of rent the Hindus are 22 per cent. and Muslims 59 per cent. In Provinces in which the Mahomedans are in a minority conditions are just the converse of the Punjab. A Hindu Minister by passing land laws of the kind we have in the Punjab will be turning tables against Mahomedans and will be putting them under a similar handicap as the Hindus are in the Punjab. The following figures taken from the Census Tables for United Provinces and Central Provinces would support my view.

Province.	Percentage of Muslims in the population.	Percentage of Muslims in the urban population.	Percentage of Muslims amongst tillers of the soil or ordinary cultivators.
C.P. ...	4	16·9	1·8
U.P. ...	14	36	3

In these two Provinces the proportion of rent receivers amongst Muslims is larger than their proportion in the population. In the United Provinces it goes up to 27 and in Central Provinces up to 10 per cent.

The above figures have been collected from Tables V and XX of the Census Tables of these Provinces. I have given the above figures in the hope that I will secure the support of my Mahomedan fellow-countrymen in the Provinces in which they are in minority. I am not sure if I will get that support. But if a rational view of the interest of minorities were taken there should be no difference of opinion between Hindus and Muslims, or for the matter of that between the Hindu minority and any other minority as to the manner in which the interests of the minorities should be protected. But the most unfortunate feature of the Indian politics of the present day due to communal tension is that proposals made are not judged on their merits but on the source from which they proceed. A proposal coming from a Hindu is apt to be looked upon with suspicion by Muslims and vice versa. I hope that men will be found amongst Muslim political leaders who will be able to rise above this tendency. It is possible that my views may be supported not only by the actual working peasantry in all communities and by nearly half the population of the Punjab which has not been fortunate enough to acquire the status of agricultural tribes, but by all minorities in all other Provinces, including the Muslim minority.

I do not for a moment suggest that a measure like that of the Land Alienation Act would be beneficial to the Hindus in the Provinces in which they are in a majority. It will unnecessarily create a division amongst them. It would create two middle classes, both amongst Hindus and Muslims, whilst it would needlessly create a conflict on the basis of caste between the producer and the manufacturer or the consumer. But power to base the determination of civic rights on caste or creed may go to unreasonable lengths. What will prevent a future Hindu Minister of a Province in which Hindus are in a majority from bringing forward a Bill on the lines of the Colour Bar Bill or the Class Area Bill of South Africa and of the Land Alienation Act of the Punjab providing that no Muslim should own immoveable property within a radius of say five miles of the Sacred places of Hindu pilgrimages, e.g., Jawalapur, Hardwar, Kankhal, Chitterkote, Kashi, Mathra and Bindraban, etc., and that the present owners of such property should be given liberal compensation and their property taken away from them. An incident like that of the Kartarpur riot may recur and a law for excluding Muslims from areas where their presence might lead to breaches of peace may be defended in the name of law and order. Looking upon the distribution of civic rights as distribution of power, and conceding for a moment the principle that power shall be distributed on the basis of the numerical strength of religious communities, how would my Mahomedan friends look upon a law which prescribes that not more than 14 per cent. of land should be owned by Muslims in the United Provinces, and to bring about that object all future sales of land by Muslims should be made to Hindus till the area held by Muslims in excess of 14 per cent. is reduced; for land and capital are instruments of power in society. Such a Minister having a majority of his own community behind his back will be apotheosised by his community and it will become impossible for the Governor to get rid of him. He will threaten to go in opposition and wreck every Minister who comes into power but refuses to adopt his policy.

The only check is the power of veto by the Governor or Governor-General. But the exercise of the power of veto is in the discretion of the Governor or the Governor-General. I would ask my fellow citizens in other Provinces belonging to various minorities whether they would consider the sweet will of the Governor or the Viceroy to be an effective check for the protection of their interests. Would they not prefer a more substantial method by insertion of a protective clause in the constitution. As long as Swaraj is not achieved a minority community may remain in the sunshine of the favour of powers that be, but when Swaraj is established and a Province enjoys provincial autonomy the value of a minority community as a counterpoise ceases.

There are, as already stated, 20 Territorial Constituencies for "Hindus and others." Out of these 7 are urban and 13 rural. In the 13 rural constituencies the total number of voters who have property qualification is 143,658, out of which 86,047 belong to agricultural tribes, or 59 per cent. I have made no calculation of the Muslim or Sikh voters belonging to agricultural tribes in Muslim and Sikh constituencies. But it is evident that as a larger proportion of these two communities is notified the proportion of voters belonging to agricultural tribes in these two communities must be larger than the proportion of voters of the same class amongst Hindus. The result is that members belonging to agricultural tribes returned to the Council form a very large number. The following table will show the number of members belonging to agricultural tribes returned to each of the three councils elected since the introduction of the Reforms*:—

Total of elected members ... 71

Council.	No. of members belonging to agricultural tribes.
1st Council	48
2nd Council	48
3rd Council	48

There exists a rural party in the Council consisting of Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs. It forms the largest single group. Its aims and objects are given in Appendix No. V. There is nothing in their programme to which an urban member would not subscribe except the support of the Land Alienation Act, which this party, as described in the Government Administration

* The calculation has been made in my office from electoral rolls.

Report, looks upon as its "Magna Charta." The party has assumed a definite shape and has adopted a definite programme only since the second Council came into existence. It was inchoate, and the so-called conflict between rural and urban population was dormant in the first Council. In the second Council that conflict came on the surface, and encouragement to it was given by such expressions of official opinion as that of Sir John Maynard before the Muddiman Committee, to which reference has already been made. The Ministry, as at present composed, has three members, two of whom belong to agricultural tribes and the third to a non-agricultural tribe. He depends for his position on the support of the majority of the Hindu members and of the official bloc. Removal of the official bloc will make the position of a Minister belonging to non-agricultural tribes manifestly insecure. Purely elective offices, such as those of President and Deputy-President, have been held by members of agricultural tribes. Even under the present dyarchic system the Council Government is Government by an oligarchy consisting of certain castes, which constitute nearly half the population of the Province. Inroads into this strong fortress are possible by the occasional use of the official bloc, which seldom if ever lends its help to the non-agricultural minority. The grant of provincial autonomy will make this fortress erected on the foundation of castes absolutely impregnable.

So far the division between urban and rural castes has not manifested itself amongst Mahomedan and Sikh members, and this for more than one reason. The majority of the Mahomedans and the Sikhs respectively belongs to agricultural tribes, and the minority does not wish to incur the opprobrium of the majority by asserting its right or by objecting to a measure which benefits the capitalist landowners, who alone are articulate. The Sikh and Mahomedan representatives in the Ministry have been members of agricultural tribes. A member of the non-agricultural tribe temporarily filled the office of Mahomedan Minister, but he did not hold office long enough to take part in the proceedings of the Council as a Minister. Few persons wish to imperil their chances of being appointed to an office by objecting to a principle with which at heart they may not be in sympathy. I have spoken to more than one Mahomedan and Sikh gentleman of non-agricultural tribes, and they condemn the Act and the policy underlying it. But for reasons stated above do not venture to give expression to their opinions. Thus, nearly half the population of the Province would be unable to have its representatives in the Cabinet if reliance were placed only on the support of elected members. I am not in possession of official secrets, and I cannot say what were the reasons which influenced the Governor in burdening the taxpayers with the salary of a third Minister, whose appointment appeared to the non-Muslim public to be perfectly unnecessary. But I am almost certain that the desirability of replacing a Minister belonging to an agricultural tribe necessitated the appointment of another Minister belonging to an agricultural tribe, so as to maintain the majority of agricultural tribes in the Ministry.

Reverting to the question of distributing appointments by castes, to which I alluded when I was discussing the principles of distributing appointments by religious communities, I would invite the attention of the Commission to a resolution of the Punjab Government passed in October, 1919, with the recommendation of a Committee appointed by the Pre-Reform Council. This resolution is printed in Appendix VI. It fixes the following proportions in various departments for appointments to be set apart for landholders:—

1. Provincial Service of Extra Assistant Commissioners 50 per cent., exclusive of Europeans and Anglo-Indians.
2. Tahsildars and Naib-Tahsildars 66 per cent. The percentage is to be observed in the recruitment of Naib-Tahsildars as Tahsildars are generally appointed from Naib-Tahsildars and the proportion will automatically work in case of Tahsildars.
3. Munsifs, now called Subordinate Judges, 66 per cent. of non-competitive posts.
4. Excise Department 60 per cent.
5. Agricultural Departments, preference to be given to zemindars who possess equal technical qualifications with others.
6. Veterinary Departments 66 per cent.
7. Co-operative Credit Societies 90 per cent. observed at present and not to fall below 80 per cent.
8. Forest Department 66 per cent.
9. Deputy-Superintendents, Inspectors, Sub-Inspectors of Police 50 per cent. for direct appointments.
10. Medical and Sanitary Departments, preference to be given to zemindars over other candidates if qualifications are equal. In short the general policy of the resolution is to give preference to zemindars where qualified candidates are available.

The majority of the landholders amongst the Muslims and Sikhs are members of agricultural tribes or castes, therefore a privilege conferred on landholders or on hereditary landowners, as explained by the Chief Secretary in his speech, benefits to a large extent the members of the agricultural tribes.

On the 8th of December, 1925, Chaudhri Duli Chand, M.L.C., moved a resolution asking Government to stop recruitment of classes other than agriculturists till the proportions fixed by the Government in 1919 for various departments have been attained. The resolution and the speech of the Chief Secretary accepting mainly the proposal contained in the resolution are reproduced.

SERVICES.

Chaudhri Duli Chand (Karnal non-Mahomedan rural), Urdu.

Sir, I rise to move my resolution, which runs thus:—

"This Council recommends to the Governor-in-Council that they will be pleased to lay down the following proportions:—

(i) That the Government circular of October, 1919, re employment of zemindars in Government departments shall be strictly followed by the various Government departments;

(ii) That, so long as the deficiency of zemindars in the various services is not made good, the recruitment of non-zemindars shall be stopped;

(iii) That preference should generally be given to a statutory agriculturist."

Speech by Chief Secretary.

Mr. H. D. Craik (Chief Secretary): "Sir, judging from the very thin House this resolution hardly commands the interest which I should have expected, and I am sorry that the honourable the mover of the resolution has not developed this theme rather more fully than he has. I will have to deal with this resolution in its various parts. As regards Part I., which asks that the Government circular of October, 1919, regarding employment of zemindars in Government departments shall be strictly followed by the various Government departments, I may say at once that Government accepts that part of the resolution. It will interest the House to know that quite recently the Government has taken steps that will, I hope, ensure that greater effect is given to the resolution of 1919. The resolution of 1919, broadly speaking, lays down that in various departments of Government we should aim at obtaining varying percentages of zemindars. Here, Sir, I may turn aside for a moment to clear up a point about the definition of 'zemindars.' The honourable mover said that Government in 1919 accepted the suggestion that the word zemindar should mean anybody who owns lands. That, Sir, is not accurate at all. The actual definition which Government accepted in 1919, and which it embodied in the resolution, was as follows:—

"The term 'zemindar' shall include all hereditary proprietors and tenure holders of agricultural land mainly dependent thereon and residing in rural areas as well as actual cultivators of such lands."

I lay special stress on the word "hereditary," for persons who acquire land themselves could not, under any circumstances, come within the terms of that definition.

Now, Sir, to resume the thread of what I was saying; we have quite recently issued orders to all heads of departments which will, I hope, secure that more full effect is given to the resolution of 1919. I admit at once that full effect has not yet been given to that resolution, though I think the honourable member has unduly minimised the actual effect of the resolution. I believe that if the figures of the various departments before and after 1919 and up to the present year are examined it will be found that in every department of the Government, without exception, the proportion of zemindars employed is substantially higher than it was in 1919. I am not in a position at the moment to quote the actual figures, though I shall be pleased to show the honourable member, if he ever applies to me, such figures as are available, though I admit that they are not complete and that they are not in all respects accurate. It was only with the object of securing a greater compliance, or a more full compliance with the resolution of 1919, and also with the object of enabling the Government to know exactly what proportions, not only of zemindars, but of the various religious communities, are employed under it, we have recently issued a circular which I will explain in some detail. The circular, which went out to all heads of departments in the Province and to all Commissioners and Deputy-Commissioners at the beginning of November last, began by stating that Government had reason to believe that the instructions contained in the resolution of 1919 had not been fully carried out and that the statistics sent to them by the various departments were not altogether accurate or complete. The circular went on to say that the members of this Council, and the public generally, showed a considerable interest in this matter, and it was important that Government should have accurate statistics and should be in a position to know at any given moment exactly what class of people were employed in its various departments. We, therefore, Sir, have instructed all heads of departments and all officers subordinate to this Government to hold a regular census of all persons in the employment of the Local Government at the beginning of next January and every person in the employment of this Government, with the exception of menials, will be classified, not only according to his religion, but also according to the fact whether he is a zemindar or not. I hope, Sir, that the honourable mover of this resolution will be satisfied by that assurance that the Government is making a real effort to ensure that the principles laid down in its resolution of 1919 are in future fully complied with. When we get that information we will be in a position to communicate to the House a complete statement for every department under Government. I think I am right in saying that not only every department as a whole, but for the various grades, ranks and posts in each department, information will be available in a statement that will be made available to the House. The instructions which were issued last month have also given a closer definition of the term "zemindar" than was given in the resolution of 1919. We pointed out that we had some reasons to believe that in compiling the statistics that had been sent to the Government in the past the definition of the zemindar, the one I mean of 1919, which I had just quoted to the House had been employed with some laxity and that some persons had been entered as zemindars merely on their own statement without any responsible official taking the trouble of verifying their statements. The honourable mover will appreciate the consequence of that laxity. If our surmise is correct, it means that the statistics show that Government employ more zemindars than it actually does employ. It is therefore important to see that the definition should be more accurately worded and should be more carefully followed. This circular directs that in order to avoid such mistakes in future, heads of departments should follow the principle which is explained in the circular. When a Government servant who is not a member of a tribe notified as an agricultural tribe under the Alienation of Land Act says that he is a zemindar, he must satisfy the head of his department that he does actually fall within the definition. In other words, the onus of proof will be upon any Government servant who is not a member of the notified agricultural tribe to show that satisfies the term of the definition. If he fails to discharge that onus, if he fails to satisfy the head of the department that he is a zemindar within the terms of the definition, then he will be entered in the statement as a non-zemindar. We further define the expression "hereditary properties" as meaning not a man who merely inherits land from his father, but a man who has inherited lands from his grandfather or some more remote ancestor. That will exclude from the definition of "zemindar" those persons who either themselves or whose fathers have purchased land. We have also asked the heads of departments to see that the statements made to them are in all cases verified and tested by some responsible officer, and I hope when we get a return of this census, which I have explained to the House will take place early next year, we shall get really accurate figures and shall be in a position to say of every department of Government exactly how many zemindars it employs at the moment. I trust that the honourable mover will accept that assurance and that statement as showing that Government is genuinely anxious to give effect to the resolution of 1919.

But Part II of the resolution moved by the honourable member, Chaudhri Duli Chand, goes considerably further and asks that so long as the deficiency of zemindars in the various Government services is not made good, the recruitment of non-zemindars shall be stopped. I find it a little difficult to appreciate what exactly the honourable mover meant by that part of his resolution. In his speech he did not give me very much enlightment. I can hardly think that he means exactly what the words connote. But he cannot, surely, desire that in, say, an expert department like the Medical Department if the percentage of zemindars falls short of what is prescribed in the orders of Government, we should thereupon cease to recruit non-zemindars altogether, because the effect of that might be that we might have vacancies which we should never be able to fill up at all. It is therefore for that reason impossible for Government, while giving its assurance that it is genuinely anxious and it has recently made fresh efforts to give effects to the orders of 1919, to accept Part II of the resolution.

As regards Part III of the resolution, I think I have already explained, I hope, to the satisfaction of the honourable mover exactly what is meant by the term "zemindar" in the resolution of 1919 and in our recent instructions. I hope that, in view of that explanation, the honourable mover will not press Part III of the resolution, which I take to mean that the term zemindar should be applied to the very much narrower definition of a "zemindar" as a member of a tribe notified under the Alienation of Land Act. I hope I have satisfied my honourable friend Chaudhri Duli Chand as to the intentions of the Government on that point."

The persistence with which Government is badgered by questions for strict adherence to the principle of giving preference to the members of agricultural tribes over those of non-agricultural tribes will appear from the following string of questions put by an ex-Minister, Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram, on the 18th July, 1927.

Question No. *293. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Chief Secretary kindly supply in respect of the three Muslim Sessions Judges who were referred to as being zemindars in a Government Press communique issued in April or May last the following particulars, or such of these particulars as can be supplied without unreasonable amount of labour and as is not regarded by Government undesirable to supply:—

(a) the names of these gentlemen;

(b) whether the gentlemen are statutory agriculturists or zemindars under the broad definition adopted in the resolution of 1919;

(c) if statutory agriculturists, the tribes to which they belong;

(d) if zemindars under the broad definition, their native places of residence, the number of generations for which they have held land, and the approximate proportion which the income from agricultural land in the possession of their families bears to income from other sources.

Mr. H. D. Craik: (a) Government prefer in this to adopt its usual practice of avoiding reference to the names of particular officers.

(b) Two of the officers in question are members of tribes notified as agricultural tribes under the Alienation of Land Act. The third belongs to an Afghan tribe of the North-Western Frontier Province.

(c) Of the two officers who are statutory agriculturists one is a Rajput of the Gurdaspur district and the other a Jat of the Mianwali district.

(d) Does not arise.

Question No. *294. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable Finance Member kindly state:—

(a) whether or not the figures relating to the proportion of zemindars as given in the consolidated list showing the proportionate representation of classes and communities in the various branches of the public service are based on a definition of the word zemindar under which many non-statutory zemindars would figure as agriculturists;

(b) whether this definition was found difficult to work and to yield results which were not sufficiently definite, accurate or reliable;

(c) whether, in order to obtain more reliable data, the Government has altered this definition to that of a statutory agriculturist;

(d) whether fresh figures are under preparation in accordance with the definition as now altered;

(e) when it is expected that the fresh figures will be available?

The Honourable Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency: (a) A census of Government servants in the Punjab was held on the 1st January, 1926, Government servants being classified according to religion and as agriculturists or non-agriculturists. The definition of the term agriculturist (or zemindars) given in paragraph 2 of Punjab Government Resolution No. 4572-S, dated the 3rd October, 1919, was adopted for purpose of the census. The definition is so framed as to include all persons whose real interests lie in the land or agricultural callings whether or not they are members of tribes notified under the Punjab Alienation of Land Act.

(b) The definition was found to be subjected to a variety of different interpretation by heads of offices and departments.

(c) The scope of the annual census has now been changed with the object of avoiding differences of interpretation of the definition above referred to. With effect from the Census held on the 1st March 1927, Government servants will be classified according to religion and as members of tribes notified under the Punjab Alienation of Land Act or "others."

(d) Yes.

(e) It is expected that a statement showing the result of the census held on the 1st of March, 1927, will be ready very shortly.

Zemindars and non-Zemindars in Certain Classes of Public Service.

Question No. *295. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable Finance Member kindly state—

(a) Whether appointments to the posts of Forest Rangers, Veterinary Inspectors and Assistant Sub-Inspectors of Police, Head Constables, Tahsildars, Naib-Tahsildars, Kanungos, Patwaris, Zilladars, and Patwaris (Canal), Excise Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors are by competition or by selection;

(b) Whether, ordinarily speaking, zemindars are not better fitted for the duties of the posts specified in (a);

(c) Whether, according to the consolidated statement issued in July, 1926, the following figures correctly indicate the representation of Zemindar and non-Zemindar Hindus in the above posts:—

	Agriculturists.	Non-agriculturists.
Forest Rangers	4	20
Subordinate Veterinary Service	19	29
Sub-Inspectors of Police ...	88	164
Head Constables	257	403
Tahsildars	14	25
Naib-Tahsildars	31	47
Kanungoes	82	245
Patwaris	1,045	3,375
Zilladars	27	42
Patwaris (Canal)	233	852
Excise Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors	15	51

(d) Whether Government will consider the advisability of taking necessary steps to improve the obviously inadequate representation of Hindu zemindars in the above posts?

The Honourable Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency: (a) By selection from amongst qualified persons.

(b) This is a matter of opinion, but honourable member is well aware of the views put forward by Government in the resolution of October, 1919.

(c) Yes.

(d) The honourable member is again referred to the resolution of October, 1919, to which Government is resolved to give effect in recruitment.

Question No. 296. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Chief Secretary kindly state—

(a) Whether the minimum standard of education required for the recruitment of the class described as "other clerks" in the consolidated statement issued by the Government in July, 1926, is matriculation;

(b) Whether appointment to the post of "other clerks" is by nomination and not by competition;

(c) Whether the following figures correctly indicate the representation of zemindar and non-zemindar Hindus in this class of appointments according to the said consolidated statement:—

	Agri-culturists.	Non-agri-culturists.
Forest Departments ...	7	56
Public Health Department	3	18
Agricultural Department ...	4	21
Financial Commissioners' Office	5	13
Police Department ...	8	31
Office of Land Records ...	Nil	5
High Court	9	77
Subordinate Courts... ...	99	454
Director of Public Instruction's Office	Nil	11
Subordinate Offices (Education)	10	51
Legal Remembrancer's Office	Nil	4
Medical Department ...	14	55
Irrigation Works	45	206
Public Works Department, Building and Roads ...	7	104
Veterinary Department ...	3	8

(d) Whether Government will consider the advisability of rectifying the inequalities disclosed above?

Mr. H. D. Craik: (a) Generally, yes.

(b) Heads of the departments are empowered to make appointments as they think fit. It is understood that in most departments appointments are made by nomination.

(c) Yes.

(d) The attention of the honourable member is invited to paragraph 18 of Punjab Government resolution No. 4572-S, dated the 3rd of October, 1919.

Civil Judicial Branch of the Provincial Service.

Question No. *297. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Chief Secretary kindly state—

(a) What steps, if any, have so far been taken to consult the High Court on the subject of strengthening the zemindar element in the civil judicial branch of the provincial service;

(b) Whether a final decision will be reached before the next selection of sub-judges takes place?

Mr. H. D. Craik: (a) The High Court has been addressed on the subject. (b) I am unable to say, as I am not aware when the next selection of sub-judges will take place.

Judicial Branch of the Provincial Service.

Question No. *298. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable Member for Finance kindly state—

(a) Whether the figures against "judicial branch" on page 11 of the consolidated statement relate only to the civil judicial branch of the provincial service or cover the criminal judicial branch of the service also;

(b) How many of the 18 Hindu agriculturists, as against 62 Hindu non-agriculturists, belong to statutory agricultural tribes;

(c) How many, if any, among these 18 agriculturists are Jats, Rajputs, Ahirs, Gujars, Sainies or Rors, belonging to Rohtak, Hissar, Gurgaon and Karnal districts;

(d) How many, if any, of the 36 Muslim agriculturists in the judicial branch are Rajputs, Jats, or Gujars from Rohtak, Hissar, Gurgaon and Karnal districts?

The Honourable Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency—

(a) The figures did not include members of the provincial service holding "listed" posts.

(b) to (d) The honourable member is referred to the statement for 1927, which will be supplied to the House shortly, and to the reply which follows to Question No. 299.

Police and Judicial Branch of Service.

Question No. *299. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable Member of Finance kindly state—

(a) Whether it is not a fact that zemindars, Hindu, Muslim or Sikh, of the South-Eastern Punjab are very meagrely represented in the Police and Judicial branches of the service.

(b) Whether any Jat, Rajput, Gujar, whether Hindu, Sikh or Musalman, belonging to Rohtak, Hissar, Gurgaon or Karnal districts has ever been appointed a Deputy Superintendent of Police by direct nomination?

The Honourable Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency: The attention of the honourable member is drawn to paragraph 3 of the answer given by the Honourable Sir John Maynard to questions Nos. 1961 to 1975 of the 6th of July, 1925. As there explained, an annual census is now held showing the communities of public servants in the different branches of the administration, and Government cannot undertake to collect further statistics in regard to the representation of members of different sections of different localities in the public service.

Inspector of Police.

Question No. *300. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable Member for Finance kindly state—

(a) Whether, in answer to a Council question put in 1918, Government gave an assurance that at least one Hindu Jat would be appointed Inspector of Police as soon as possible;

(b) Whether any Hindu Jat has so far been appointed as Inspector of Police by direct nomination or by promotion, and, if not, whether Government will see its way to the fulfilment of that promise now?

The Honourable Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency: I regret that the answer to this question is not yet ready. It will be communicated to the honourable member in due course.

Question No. *301. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable Member for Finance kindly state—

(a) The principal military tribes in the Rohtak district;

(b) The measure of representation of these tribes among the Constables, Head Constables and Sub-Inspectors of the Police Force in the district?

The Honourable Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency—

(a) The principal military tribes in the Rohtak district are Hindu Jats and Mahomedan Rajputs.

(b) The number of men belonging to those tribes enlisted in the Police Force of this district is as follows:—

	Sub-Inspectors.	Head Constables.	Constables.
Hindu Jats ...	—	7	34
Muhammadan Rajputs	—	3	40
Total ...	—	10	74

Question No. 302. Rai Sahib Chaudhri Chhotu Ram: Will the Honourable the Revenue Member kindly state—

(a) The total number of clerks in the Deputy-Commissioner's Office at Rohtak;

(b) The number of clerks who are Jats, Rajputs (Hindu or Muslim), Ahirs, Sainies and Gaur Brahmins?

Mr. C. A. H. Townsend: (a) 70; (b) 15.

I find it difficult to reconcile the policy underlying the resolution of 1919 of the Punjab Government with that of the Alienation of Land Act. The object of the Act was to prevent the "detribalisation" of land, to prevent the transfer of land from castes which by heredity and tradition are good farmers and live on the land to castes who live in towns and are merely receivers of rent. I do not see how the object of the Act is achieved by giving every possible facility to agricultural castes to take such an urban pursuit as Government service, dissociating them from farming and agriculture. If a man spends the best part of his life in Government service, holding an executive or judicial office, I fail to see what is left in him except caste to qualify him for a preferential right for the acquisition of land. In what respect is he different from a man belonging to a non-agricultural caste, who acquires wealth in a profession or in service and wishes to invest it in land on which he proposes to settle? Neither of them knows how often a field of wheat or cotton should be ploughed before sowing, and how often it should be watered after sowing. A young man belonging to an agricultural caste, born in a village, and educated in a village school, moves at the age of 12 or 14 to a high school in a town. After passing his matriculation examination, he comes to an important university town, and there studies subjects which have no direct bearing on agriculture and gets a degree. He then proceeds to Europe and qualifies for a profession unconnected with agriculture. He probably inherits a smallholding, which he lets out to tenants on rent. His income from his profession is twenty times the income from his land. Naturally, he devotes more attention to that part of the work which brings him more money. He forgets how to appraise the produce of an acre of wheat, possibly he never knew it. He begins to take interest in politics and becomes a party leader.

I have made enquiries from other Provinces whether there are any orders of Government giving preference to landowners for appointments in various departments. The reasons given in the resolution of the Punjab Government are applicable to the landowning classes all over India. Land revenue is the principal source of income in every Province. Contribution by landowners to the finance of the State is the largest. In no other Council, so far as my enquiries go, the landowning classes (not to speak of the landowning castes, which are a creation pure and simple of the Land Alienation Act) have a separate political party of their own. In no other Province is any preference given to landowners for Government appointments. Communal considerations no doubt weigh with the authorities in making recruitment, but nothing else clashes with this division. The resolution of the Punjab Government, on which the rural party bases its claims to preferential treatment and facilities for entry into Government service, which, as already indicated, is a novel feature of the policy of the Punjab Government, is, in my humble opinion, directly opposed to the policy laid down by the Court of Directors in their despatch No. 44, dated 10th December, 1834, accompanying the Act of India of 1833, which, for the first time, enacted section 87 removing disqualifications on the basis of caste and creed. The following passage occurs in the despatch:—

"But the meaning of enactment we take to be that there shall be no governing caste in India, and that whatever other tests of qualifications may be adopted distinction of race and religion shall not be of the number."

In Muslim India, excluding the territories governed by Hindu rulers, there was never any governing caste. Birbal was a Bhatt, Raja Todarmall was a Khatri, Man Singh was a Rajput. Later on, during the reign of the Nwabs of Oudh, if Jhaulall was a Kayastha, Raja Mehra was a Jhiwar. During Maharaja Ranjit Singh's reign Dogras were the Wazirs, Muslim Sheikhs and Sayads held positions of Provincial Governors and Foreign Ministers, and Brahmans the offices of Diwans. There was not thus a caste, but a group of castes from which officers were recruited. As people living in urban areas had better facilities for acquiring education than those living in the country, as is the case even now, not only in India, but even in some European countries, the urban population naturally got more posts. This is one of the reasons why Mahomedans in United Provinces, Central Province and Behar and Orissa have a larger share in the services of these Provinces than would fall to them on a population basis. Punjab is the only Province in which, to belong to an urban area, entails several disqualifications. The resolution creates a partial monopoly of the rural castes. It revives the evil which the Despatch quoted above tried to remove, and which, as the data already given about the constitution of the Council and of the electorate fully prove, a further devolution of power to the people of Punjab will perpetuate. The Land Alienation Act, designed purely as an economic measure, has thus led to many political offshoots. It led to the enunciation of the policy laid down in the resolution of 1919, and it has led to the creation of a rural party in the Council which is already the largest single group, and which, by removal of the official bloc, will form the ruling majority.

Democracy and democratic institutions are based on the idea of the equality of human beings. A few years ago a Committee was appointed by the Legislative Assembly to remove inequalities of procedure in Criminal Courts in trials between Indians and Europeans. The Committee succeeded in softening marked inequalities. A great deal of resentment was shown over the Anti-Asiatic Legislation in South Africa. We have, however, in our Province an analogous measure which has been relegated to the limbo of oblivion by politicians of other Provinces. None of those who frame constitutions know what part this measure will play in the politics of the Province in future, and what bearing it will have on the question of Provincial autonomy.

SECTION II.—REMEDY PROPOSED.

I am not prepared to deny the desirability of a protective law; but it should not be framed in a manner so as to be tribal in its operation. It should not be of such a nature as to foster the growth of political parties on the basis of caste. Tillers of the soil and peasant proprietors of all castes and creeds may be protected against all castes and creeds. In other words, the Land Alienation Act should be divested of its political features and should be reduced to a law purely protective of the peasantry. Such a law may be framed for the whole of India and not for the Punjab alone. Before describing the scheme of the future law, I may mention that, since Mr. Thorburn's book, to which reference has been made in the previous page, was published in 1886, two important additions have been made to the Statute Book for the protection of borrowers. Section 16 of the Indian Contract Act in its present amended form (the amendment having been made by Act VI. of 1899) is given below, and may be compared with Section 16 of the old Act, which is also reproduced for comparison:—

16 (1) A contract is said to be induced by "undue influence" where the relations subsisting between the parties are such that one of the parties is in a position to dominate the will of the other and uses that position to obtain an unfair advantage over the other.

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing principle, a person is deemed to be in a position to dominate the will of another.

(a) Where he holds a real or apparent authority over the other, or where he stands in a fiduciary relation to the other; or

(b) Where he makes a contract with a person whose mental capacity is temporarily or permanently affected by reason of age, illness, or mental or bodily distress.

(3) Where a person who is in a position to dominate the will of another enters into a contract with him and the transaction appears, on the fact or it or on the evidence adduced, to be unconscionable, the burden of proving that such contract was not induced by undue influence shall lie upon the person in a position to dominate the will of the other. Nothing in this sub-section shall affect the provision of Section III. cf Indian Evidence Act, 1872.

Illustrations.

(a) A, having advanced money to his son B, during his minority, upon B coming of age obtains by misuse of parental influence a bond from B for a greater amount than the sum due in respect of the advance. A employs undue influence.

(b) A, a man enfeebled by disease or age, is induced by B's influence over him as his medical attendant, to agree to pay B an unreasonable sum for his professional service. B employs undue influence.

(c) A, being in debt to B, the moneylender of his village, contracts a fresh loan on terms which appear to be unreasonable. It lies on B to prove that the contract was not induced by undue influence.

(d) A applies to a banker for a loan at a time when there is stringency in the money market. The banker declines to make the loan except at an unusually high rate of interest. A accepts the loan on these terms. This is a transaction in the ordinary course of business, and the contract is not induced by undue influence.

This section was substituted for the original Section 16 by the Indian Contract Amendment Act VI. of 1899, S. 2.

The section, before it was amended, read as follows:—

"'Undue influence' is said to be employed in the following cases":—

"(1) When a person in whom confidence is reposed by another or who holds a real or apparent authority over that other, makes use of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an advantage over that other, which, but for such confidence or authority, he could not have obtained";

"(2) When a person whose mind is enfeebled by old age, illness, or mental or bodily distress, is so treated as to make him consent to that to which, but for such treatment, he would not have consented, although such treatment may not amount to coercion."

There were no illustrations appended to the old section.

Act X. of 1918, called the Usurious Loans Act, empowers courts to relieve the debtor of any excessive interest, reopen any account and to revise security.

In addition to this, if necessary a new law may be framed applicable to all landowners irrespective of caste and creed owning small holdings, say, of areas varying from 25 to 50 acres according to the productiveness of the land restricting alienation or sale of land in execution of degrees. I would not give preferential rights of purchase to one set of castes over another. It is not impossible to work out details. When the Land Alienation Act was passed a set of elaborate instructions became necessary, and I see nothing impracticable in framing another set of instructions based on a restrictive law framed on the lines suggested by me. Executive Officers, instead of trying to find out as they do now whether a purchaser of one of the notified groups is forthcoming or not, will have, in the first place, to find out whether the intending alienor's purpose cannot be served by temporary alienation of land described in the Land Alienation Act. If no person is forthcoming to accept temporary transfer the intending alienor may be permitted to make a permanent alienation to whosoever he likes in an open and not restricted market. The point for the Executive Officer will be to see whether temporary alienation is possible or not, and not to look to the caste or tribe of the temporary or permanent alienee. I may here mention that Mr. Kodand Rao's constructive suggestions given at the conclusion of his papers, which are printed in the Appendix, go much beyond what is needed. He advocates a radical change in the system of our land tenures and rent laws. The remedy which I will propose aims at the condemnation of a vicious principle which a ruling majority in a representative system of Government may employ in various ways and forms. It is difficult to foresee how the principle which is opposed to the basic principles of democracy may assume various forms and shapes. I propose no changes in the existing law except those which are consequential on the adoption of my proposal. My scheme of a protective law also is not open to the general objection that protective laws frustrate their own end.

An attempt on my part to restrict the Act to its economic sphere failed, as the following question and answer in the Council will show:—

Agricultural Indebtedness.

Question No. 223, dated 18th July, 1927.

Diwan Bahadur Raja Narendra Nath: Will the Financial Commissioner be pleased to state—

(a) Whether the answer given by me to question No. 6 of the questionnaire issued by the Royal Agricultural Commission (reproduced below for facility of reference) has been brought to the notice of Government;

(b) Whether Government propose to take any action on the line suggested by me therein;

(c) The reason for refusal or hesitancy to take action in case no action is contemplated?

Answer to Question No. 6 (e) of the Agricultural Commission.—In the Punjab the right of mortgage and sale is already restricted by the Land Alienation Act. The right should be restricted further. The Act operates in two ways. It restricts the right of alienation and it gives a preferential right for the acquisition of land by purchase or mortgage to wealthier individuals in the same class. It is time that, while the restrictive aspect may be maintained in respect of the poorer or the more ignorant classes, the richer and the better-educated classes who do not need restriction, but who benefit by the privilege which the Act confers, should be exempted from the operation of the Act under Section 24; for instance, I would exempt the following classes from the operation of the Act:—

(1) Men who have taken to Government service or to professions, such as the Law, or Medicine, or Teaching.

(2) Government pensioners drawing a pension of more than Rs. 100/- per month.

(3) Jagirdars in receipt of Jagirs of more than a 1,000/- a year.

(4) Persons who pay more income tax than land revenue.

(5) All ex-members of a Provincial or Imperial Cabinet.

Some agricultural classes have taken to moneylending and yet they enjoy the privilege of a preferential acquisition of land. The whole subject needs a thorough enquiry, with a view to carry the principles of the Act to its logical and legitimate conclusions and to prevent the expropriation of poorer and more ignorant owners by the richer and better-educated rural middle-class which has come into existence within the last 25 years.

Answer.—Mr. C. A. H. Townsend: (a) Yes.

(c) Government is not aware that of the classes whose rights of alienation have been restricted some desire to have the restriction removed and others to have it made more stringent. No representation on the subject from them has reached Government. Whether the scope of the possible alienees be further reduced is a matter on which there are not sufficient data available to enable Government to hold that the suggested amendment is necessary in furtherance of the object of the enactment.

The answer of the honourable member, who presumably voiced the opinion of the Honourable Revenue Member (himself a member of an agricultural tribe) is evasive and the only justification that I can imagine is his reluctance to make a change which will be unacceptable to the Council as a whole, and which would deprive the major portion of it of a powerful political weapon.

The Indian Legislature has the power of making laws on matters purely provincial, Section 65 (1) (a) of the Government of India Act. As far as I am aware this power has not been exercised within the last eight years in framing a law which is purely provincial in its application. Provincial autonomy would be meaningless if Central Legislature is empowered to deal with legislation which is purely provincial in its character. I do not know whether Section 65 will be retained in its present form. But even if it were the Central Government would not legislate oftener on provincial matters than it has done in the past. As the rules stand at present no resolution on matters with which Provincial Governments are primarily concerned can be allowed in the Assembly, much less legislation dealing with purely Provincial matters. Therefore, the political conditions created by the Land Alienation Act cannot be wiped off by anything which Government of India can at present do or is likely to do in future.

No change in the franchise will remove it. A reference to Schedule 2 attached to the Punjab Electoral Rules, which gives the qualification of voters in rural and in urban constituencies, will show that property qualification, payment of rent for house occupied or payment of income tax and payment of land revenue is necessary. It will not be just to remove only the qualification with regard to the payment of income tax whilst retaining property qualification for others. Lowering of the property qualification will not alter the preponderance of voters belonging to agricultural tribes, for if the number of voters belonging to non-agricultural tribes is thereby increased the number of voters belonging to agricultural tribes will also be increased pro tanto.

In rural areas houses are seldom given on rent. Even manhood suffrage will not change the situation. I may here mention that manhood suffrage does not exist even in England. Under the Representation of the People Act of 1918, male electors must have resided and occupied business premises of an annual value of not less than £10. Franchise has been extended in England gradually. By the Reform Act of 1832 only 3 per cent. of the population were enfranchised. In 1867 it increased to 9 per cent. and in 1884 to 18 per cent., and, finally, in 1918, to 50 per cent. The standard of literacy in the Punjab is very low; according to the Census of 1921 it is nearly 4 per cent. Within the seven years that have since elapsed there could not have been much change. The constitutional advance that the Commission will propose will wait for its introduction till free and compulsory primary education and universal literacy become accomplished facts. Classes that own no property in rural areas will be entirely under the influence of classes who own property. To give the right of voting to tenants-at-will (tenants who can be ejected on six months' notice) will only increase the influence of the landlords and of the landowning classes. The creation of a second chamber, for which a much higher property qualification will be required, will also favour the capitalist landowners of certain castes who at present preponderate in the Council.

Therefore, in the Punjab the problem of the protection of minorities has to be considered on two lines, the communal or the religious line, and a caste line. In both cases the minority to be protected is very important, considered even numerically. In the case of the caste minority there is the additional fact that the representation of the agricultural castes is far in excess of the proportion of its number in the population—an excess which no reasonable change in the franchise rules can immediately remove. Most of our political leaders have condemned communal representation. The Commonwealth of India Bills, framed by Dr. Besant and Mr. Lansbury, of the Independent Labour Party, separately propose reservation of seats for Europeans and Muslims for a period of five years. The Committee appointed by the Indian National Congress, consisting of Dr. Ansari and Lala Lajpat Rai, have deprecated the idea of introducing communal representation in services. Reference to it has already been made. But it has never been suggested how to interdict communal representation in services and in other spheres of administrative activity.

Both the Bills (by Dr. Besant and Mr. Lansbury) propose the appointment of a Public Service Commission, but there is nothing in them to prevent the Executive Government from directing the Public Service Commission to proceed on communal lines. Section 96 (c) of the Government of India Act of 1919 provides for the appointment of the Public Service Commission, communal representation is mentioned only in one place, Section 72 (c) (4), where reference is made to communal representation for the purpose of election. This Act, as also the Commonwealth of India Bills, are silent on the point of the extension of communal or caste representation in other spheres, with the result that we have in the Punjab communal representation for services in certain departments of Government, caste representation in all the departments of Government, and communal representation for admission to educational institutions. Bombay Government has fixed percentages for the admission of various communities to the education institutions, vide Resolution No. 3,464, dated 30th March, 1925, viz., for the High Schools of Hyderabad, Shikarpur, Larkana, Mahomedans 50 per cent., Hindus 50 per cent., for the High Schools of Nowshera Madrasa, Mahomedans 75 per cent. and Hindus 25 per cent. I learn from newspapers that Bombay Government has prescribed different conditions for the Hindus and Mahomedans for the purchase of Crown lands. It is a matter of common knowledge that our local bodies waste a good deal of time in squabbles over the representation of different communities in services under them. Local bodies are in direct touch with the local and rural areas which they administer. What transpires in them passes down more easily to the population around than what takes place in Councils, Provincial or Imperial. A communal spirit evinced by our representatives filters down to the masses and is one of the main causes of friction between the communities manifesting itself often in outbursts of violence. The question, therefore, is have we only to content ourselves with expressions of opinion condemning caste and communal representation beyond certain limits or should the future constitution be framed in such a way as to forbid its unrestricted operation. I am decidedly of opinion that there should be inserted a clause in the constitution condemning this vicious principle with a schedule of exceptions to suit the present conditions of society.

Joint electorates will not prove the panacea for all evils. It is on the assumption that the introduction of joint electorates will make it impossible for a ruling majority to show any spirit of partiality on the basis of caste and creed that the two Commonwealth of India Bills are silent on the question of determining civil rights on the basis of caste and creed. This assumption is, in my opinion, wholly erroneous. The spectre of communalism will continue to stalk for long in the Councils of the Indian Empire, even after separate electorates have ceased to exist. In fact the demand for joint electorates on the ground that their introduction will make the different castes and communities in India a nation appears to me to be an instance of argument in a circle. Those who insist upon separate electorates do so because the different communities of India do not form a homogeneous whole. The answer that separate electorates have created the differences (as a matter of fact they have only accentuated them) assumes that differences exist. My objection to separate electorates for a majority community is based on a different ground altogether and applies only to Provinces where a majority community wants separate electorates in spite of protest by a minority community.

In short a clause in the constitution laying down limits within which only communalism may operate is badly needed. Sub-clause F of Clause 7 of Dr. Besant's Bill, and Sub-clause F of Clause 8 of Mr. Lansbury's Bill, which I reproduce below, does not meet the object which I have in view:—

"All persons residing within the Commonwealth, whether permanently or temporarily, are equal before the law, and no distinction of Court or Judge shall be made between one class of person and another with respect to similar legal matters or offences."

Article 128 of the Constitution of Czechoslovak Republic, which I give below, runs very much on the lines on which a clause is needed in the Indian Constitution.

CZECHOSLOVAK CONSTITUTION.

CHAPTER VI.—PROTECTION OF NATIONAL RELIGIOUS AND RACIAL MINORITIES.

Article 128.—(1) All citizens of the Czechoslovak Republic shall be in all respects equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights, without distinction of race, language, or religion.

(2) Differences in religion, creed, faith or language shall not prejudice any citizen of the Czechoslovak Republic in any way, within the limits laid down by general laws, particularly in regard to public employment, office of honours and to the exercise of any trade or calling.

(3) All citizens of the Czechoslovak Republic may, within the limits laid down by the general law, freely use any language whatsoever, whether in private or business affairs, or in matters of religion, in the Press or in publication of any kind, or in public meetings.

(4) The foregoing provisions shall be without prejudice to the rights of State authorities in such matters in virtue of laws at present in force or hereafter promulgated for the purpose of ensuring public order, the safety of the State or effective supervision by the State.

Some of my friends whom I consulted and who probably had only a superficial glance at the above article were inclined to the view that it was substantially the same as Section 96 of the Government of India Act. A careful comparison of the article with Section 96 will show that the former goes much beyond the latter, which removes disability to hold office by reason of religion, place of birth or descent. The former lays down that none of these matters shall "prejudice" anyone for employment in public services. In the Punjab it is a matter of everyday occurrence that out of two candidates belonging to different castes or communities, the man with inferior qualifications, provided he possesses the minimum qualifications prescribed, is preferred to the man of superior qualifications, if it is the policy of Government to encourage the recruitment of that community or caste. The man who is rejected is "prejudiced" on account of his caste or creed. A man belonging to a tribe which has not been notified is prejudiced in the acquisition of land from vendors belonging to agricultural tribes. But the word "calling," which occurs in paragraph 2 of the article, does not cover the case of preferential right to purchase land from vendors of a certain class. Besides the article if adopted in our constitution will necessitate many administrative changes, which I do not at present advocate. I would confine myself to postulating equality in the rights of citizens for which the preceding pages have shown ample necessity. I am glad to observe that in the Swaraj Constitution framed by Mr. Srinivasa Iyenger, paragraph 2, Article 128, of the Czechoslovak Constitution has been inserted (see page 8 of the Constitution), and that all Parties Conference has also recommended the adoption of this clause in the paragraph dealing with the "declaration of rights." Perhaps the conversations and correspondence with Mr. Iyenger, which I had at Simla last summer, have convinced him that the provision which does not exist in the two Commonwealth of India Bills is necessary.

I would, however, suggest the following draft:—

Draft Clause.

Subject to such domiciliary rules or laws which local Governments may, with the sanction of the Government of India, frame for recruitment to Provincial and subordinate services, no law or administrative order, containing general directions shall impose any civic disability on any caste or community of His Majesty's Indian subjects, or introduce disparity of conditions for the acquisition of any civic right, discriminate between any caste or creed of His Majesty's Indian subjects for the acquisition of any civic right including the right of recruitment to services (civil and military), or deny equal conditions and opportunities to all. All existing laws, rules and orders in contravention of the above provision whereby any one is prejudiced on account of his caste or creed in the acquisition of any civic right representative institutions.

Exceptions.—(1) Fixation of communal seats for representative institutions.

(2) All appointments to be made by the King.

(3) Provision of seats in the Cabinet.

(4) With due regard to efficiency the reservation of one-third of appointments from general and open competition, to encourage the recruitment of backward communities and to redress communal inequalities, the proportion so reserved for civil appointments being maintained and borne in mind for military appointment also, to encourage the enlistment of persons who do not generally offer themselves for recruitment to the rank and file of the army.

(5) Award of scholarships or remission of fees with the view of encouraging the spread of education amongst backward classes.

(6) Separate electorates (a) for Provincial Council and Legislative Assembly in the case of minority communities to be named and in Provinces to be specified in schedule, (b) for local bodies in accordance with the wish of the representatives of the minority community as expressed by the majority of the members belonging to the community on the local body concerned, and ascertained by Local Government.

7. Composition of Public Service Commission for Imperial or for Provincial Services and of Staff Selection Boards.

8. Award of scholarships to encourage the study of Hindi and Sanskrit literature by non-Hindus and Arabic and Persian literature by non-Muslims.

9. The establishment, if necessary, of separate schools for classes who, on account of some local custom, cannot be admitted into ordinary schools.

Nothing in this section relates to the right of entry to or exclusion from temples based on custom or tradition of various communities or interferes in any way with the right of the State authorities to maintain law and order, or to adopt means for the suppression of crime or to supervise and regulate the conduct of classes addicted to crime.

I confess that the draft is a clumsy one, and perhaps the schedule of exceptions is unnecessarily long; but it explains to what length I am prepared to allow exceptions. The law officers of the Crown will, I hope, feel no difficulty in giving a legal shape to the ideas which I have given above. I will now say a few words with regard to each exception:—

Provincial Service may be open only to persons domiciled in the Province. I would not allow, for instance, Indians from Bengal or Behar to compete for the Provincial Service in Burma.

Exception I.—This is necessary, for I advocate reservation of seats for important communities. I see no need to confine reservation to a minority community only. The number of members for each representative body being fixed, the number to be elected by a majority community is fixed automatically by the fixation of seats for minorities. Why should not the seats of a majority community also be fixed?

Exception II.—The King is above the constitution. My object is to prevent abuse of authority by a ruling majority through its Ministers. I doubt if it is at all necessary to have this exception.

Exception III.—I want no important community to be excluded from the Cabinet.

Exception IV.—I do not advocate monopolies, but I would not name any community or caste for which this reservation is made. For all India or Imperial Services a reservation of the sort proposed already exists. I want the principle to be extended to all services, Provincial or those pertaining to local bodies.

On the 4th of May, 1928, Rai Sahib Ganga Ram moved the following resolution:—

This Council recommends to Government that steps may be taken to introduce the training of military drill and the use of firearms, along with the physical drill, in all the Government recognised colleges.

Extracts from my speech and that of Sardar Harbakhsh Singh, member for Hoshiarpur, given in Appendix VII., will show the mentality of the so-called martial classes towards the question of encouraging the recruitment of non-martial classes in the Army. The honourable member would not even allow military training in the colleges for all and sundry. Extracts from my speech and that of Sardar Harbakhsh Singh are given in the Appendix. I have received credible information that, during the last war, Meghs of Sialkote district, who are a depressed class, but who have been reclaimed by the Arya Samaj, offered their services for the Army. They were told that they could be taken only if they would embrace Sikhism. They refused to do so. The Punjab Government has always borne in mind the claims of backward communities and has tried to prevent the undue preponderance of any one community in the services, but neither the Muslim nor the agricultural majority is satisfied. The Muslim majority wants its representation in services in proportion to its population, whilst the agricultural majority insist upon strict fulfilment of the proportions laid down in the Resolution of 1919, a demand which the local Government will be unable to resist when provincial antonomy is given, though even now Government has never contested the rule of proportions fixed by the resolution of 1919, nor the demand of the Muslim majority for recruitment in proportion to population.

Exception V.—To award scholarships or to grant remission of fees is a better way of encouraging education amongst backward classes than to fix proportions for admission to educational institutions. By fixing proportions rejected candidates of an advanced community lose something. Education in the country as a whole makes no advance. The progress of education in certain classes is stopped or retarded in order to make room for backward classes and to enable them to come up to the level of the more advanced. By the award of scholarships to students of backward communities or remission of their fees the advanced community as such loses nothing.

Exception VI.—I do not force joint electorates on minority communities which do not want them.

Exception VII.—In the personnel of the Public Services Commission all important communities must be duly represented.

Exception VIII.—This exception is for carrying out one of my favourite schemes for nationalisation. Although advocacy of the cause of the Hindu community gives a communal tinge to all that I have said in these pages, I do look forward to nationalisation, which is my goal. My only difference with leading public men is that they wish to bring about union by pacts and agreement, whilst I think that nationalisation has to be achieved gradually and slowly. The first step towards the attainment of that end is to bring up the future generations in an atmosphere which fosters a spirit of appreciation of each other's culture. My scheme is propounded in a resolution which is printed in Appendix VIII. Shuddhi and Tabligh may proceed unchecked, but they will make little progress in converting each community to the religion of the other. The study of Hindu literature by Mahomedans and of Mahomedan literature by Hindus will bring them nearer together than either Shuddhi or Tabligh.

Explanation IX.—In Southern India there may be difficulty in admitting untouchables into ordinary schools, hence the exception.

The last para. is important, for in course of my official career it was once my painful duty to quell a disturbance due to some non-Hindus claiming entry into Hindu temples. I also exempt from the operation of this clause the Criminal Tribes Act or any other Act for the suppression of crime.

I do not think the differences of Procedural Law for the trial of civil and criminal cases are covered by the clause proposed; but if they are I would add the following words:—

"or to effect the law of procedure for civil and criminal trials of different classes of His Majesty's subjects." I do not pose as a champion of the cause of "liberty, fraternity and equality." My present object is twofold: (1) To destroy the weeds that interfere with the growth of the plant of responsible Government in the Punjab, and stand in the way of its political advancement, and (2) to help the process of nationalisation, on which I shall dwell later. I wish to avoid all other controversies. I express no opinion one way or the other on differences of procedure which various Acts prescribe, such as the Frontier Crimes Regulation or the Sind Encumbered Estates Act of 1876, the Dekkan Agriculturist Relief Act of 1879, or the Jhansi Encumbered Estates Act of 1882. If Parliament decides that Indians can safely make a further approach towards "liberty and equality," I would welcome such an attitude. But I am only aiming to bring the Punjab on the same level with other Provinces before its future political conditions are assimilated with them. The clause clashes with the law of pre-emption as it exists in the Punjab, but this law is based on the Land Alienation Act. I do not think that differences of caste and creed are elements which determine the right of pre-emption in other Provinces.

The Bundhelkhand Act, which is framed on the same lines as the Punjab Act, will naturally disappear. But it applies to a very limited area, and has, as far as I am aware, no political offshoots. There is no party in the Council of United Province representing the protected tribes or advocating the sacrosanct nature of the law. There is no order of United Province Government prescribing proportions for the protected tribes in various services.

It will probably be said that the clause which I propose is circumscribed by so many exceptions that I virtually admit the necessity of maintaining largely the principle of communal and caste representation. My answer is that in human affairs many conflicting principles have to be reconciled that in human nature whilst the lower propensities cannot be eradicated legislators and moralists always so frame their codes as to subordinate the lower to the higher propensities. Our statute book contains many instances of legislation reconciling conflicting principles. In every free country freedom of speech and discussion is allowed within certain limits, the determination of which is the result of very deep and comprehensive thought and wide experience. Sections 499, 124A and 153A of the Indian Penal Code are examples which illustrate my point. Section 499, which defines "defamation" is encumbered with 10 exceptions and four explanations. The explanations to the Sections 124A and 153A of the Indian Penal Code appear to contradict the main section defining the offence, and it taxes the ingenuity of judges and lawyers to reconcile the two in their application to particular cases. Does it follow that because it is necessary to impose limitations on freedom of speech every one should be allowed to say whatever he likes?

I can conceive no possible objection to the adoption of the clause. It only extends the principles embodied in Section 87 of the Government of India Act of 1833 and of Section 96 of the Government of India Act of 1919. It gives statutory sanction to a principle announced in Despatch No. 44 of the Court of Directors, dated 10th December, 1833, not only in respect of appointments but also in respect of other rights. I would request the Commission to consult various local Governments and inquire with what local laws of any importance the clause clashes. I do not think that Hindus in provinces in which they are in a majority will object to it. Advanced politicians may not approve of exceptions. Resolution No. 13, passed at the 9th Annual Session of the Hindu Mahasabha of 1926, which is a representative body of Hindus, affirms the principle which I advocate.

Resolution No. 13.—The Hindu Mahasabha is emphatically of opinion (1) that as the principle of communal representation and separate electorates far from bringing the different communities together, has proved a serious hindrance to the growth of the national feeling and to the smooth working of Municipal, District, Provincial and National Representative Institutions, it is the duty of the Hindu politicians of all shades of political opinion to make a determined stand against this vicious principle.

That in any future scheme of Provincial autonomy or Responsible Self-Government an express clause be inserted declaring it illegal for any Provincial Government to discriminate by caste and creed in respect of acquisition of civic rights or posts in public services.

The Christian minority in India would welcome the clause, so would the Brahmin minority in Madras. It is difficult to say anything definitely with regard to the Mahomedans in Provinces where they are in a minority. The political outlook of the depressed classes is still in a nebulous condition. They have been giving expression to fears which they entertain about their rights in a régime which is domineered by caste-ridden Hindus. I can conceive of no better way of protecting their rights than by the insertion of this clause.

Before concluding this part of my note, I may state that the safeguard proposed by the Congress of 1916 for the protection of the interests of minorities accepted by Muslim League and now reiterated by Mr. Srinivasa Iyenger in his Constitution, viz., that no Bill or resolution introduced into a Council affecting one or the other community shall be proceeded with if three-fourths of the members of the community oppose the Bill, affords no practical solution. It is apt to create deadlocks. A dissatisfied minority may become obstructive and may oppose every measure brought forward by the Minister representing the majority. Minorities generally oppose measures of decentralisation, whilst majority communities favour them. Ministers will be greatly handicapped in their work by the insertion of the provision which several political bodies have advocated.

I have perused with very great interest the Swaraj Constitution framed by Mr. C. Vijiaraghavachariar of Salem, who was President of the Indian National Congress in 1920. There is not the least doubt that if his scheme of Swaraj which proposes a unitary form of government were adopted, the rights of the Hindu minority in North-West India would be quite safe. He proposes one Parliament for the Commonwealth of India consisting of an Upper and a Lower House. As to the Provinces, he proposes Provincial Councils. (Section 132 of the Constitution). But he leaves it to Parliament "to make laws for investing the provincial authority with such powers as it deems necessary."

As far as the Hindu minority is concerned there is no objection to the scheme, but I fear we have gone so far in the direction of provincial autonomy, though we have not yet completely attained it, that it is difficult to retrace our steps. The tendency is towards decentralisation and not towards centralisation which Mr. Vijiaraghavachariar proposes.

There may be some other ways of getting out of the shackles created by the Land Alienation Act, though I can think of none. But I would be taking too parochial a view of politics were I to be satisfied only with something which removes the political excrescences of the Act peculiar to the Punjab. A clause in the constitution protecting the interest of minorities is the best safeguard for all minorities, and I see no reason why a general provision of this kind should not be inserted. I see nothing impracticable about it.

The Muslim majority or the agricultural majority might say that the Hindu minority or the urban intelligentsia who have got a start over the others in education wish to deprive them of protective measures and reservations. The answer which I would advise the more advanced or the intellectually better gifted classes to give is "All right, we are prepared to wait till you are able to make up the leeway."

British Element in Services.

Whilst dealing with this subject I am treading on rather a delicate ground, I am sure to be accused of a slave mentality by some of my countrymen. But there are two ways in which human affairs are dealt with and two classes of men who deal with them. There are men who create forces confident that their creation will be to the ultimate good of humanity regardless, however, of the immediate consequences which result. There are others who, taking account of the forces which exist and of those which are immediately in prospect, evolve a plan of action. Both classes of men are honest and society benefits by the proper performance of the functions of each. I belong to the latter category, however humble may be the position which I occupy. A writer on the French Revolution gives a high meed of praise to men of this class, says Mr. Mallat "that high-pitched theories and philanthropic aims are, after all, only as dust in the balance, compared with the many sober qualities of wisdom required for the effective administration of a State." I do not lay the slightest claim to wisdom in the art of administration. All that I wish to emphasise is that political statics is as important as political dynamics. I lag behind no one in my sense of self-respect, I do not in the least undervalue the services of that class of men who fall under the first category. Were it not for them there would be no change, and no improvement. The world would be stagnant without them. But when constructing a policy or helping in the framing of a constitution it is impossible to shut our eyes to realities. The functions of the framers of a constitution who find remedies for diseases or infirmities of the body politic, are very similar to those of doctors, who tackle with ailments of the physical body. Patients or friends would be failing in their duty if they refrained on sentimental grounds from disclosing any organic weaknesses from which the patient suffered, even if their disclosures were humiliating or cast a reflection on the previous life of the patient. I will, however, abstain from dealing with specific facts and will only lay down certain general propositions.

1. Communities that cannot come to unanimity on such trivial matters as "Music before Mosques" and "Slaughter of Animals" are not likely to unite on such a momentous question as the defence of the land frontier.

2. Mutual distrust of communities rises to its climax on occasions on which internal peace is disturbed by collision between them, and when the help of the third party is invoked. If the third party did not exist these percussions would be wider and more acute than they are now, and the problem of external defence would crop up oftener than it does now.

But it is said that (a) the very existence of the third party prevents our nationalisation, which it does most insidiously by actively adopting a policy designed to keep the communities divided. (b) And that officers who are able to rise above communal bias are by no means rare amongst us.

I admit that the mere presence of a third party takes away all incentives to self help, creates a desire to secure the aid of the third party, and thus keeps up the separative attitude of the communities constantly promoting a scrambling after power on the part of each. Much will depend on the quantum of impartiality which our men bring to bear on the discharge of their duties and the support which they get from the communities, which again will depend on the mutual relations between the communities and their attitude towards each other. If impartial men receive no encouragement from their own men, if each community disowns its own officers who in their work show a high standard of altruistic feeling, or if the men of the reverse type are apotheosised, impartiality will cease to be a virtue. The condition of things which the opposite school wants to introduce will be different from those prevailing now. At present we have still a third party which lays down a standard of impartiality (perhaps not between its own community and others) and maintains it. When that party has ceased to exist the standard of impartiality will be laid for each officer by his own community. What that standard will be will be determined by the underlying relations between the communities. It must not be forgotten that education has awakened a sense of corporate existence, which has naturally, as the country is divided into communities, taken the communal form. But it may be said that the weaker community in each part of the country will submit to its stronger rival, and the conflict will die out in each part automatically. My answer is that it will not, and it will have its repercussions in the whole country, perhaps abroad. The whole question resolves itself into the solution of the problem referred to in the first proposition.

As to insidious attempts to foment and keep up discord, I have suggested a solution, and if my proposals are accepted, such attempts will become rare, if they will not altogether disappear. This will prepare the way for amalgamation and union, but will not by itself bring it about. After all, constitutions affect only a part of the life of a citizen and not the whole of it. Nationalisation will depend on the work of religious and social reconstruction which our leaders undertake. It may, however, be observed that the presence of a third party is not always a disintegrating force, it may prove to be a uniting force. If the elements of disunion are properly studied and honest and vigorous efforts are made to remove them, it is not impossible to attain, in course of time, that degree of homogeneity which exists in Western societies. A mere political union for the purpose of obtaining political advantages is no union, it is only temporary. It disappears when the external force is removed and the controversies which follow assume acute forms. Let it be brought home to the mind of the people that the third party is there because they are disunited and let the best brains amongst us bestow their thoughts to a deep analysis of the elements of disunion and the best way of removing them.

If the British element in services is to be retained the mode of their recruitment, their emoluments and conditions of service should be the same as those recommended by the Lee Commission. Their proportion in different Provinces may vary. So far as the Punjab is concerned, I will not for the next ten years reduce it beyond that fixed by the Lee Commission. In North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan the present preponderance of Europeans in the higher services should be diminished only slightly, if at all.

PUBLIC SERVICES COMMISSION.

Public Service Commissions now exist in all the self-governing colonies. Section 96 (c) of the Government of India Act of 1919 provides for the appointment of a Public Service Commission for India, but the scope of the Commission may extend to what is called the Central Service Class II. or to Provincial Service, if the Governor-General or the Governor so desires. The discretion of the Governor-General in Council or of the Governor in Council should not be a factor in determining the jurisdiction of the Commission with regard to different classes of services. Even with regard to All-India Services or to Central Service Class I. the Governor-General in Council may or may not consult the commission on any question connected with their recruitment, though in practice he always does. As far I am aware the Provincial Services of all Provinces have not yet been placed under their jurisdiction. The circumstances which led to the appointment of such a Commission in Canada are graphically described in Keith's book on Responsible Government in the Dominions. Professor Keith says,* "The appointment of public officers was always a matter in which political influence had a good deal to do in the first place, then promotions were often influenced by political considerations, and, if the holders of office were not dismissed when a new Government came in, they might in other ways be made to feel that their presence in the office was not desired, as there were others whose claims demanded the close attention of Ministers." Further on I find the following passage: "It appeared that nomination from a list of qualified candidates was the order of the day, that such nominations were political jobs, and that, after appointment, success depended on further political influence; there was little regular promotion, and all the best posts were reserved by Ministers for rewarding their friends, with the result that the service was utterly disorganised, the members of the service who owed their posts to political nominations being indifferent to discipline."

If "communal" were substituted for "political", in the quotations given above every word of them would apply more or less to what has been happening in the Punjab since the Reform Scheme came into operation. Professor Gulshan Rai's pamphlet, which was placed by me before the Commission in the course of my interview, cites specific cases of appointments and supersessions which caused deep resentment amongst the Hindus. In 1922 certain Hindu members asked for the appointment of a Board (so constituted that no community in it would predominate), which would go into all cases of supersession of officials who entered into services before recruitment into services on communal grounds was introduced. Government refused to appoint such a Board.

There will be no peace in the country until recruitment of all kinds of services is vested in an independent Board. Communal differences will take the place of political differences in the West. Suspicion of communal partiality creates a resentment which is wider and more intense than the suspicion of partiality supposed to be due to political differences. There are very few countries in which jealousies due to political differences filter down to masses; jealousies due to communal differences do.

As to the status of the Commission and its functions the following passage is pertinent:—

* "The new Act, which was passed with the concurrence of the opposition, provides for a permanent Civil Service Commission which, at the desire of the opposition, was made in tenure of office on an equal footing with the Auditor-General. This Commission is to hold examinations and decide the fitness of candidates for the posts for which they are recommended by them. They are also to give certificates for increases of salary and for the promotion and improvement of status. Moreover, instead of the system of nomination from a list of passed candidates there is to be appointment by merit in the examinations." The trend of opinion of the members of the Punjab Council is that success in examinations is rather a demerit than a merit. The Provincial Public Commission will have the same jurisdiction about disciplinary action taken against the members of the Provincial or other services as the Indian Commission has under Rule 10, in respect of similar action taken against members of the All-India Services.

While discussing the protective clause I have already made some remarks on the working of the local bodies and have emphasised the importance of regulating their power of making appointments. The Provincial Public Service Commission will either by itself or through a board appointed by it control the more important appointments under local bodies, whilst for ministerial posts, a Staff Selection Board may be constituted.

The members of the Public Services Commission for All-India Services should be appointed by the King; those for the Provincial Services by Government of India. All the Commissions and Boards, Imperial or Provincial, will act in accordance with the principle laid down in the clause, the insertion of which, in the constitution, I have proposed.

Joint responsibility of the Ministers will I hope be a feature of the Cabinet system of government which it is expected will be introduced with provincial autonomy. The Ministers must belong to different communities, for which I have made a provision in the schedule of exceptions to the protective clause. It will be impossible to work joint responsibility so long as the power of making appointments rests with the Ministers. In paragraph 6 of the Punjab Administration Report of 1923-24 the following observation is made on the joint responsibility of Ministers under the present dyarchic system of government:—

"The co-operation of Ministers would indeed inevitably be in inverse ratio to the activity of their championship of communal sentiment. The co-ordination which actually attained between the first two Ministers was therefore due rather to a mutual spirit of goodwill than identity of policy."

LEGAL MACHINERY TO ENFORCE THE CLAUSE.

Both Dr. Besant's Commonwealth of India Bill and the Independent Labour Party's Bill propose the appointment of a Supreme Court. The object appears to be twofold: to reduce considerably the number of appeals to King in Council, and to establish a Court with jurisdiction over matters arising under the constitution or involving its interpretation. I feel diffidence in expressing my opinion on a matter involving legal points. There appeared to me to be some diffierence of opinion amongst friends whom I consulted as to the competence of Indian Courts to question the validity of laws made by the Government of India. All my doubts on this point were, however, removed on a reference to Dicey's well-known book Introduction to the Study of Law of Constitution. At page 96 of Chapter VIII of that book I find the following passage:—

"The Courts in India (or in any other part of the British Empire) may, when the occasion arises, pronounce upon the validity or constitutionality of laws made by the Indian Council." In support of this view 3 Indian Law Report (Calcutta series), page 63, is cited. This case went up on appeal to the Privy Council and the power of the Calcutta High Court to pronounce on the validity of an Act passed by the Imperial Council was not questioned. If, however, there is still some doubt as to the power of Indian Courts to question the constitutionality of an Act, necessary power can be given to the High Court by Parliament without creating a Supreme Court.

SECTION III.—NORTH-WEST FRONTIER PROVINCE AND BALUCHISTAN.

The extension of Reforms to North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan, and the treatment in this respect of these Provinces at par with other Provinces and the attitude of Hindus towards reforms, are questions on which great confusion of thought is to be found. It is necessary to explain what the Hindus' demands are. These impose no insurmountable difficulty in the way of further advance.

The number of Hindus in these two Provinces is very small and their anxiety to safeguard their own interests in any measure introducing popular government in these Provinces is fully justified. Total population of North-West Frontier Province is 2,251,340 and of Baluchistan is 420,648, and the population of Hindus, Jains and Sikhs is 177,924 and 46,340 respectively. Christians in these two Provinces (North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan) are 10,610 and 6,678 respectively. The demand of the Hindus in these Provinces is nothing more than what has been sketched in the previous pages, viz., that a clause condemning all discrimination by caste and creed for the acquisition of civic rights beyond the limitations stated should be incorporated in the constitution, that a legal machinery to enforce the clause should be created if it does not exist already, and that the jurisdiction of Public Services Commission should be extended to the area and to all the services therein. If it is impossible to meet these demands the Hindus are opposed to any measure of devolution. If it is not, they are indifferent. What the measure of devolution should be and what should be the exact form of government to be introduced are questions with which Hindus as such are not more vitally concerned than others. There are, I believe, difficulties in treating these two Provinces on a par with other Provinces—difficulties for which officers connected with the Civil and Military administration are in a better position to find a solution. It appears from official papers concerning these two Provinces that the expenses of administration exceed the income. For the year 1925-26 the income of North-West Frontier Province was Rs. 78,49,115 and expenditure on the administration Rs. 2,84,25,237. In the case of British Baluchistan for the year 1925-26 the expenditure was Rs. 85,52,392, against an income of Rs. 21,84,778. Government of India metes out doles to these two Provinces to enable them to carry on the government. In this respect alone, not to mention other distinguishing features, these two Provinces differ from other Indian Provinces. The other peculiar feature of these Provinces is that they have political agencies for territories outside of British India, the administration of which has a close bearing on the administration of British territory properly so called. Both are Frontier Provinces with a population highly excitable and primitive. The percentage of literacy is much lower amongst Muslims who form the bulk of the population than amongst Muslims of United Provinces or Punjab. The establishment of Government responsible to the people of the Province and to be controlled by them may affect the defence of the Empire as a whole. These are questions on which the military officers of Government (His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and his military advisers) are in a better position to give opinions than any Hindu living in the Province or outside who has no knowledge of the problems of Indian defence and no experience of the way in which it is carried on.

I may here give some figures showing the proportion of the Hindus in some of the services.

In the Education Department, Imperial or Provincial, the Civil List for October, 1927, shows no Hindu. It shows two Hindu Tehsildars out of 29 and 10 Naib-Tehsildars out of 84. The names of the members of the Provincial Service are not given in the quarterly Civil List; but I learn that out of 42 members of the Provincial Service only three are Hindus or 7 per cent., barely equal to the proportion of Hindus in the population. The names of Munsiffs also are not given in the Civil List; but I am told that out of nine Munsiffs there is only one Hindu. The census figures show that literacy amongst Hindus is much higher than amongst Muslims, being 24 against 2 per cent. A reference to the quarterly Civil List for July, 1904, shows that there were out of five extra assistant settlement officers two Hindus and one Sikh, and out of 19 Provincial Civil Service men there were six Hindus. It will not be right to hold that Hindus are of no use in the services of North-West Frontier Province. A Hindu of North-West Frontier Province cannot get into Provincial Service of other Provinces where men domiciled in the Province would naturally get preference over them. To the Hindus of North-West Frontier Province therefore the door of Government service is now practically closed.

Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency, in the course of his speech delivered on the 13th July, 1927, in the Punjab Council, said:—"In the second place, as I said yesterday, always bearing in mind the supreme need for efficiency, Government aims at avoiding the undue preponderance of any one class in the public service to the prejudice of the reasonable claims of other classes of the community. This is the ideal to which we work, some honourable members may consider unsuccessfully, but nevertheless let me assure them that we do work sincerely and constantly to try to secure this principle.

Sir Alexander Muddiman, in his speech in the Legislative Assembly delivered on the 2nd of March, 1925, though explaining the system of recruitment for the Indian Civil Service, said: "I admit, and Government have admitted before, that there should be an adequate representation of minority communities." This remark applied presumably to all services.

In the notification of the Home Department of India, dated 14th October, 1926, reproducing the resolution of the Secretary of State for India which defines the functions of the Public Service Commission, there is a reference in Rule 5 to recruitment by selection, "owing to the failure of a competitive examination to give adequate representation to different communities."

All these principles are ignored when their operation favours the Hindu minority. I am not here advocating the cause of the Hindus under the present system of Government, and though it is true, as one of our prominent public men said in his recent speech in the Legislative Assembly, that, under the Reforms system of Government, the Hindus could not fare worse than they did under the present system, yet there is no reason why I should exclude the Hindu minority of the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan from the benefit of the protective clause which I propose for the Hindu minority in the Punjab.

I have to add that, if the elective system of the representation were introduced in North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan, the Hindu minority in these two Provinces should receive the same weightage as the Mahomedan minority gets in Provinces in which they form minority of the same proportion.

Do the Mahomedans of North-West Frontier Province work the reforms with the safeguards proposed by me for the Hindu minority?

Conclusion.

I have confined myself to the question of the protection of the rights of the Hindu minority of North-Western India. I am strongly of opinion that the indispensable conditions of a further political advance in the Punjab are:—

1. That joint electorates should be introduced for the Punjab Council with reservation of seats for the communities, and that if a Council is created for North-West Frontier Province then separate electorates for Hindus if they want them.
2. That a clause on the lines proposed by me to restrict the principle of determining civic rights on the basis of caste and creed be inserted in the constitution.
3. That legal machinery be created, if one does not already exist, to enforce the clause.
4. That recruitment to all kinds of services be vested in an independent board, so constituted that, whilst all important communities are represented on it, no community predominates and that disciplinary action taken by the Ministers be made appealable to the board.
5. That the British elements in services should be maintained during the next ten years, as proposed.

If for any reason of which I have no conception it is not possible to provide these safeguards, I would advise the Hindu minority in North-Western India to oppose all recommendations for further advance. I am not prepared to advocate advance of democratic Government on lines which involve a negation of the fundamental principles of democracy, namely, the equality of all human beings. Such a Government will not be a popular Government, but a class or communal Government. I would ask the Hindus to discriminate between bread and stone, to visualise what their condition would be whether of freemen or of slaves if the safeguards above recommended and found in the constitution of several Western countries which have democratic institutions were not adopted. They should not be carried away by the ordinary political slogans about self-government, provincial autonomy and freedom. If the safeguards were not adopted the whole power will pass into the hands of a group of castes which comprise only one-fourth of the Hindu population, and constitute about half the total population of the Province, not to speak of the humiliation involved to those outside the privileged class. It does not matter if two-fifths of the Muslim population and nearly one-third of the Sikh population do not raise their voice. If called upon to wait for a while they should show sufficient spirit of prudential self-sacrifice till popular democratic Government can be introduced unalloyed by caste or communal discrimination for the acquisition of important civic rights. Caste or communities will continue to exist for some time in India, and do exist in other Provinces. But the Punjab politics have some peculiar features of their own. The octopus of communal or caste discrimination has thrown its tentacles far wider in the Punjab than elsewhere, and before Punjab and North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan can be treated on a par with other Provinces the tentacles must be cut and reduced to the size which the octopus has in other Provinces. If the operation takes a long time the Hindus should wait till the tentacles are reduced to the dimensions which may be considered to be normal for India. No other Province, as far as I am aware, represents the political characteristics of the Punjab. I am not aware of the conditions prevailing in the South, but looking from a distance it appears that the non-Brahman majority in Madras will be content with the reservation of a proportion of appointments for backward classes.

In no part of India exists a statute which imposes comparative disability in the acquisition of certain important civic rights on a class of which the Muslims form a large proportion, nor has Government anywhere promised preferential treatment for recruitment in services to a class of which the Mahomedans form a small proportion. Yet no Hindu finds fault with Mahomedans if they make all steps in political advancement conditional on their rights being properly safeguarded.

Having concentrated all my attention on the question of the protection of Hindu minority, I have naturally not devoted much time on thinking out what further advance towards responsible Government should be recommended for this Province, and this for various reasons. First, democratic Government, being the rule of the majority and the cleavage between majority and minority communities being on religious lines, the mental attitude of those who advocate further devolution of powers to majorities is not the same as that of those who insist on the protection of the interest of minorities. A great deal of confusion in Indian politics has arisen owing to the functions of the two classes of advocates being mixed up and being merged in the same individuals. It may generally be asserted of our public men that, with few exceptions, no one is unmindful of the interest of the community or class to which he belongs, nor is anyone wanting in having nationalism as his goal. Individuals differ from one another only in the intensity of the communal or national feeling. It would, however, tend to clearer thinking and better work if the two classes were separated, one advocating legitimate minority rights, and the other the rights of the majority.

Secondly, as I am of opinion that Hindus of the Punjab should ask for no further advance until their legitimate rights are duly protected in the manner suggested by me, and I do not know whether my suggestions would be accepted, I am not in a position to propose what further steps should be recommended.

Thirdly, it is very difficult for me to foresee how the Hindus will be affected by further changes made in the system of Government. The only attitude that I can reasonably adopt towards specific proposals made by the other side is that I have no objection to what is proposed. The Hindu leaders who took part in the proceedings of the Congress of 1916 and who accepted the principle of communal representation and of separate electorates even for the Provinces where Muslims were in majority, did not realise how these two principles would work in the Punjab. I am not going to repeat the mistake of the Hindu leaders of 1916.

I should now like to say a few words to the leaders whose mandate for the boycott of the Commission I have ventured to disobey. I must at the outset state that I am behind no one in entertaining feelings of reverence and respect towards them. No one can question the value of their services to the country and community and the sacrifices made by them. My work as a public man in the Punjab covers only a few years. They have devoted their whole lives to it. My record of service, if record it may be called, sinks into insignificance as compared with theirs. But every humble member of the heirarchy of public workers should be given freedom of conscience and the right to act according to his best lights. I have been carefully reading the criticism of our leaders, which sometimes assumes the form of a tirade against the Hindu co-operators of the Punjab. I have been able to cull three main points in their criticism. (1) That all that the Punjab Hindus or, for the matter of that, Hindus of the other Provinces can say for themselves will be supplied to the Commission by Punjab Government and the local Governments of other Provinces. (2) That the British Government is wedded to a policy of partiality and divide et impera, and (3) that the action of the Hindu co-operators of the Punjab is one of super-orrogation and defiance of the Hindus of the other Provinces and calculated to ruin their own cause and that of the Hindus in general. I take up each point separately.

I do not think that a comparative statement such as I have prepared showing the diversity of practice in the treatment of minorities will be prepared or laid by any local Government before the Commission. The utmost that the Behar, United Provinces and Central Provincial Governments will say is that though the Muslin minorities in those Provinces are liberally treated, yet they are dissatisfied with the Reforms. The Hindus of these Provinces mentioned above are not objecting to representation of Muslims in the services in excess of their numerical strength in the population. Muslims are co-operating all over the country and in every Province. Will local Governments of these Provinces say that the over representation of Muslims in these Provinces should be reduced? Will the note prepared by the Punjab Government get comparative figures from Provinces where Muslims are in a minority? I cannot swear, but I am almost certain that the Punjab Government will not prepare any such statement. It is not their duty to do so, on the contrary the figures collected by the Punjab Government will show that, considering the numerical strength of Muslims in the Punjab they are under-represented in services, and in spite of it Hindus are grumbling. Is it any duty of the Punjab Government to try to unravel the minds of the Hindus whilst the Hindus themselves maintain not only a reticent, but a defiant attitude which boycott implies? By what mysterious process can Sir Malcolm Hailey discover the argument that if limitations on the recruitment of persons belonging to minorities are not observed in other Provinces they should not be observed in the Punjab? How is it the duty of Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency (who supports the policy of equitable distribution of appointments amongst all the communities so as not to allow the preponderance of any one community in the services) to try to discover that the policy is more honoured in the breach than in observance in North-West Frontier Province? Is there any record of the Punjab Government to show the numerical strength of what are called agricultural tribes? I was the first to bring this matter to their notice. If I had intended to boycott the Commission, if I had adopted the attitude which leaders prescribe for all of us it would have been inconsistent on my part to point out that the non-agricultural tribes in the Province form either a majority or a very strong minority. The Punjab Government know that the members of agricultural tribes form a majority in the Council; but I do not think that Government would have gone to the length of ascertaining the caste of each member and thereby ascertaining their exact proportion in the Council. Is there any record of the Punjab Government to show that though the Hindu non-agricultural tribes form a larger proportion of the Hindu population of the Punjab (what the exact proportion is no Government record shows) the voters of the Hindu non-agriculturists form a minority? Is it any interest of the Punjab Government to enter on such elaborate calculations? I have had my calculations made by my clerks specially employed for this work. Is it any duty of the Punjab Government to think out the reasons of this over-representation? I brought them to their notice, and I could not have done so if I had determined to boycott the Commission. To assume that the Commission and the local Government will study the case of the Hindus of the Punjab unaided by any evidence which they might produce is inconsistent with the objection under the second head, viz., that the whole Government, from the British Cabinet down to local Government, is wedded to a policy of partiality for Muslims and that the Commission has come with a clear mandate from the Cabinet to maintain that policy.

In my opinion the Hindu minority in North-Western India has an overwhelmingly strong case, and though accused of "stupendous folly" by a responsible journal for adopting the policy of co-operation, I am of opinion that folly lies the other way. That defendant is a fool who, having a strong case, does not argue it before a tribunal and assumes that the tribunal, unaided by any counsel, will discover the weakness of the plaintiff's case. I do not know if any tribunal, however circumspect and conscientious, has done so for a defendant who is not only reticent but defiant. After all, plaintiff has a plausible case the weakness of which can be exposed only by comparative figures.

Second point. There is some force in the second argument, but, even here, the Hindu leaders themselves are not free from blame. In support of my view, I would quote an author whose opinion carries great weight, who is a publicist of standing and whose early traditions and associations have been very different from mine. Referring to communal representation and to the mischief "in making the electorates communal and separate," says Mr. C. S. Ranga Iyer, in his recent book Father India, page 122:—

"I must frankly admit that the responsibility for misleading Mr. Montagu lay entirely with the politicians of the National Congress and the Muslim League. When he rejected the Congress League Scheme, it was a pity that he chose to accept the evil in it, namely, separate representation. The Reforms were only an experiment."

As observed at the outset, it is not generally recognised in England or in India that there is a Hindu minority also in North-West India which has grievances which will be aggravated by further extension of Reforms, if matters are left as they are. Muslim leaders claim everywhere for Muslims the rights of a minority community. I have not come across a single speech of a Mahomedan publicist (except the Convocation address at Lahore by Mr. Haidery) in which the Muslims had been described as a majority community in the Punjab and were asked to treat the minority community with a consideration which a minority community deserves. The propagation of the error that Muslims are everywhere in a minority is due to the indifference of the Punjab Hindus who never raised their voice, afraid of being dubbed as communalists. Hindu leaders of other Provinces, on the other hand, actively encourage the propagation of this error. An eminent Hindu leader of United Provinces, held in high esteem, in one of his presidential addresses says: "Here permit me to say, that in a matter of this kind the responsibility of the majority community, namely the Hindus, is greater than that of the minorities," which evidently means that the responsibility of Hindu leaders is to turn a deaf ear to the outcries of the Hindu minority in North-West India. Punjab Muslim leaders of high position, fully acquainted as they are with the Punjab conditions, take advantage of this attitude of Hindu leaders. One of them is reported to have said in a speech that a community brought up in the tradition of the Joint Family System, and accustomed to be guided by the elder head of the family, cannot be made to recognise the rights of the junior members, forgetting that in the Punjab, where most of the points of controversy between Hindus and Muslims have arisen, points which are more difficult to solve than the fewer issues in other Provinces, the Hindus are the junior members. In the face of all this the Hindus of the Punjab are interdicted from pressing their claims as a minority community even before the Commission on the assumption that the Commission is a fraud.

I express no opinion one way or the other on the policy of the Swaraj Party, but if the majority of the Hindus everywhere go to wreck Councils and to refuse all offices, and if the administration everywhere is carried on with the support of Muslim members, Government have no other course than to keep them in good humour, with the result that we find in Assam, where the Muslims are in a minority, that all offices in the Council except that of Deputy-President are held by non-Hindus. Whether this desire on the part of Government to propitiate Muslims will continue or not after Provincial autonomy has been given is a different matter; but for the present a predilection in favour of Muslims is clearly explicable. The whole confusion arises from mixing up communal and nationalistic aims and ideals.

I am not prepared to believe that the Commission is a farce, and that the British nation does not contain even a modicum of wise and honest men, having an effective voice in Parliament. Had it been so, there would have been no British Empire, or it would not have lasted as long as it has. No Government, however autocratic, can be carried on if absolutely devoid of moral support. Though in the past physical force was a determining factor in locating the centre of political authority, yet moral considerations have begun to play a very important part in the recognition of popular rights. Constitutional agitation has been recognised as an effective weapon. India of 1928 is very different from what India was 50 years ago. The cause of the people has made some advance, and all this has been achieved without physical force. Such revolutionary crime as has made its appearance now and then and here and there has been considered merely as evidence of the existence of acute discontent and of a more widespread desire on the part of the people to take part in the administration of the country. It has not been a compelling force.

I Would now Deal with the Third Objection.

I do not see how the Hindu co-operators of the Punjab are ruining the cause of the Hindus in other Provinces. I have proposed nothing, with the exception of one thing, which has not received the seal of approval of the whole of the Hindu community in India, and which was not approved by the Mahasabha, a body representative of all the Hindus. Am I to be blamed as a renegade from the Mahasabha because I espouse the cause which the Mahasabha championed? I have suggested certain exceptions, thus moderating my demands, acting on the maxim that half a loaf is better than no loaf, but Hindus in the Punjab and elsewhere can say that the schedule of exceptions is not required. From Calcutta to Peshawar, from Himalaya to Cape Comorin, we find the whole of the Hindu Press denouncing communalism. It was, however, left for the 9th Session of the Mahasabha, at which my humble self presided, to pass a resolution that a clause should be inserted in the constitution condemning the discrimination of civic rights on the basis of caste and creed. Is not the Mahasabha morally estopped from interdicting me and other Hindus from pressing before the Commission the adoption of the principle which the Mahasabha advocated? I now ask whether it is super-arrogation on the part of the Punjab Hindus to do their best in pushing forward Mahasabhas' principles touching their vital interests or whether it is super-arrogation on the part of the leaders to accuse conscientious workers of disobedience of orders supposed to have been necessitated under conditions which are of a temporary nature, namely, the insult involved in Indians being excluded from the Commission, creating a suspicion that the Commission intends to do nothing? There may be amongst co-operators men who have their selfish ends to serve, but where on earth exists a political party of organisation all the members of which are selfless patriots?

The one point on which Provinces, other than the Punjab, may differ from me is that the retention of the British elements in the services is desirable. I do not wish to give more arguments than those I have already given in a general way in the section dealing with this point. If Hindus of other Provinces who are not members of the Congress feel that they do not require British agency in services, let them say so. The Mahasabha has said nothing to the contrary. Perhaps the location of its office in Delhi has prevented it from passing a resolution that "the British Army of occupation" should withdraw. Mutual distrust between the communities is a marked feature of Indian politics of the present day. Anyone who runs may read it. The Commission will naturally come to the conclusion that the time has not come for the entire removal of the British agency even if the minority communities, who are likely to suffer most in each Province, do not say this in so many words. All minorities are laying their case before the Commission, why should not the Hindu minority, wherever it exists, do so? The tendency of the minorities is to propose restrictions on the exercise of the power of majorities, who generally object to restrictions. If the scheme which the Commission evolves proposes more restrictions than what the majorities would tolerate, the majorities would be partly to blame, as they are not putting their case before the Commission. I, however, see no justification why the Hindu minority alone should sleep over its rights. Is it any satisfaction to the Hindus of the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province to find that, whilst they themselves are to be treated as helots in their own Province, Hindus in other Provinces are free. Is any Mahomedan in India expected to derive consolation from the fact that, whilst he himself is in bondage, Turkey and Afghanistan are free?

My Expectations from the Commission and the Joint Parliamentary Committee.

If the Central Legislatures appoint a committee to collaborate with the Commission I hope to secure the support of some of its Indian members, but if the entire responsibility of formulating proposals, after studying the conditions of each Province on data produced, falls on the Commission. I would invite their attention to that which is the raison d'être of a purely parliamentary commission, and which distinguishes it from a round table conference of Indian leaders. The Commission should not look forward to compromises between communities. The present state of Indian society does not encourage one to expect that the different communities will come to a mutual agreement. Each community will argue its own case, and will put before the Commission its own idea of justice. It will be impossible for the Commission to satisfy everyone, and the Commission will have to form its own opinion as to what is just. Justice, though an abstraction, has a reality and a concrete existence when applied to practical affairs of human life. Its scope covers the whole of human conduct, including politics and political action. I am confident that the Commission will not be influenced by the boycott or co-operation of classes or communities. I hope my suggestions will not be taken piecemeal. I have not argued the case of the Hindu minority as an advocate blind to what may be said on the other side, and have not adopted the tactics of a chess player. To the best of my humble capacity I have tried to take a comprehensive view, for I am not negotiating with an individual, but I am putting my case before a board, and I am sure that my case will not suffer for the mentality so displayed.

I should now like to say a word as to the essential requirements of the constitution suited to the present stage of India's political progress. I doubt if the Commission or the Joint Parliamentary Committee will be in a position to recommend a long step towards the goal of Dominion Status. Before that status becomes achievable the numerous bridges dividing Indian society should be engulfed, and this is largely a work which has to be carried out by Indians themselves. Our political leaders have felt the need of social reforms and social reconstruction which has not yet been completed. But no Indian, however broad his outlook and however high his aims, can hope to succeed, or will venture to undertake the work, as long as the disintegrating forces of laws made by the State or of policy followed by its Executive Officers continue to operate. The preceding pages afford ample illustrations of the diversity of practice which is liable to misinterpretation. We should welcome the association of British officers, both in the civil and military administration of India; we cannot dispense with them. But the objection that their association with us is an obstacle to our nation building must be removed. Our fissiparousness is cited as an argument against Swaraj. Let it not be said that Government itself is responsible for "perpetuating the disqualification" and for "creating the vicious circle." Backward classes can be protected or encouraged by Government without Government being laid open to the charge that they adopt the policy of robbing Peter to pay Paul. It is no use for high officers of Government to deliver sermons on communal unity if orders like those of the Bombay Government, which practically tell the Hindus to stop all their education till the Muslims are able to come up to their level, are tolerated. The lamentations of officers are apt to be described as crocodile tears, and the officers are liable to be accused of running with the hare and hunting with the hounds. Let the constitution forbid such a course, so far as constitutions can do so, and it is for Indians themselves to do the rest of the work towards nationalisation. It is impossible now to suppress the thirst for self-government, freedom or independence. The precedents of bureaucratic rule have a very limited application in a democratic or a popular system of government. People have now to be prepared for Swaraj, and they cannot be so prepared if discrimination by caste and creed are allowed to the extent or in the manner depicted in the preceding pages. To allow these disintegrating forces, for which the State is responsible, to remain in full operation, and in consequence to be unable to do anything to quench the thirst for self-government, is to prepare the country for anarchy or revolution. The extremist politicians say that anarchy is better than British rule, and that rule by one community over the other is better than British rule. Are the people to be given the choice between the two kinds of anarchies? Surely the British politicians can devise a course of orderly progress giving full scope to the work of Indians who aim at nation building, and it will be a proud day for England herself when the various Indian sections are welded into a nation and are able to enjoy the full status of a self-governing dominion, fit to take their place in the comity of nations which constitute the British Empire.

I am sure that the Joint Parliamentary Committee and the Parliament have in them statesmen who are inspired by noble sentiments, such as are portrayed in the following extract from a poem which I read in a paper soon after the inauguration of the Reform Scheme:—

Sick men reviving scorn the arts that wean'd
  Their body from death or torment, and despise
The arm on which so late their weakness lean'd
  And soon forget the watcher's sacrifice,
Yet not in anger at that scorn we yield,
  Task that our fathers taught us to endure,
Nor dead to pledges laid on us to shield
  The oppressed, the voiceless millions of the poor;
Nor heedless of our mightly heritage,
  Nor caring not if the long struggle fail,
We write "it's ended" on the final page
  And close this volume of the epic tale.
Not so, but, seeing a stage is ended here
  In this our great, inimitable emprise,
We cast, with searching of the soul and fear
  For future days, with forward gazing eyes
And prayer for what may tide, we cast the crown
  Before the altar of all destinies,
And lay the emblems of this empire down
  In humbleness before Him, they are His,
His, who bestow'd the sceptre and the sword
  Which here we ask Him to reconsecrate,
But chang'd in weight and temper to accord
  With what of new they help'd us to create.
And here we vow, by all that is our pride,
  By all this long tale we hold most dear
And not alone by great names glorified
  In high achievement, writ in letters clear;
But also by the thousands who with pain,
  Through war and pestilence and dreadful death,
Toil'd in this field, nameless but not in vain,
  By the forgotten graves they lie beneath
And by Heaven's light that led them here
  That, though the load upon us heavier lie,
Though sway divided be our portion now,
  We shall not falter nor faith deny.
Tasks at bright dawn so joyous to fulfil
  Wax wearier as the tropic noon draws on,
But yet accomplish'd shall they be, until Night and the stars send down their benison.

I must apologise to my Muslim friends if anything that I have written displeases them. Few Hindus in the Punjab had a larger circle of Muslim friends than I had before the Reforms Scheme was introduced. I forfeited the goodwill of some of them, but there are still a few left whose regard and attachment for me, inspired as it is by the sense of fidelity which Islamic teaching creates, has remained unaffected by my political activities. Let them ponder and think over my proposals, which, in my opinion, are the best constitutional safeguards for all minorities, including the Muslim minority, in several Provinces. At the same time I must record an emphatic and angry protest against some of my Hindu friends who have encouraged the propagation of the error that Muslims are in a minority everywhere and Hindus in a majority everywhere, or who ask the Hindus of North-West India to look at the political advancement of India from a communal point of view and to derive consolation from the fact that Hindus constitute majority in six major Provinces out of nine, and Mahomedans only in three, but not to bring that communal outlook to bear on the communal interests of their own Province; I cannot conceive of a mentality more illogical.

Summary.

(1) In the Punjab there are two kinds of minorities: (1) the Muslim minority, and (2) the non-agricultural minority. These two kinds of minorities have to be separately dealt with as they have separate characteristic features.

(2) The non-Muslim minority consists of (a) Hindus, (b) Sikhs. The two together forming nearly 47 per cent. of the population, the Muslims being about 53 per cent. For the territorial constituencies the seats assigned to Muslims are 32, equal to the seats assigned to non-Muslims, 12 Sikhs and 20 Hindus. There are besides special constituencies—(i) Chamber of Commerce, generally returning a European, (ii) Tumandars of Dera Ghazi Khan, a small electoral body consisting solely of Mahomedans, (iii) Landlords, one Sikh, one Hindu and one Muslim, (iv) University, (v) Industry.

(3) The Sikhs and Mahomedans come through separate electorates, the Hindus, who form one-third of the population, being thus deprived of having any voice in the election of two-thirds of the members of the Councils, who have equal voice with the Hindus in deciding their fate.

(4) The Hindus have always been in favour of joint electorates with reservation of seats. The Sikhs also now support joint electorates, thus nearly half the population of the Province wants joint electorates. Separate electorates are meant for minorities, and there is no conceivable reason for continuing them at the request of the Muslim majority in spite of the protest of minority communities. Separate electorates deprive those who are outside of them of a very important right in a democratic system of government, namely, the right of electing those to whom is entrusted their fate. This right cannot be withheld when it is demanded. A minority community has a right to ask for separate electorates, but not a majority community, apart from the argument that communal representation is a vicious principle, which retards the process of nationalisation.

(5) That the number of Muslim voters is smaller than the number of non-Muslim voters is no argument for continuance of separate electorates. The difference is so small that the constituencies and allotment of seats to them can be so arranged as to equalise the number of Muslim members returned from constituencies in which non-Muslim voters predominate with the number of non-Muslim members returned by a majority of Muslim voters. Therefore in the Punjab the continuance of separate electorates is only the perpetuation of a vicious principle which divides the communities.

(6) In a Province in which the difference between Muslim and non-Muslim population is very small, the continuance of separate electorates will needlessly create difficulties in the creation of joint responsibility which is an important feature of Cabinet system of Government likely to be introduced.

(7) That Mahomedans do not form an absolute majority in the Council is due to special constituencies. In the general territorial constituencies their proportion is equal to that of non-Muslims. As long as the principle of weightage for minorities is recognised the weightage given to Sikhs cannot be reduced. It is less than the weightage given in United Provinces to Muslims though their proportion in the population is nearly the same, and their voting strength greater. The seats assigned to Hindus in general territorial constituencies are in proportion to their population, and therefore cannot be reduced. Whether special constituencies should be continued or not is not a question to be determined on communal considerations. Even if reservation of seats were to be introduced for all special constituencies, Mahomedans would gain nothing. For the special constituencies of Industry and University and Chamber of Commerce the electorate is joint. It is only in the Landlords' constituencies that the electorates are separate. The dispute therefore for separate or joint electorates centres itself round general territorial constituencies in which the proportions are equal. The Hindu demand therefore is that there should be joint electorates for territorial constituencies, the present proportion of communal seats being retained.

(8) The next question is whether the scope of communal representation should be extended so as to cover other spheres of administration such as recruitment to services and admission to educational institutions. The Hindu and Sikh opinion on this question has been pronounced more than once and is unanimous in condemning any extension of communal representation.

(9) A proportion of 40 for Muslims, 20 for Sikhs and 40 for Hindus and others was fixed for recruitment to the Medical Department, and for admission to the Medical and Government Colleges. Now a majority community should rely solely on the strength of its numbers. It cannot claim for itself reservation of any kind of civic rights. Such a claim is untenable especially when it is going to receive further instalment of political power involving a further restriction of interference by extraneous authority, in other words, provincial autonomy.

(10) A reference to pages 166, 167 and 168 will show that in Provinces in which the Muslims are in a minority no proportions are fixed restricting their representation in services. In United Provinces, Central Province, Behar and Orissa their representation in services is much in excess of their numerical strength in population. If no limits are imposed on the recruitment of the Muslims where they are in a minority, why should any limit be put on the recruitment of Hindus in Provinces like the Punjab. If the claim of Hindu majority for recruitment in proportion to their number is not justified in United Province, Central Province and Behar and Orissa, why should any heed be paid to the demand of Muslim majority in the Punjab for their representation in services in the proportion of their population.

(11) But a cognate principle to representation by creed in the services is representation by castes, which is unknown in Provinces other than the Punjab or, perhaps, Madras. In some of the Provinces in which the Muslims are in a minority there are Hindu castes some of them as numerous as the Muslims and others outnumbering them. See page 168. It will be difficult to resist the claim of these castes for admission into the services in proportion to their numbers if communal representation were to become an acknowledged principle of recruitment. The result will be that all the services will consist of men possessing the minimum of efficiency.

(12) I now revert to the minority of non-agricultural tribes. This is a peculiar feature of the Punjab and the cleavage has its origin in the Land Alienation Act and resolution of the Punjab Government of October, 1919, giving preference to hereditary zemindars (majority of whom belong to agricultural tribes) for recruitment into services of all kinds. (For a brief description of the provisions of the Act see pages 168-9). The exact numerical strength of the agricultural tribes is not directly ascertainable. I have had it calculated and I believe that the tribes constitute nearly half the population of the Province. According to my calculation nearly one-fourth of the Hindu population, three-fifths of the Muslim population and nearly 67 per cent. of the Sikh population belong to agricultural tribes.

But in the electorate of rural constituencies which preponderate over the urban, about 60 per cent. of the Hindu voters belong to the agricultural tribes. I have had this proportion calculated in my office from electoral rolls of Hindu rural constituencies. Much greater must be the proportion in rural constituencies of the Muslim and Sikh voters belonging to agricultural tribes. Members belonging to agricultural tribes form 70 per cent. of the total number of elected members in the Council. Thus there is a strong rural oligarchy in the Council with political aspirations in no way different from those of members belonging to the urban castes. In fact the Opposition Bench in the present Council is occupied by members the majority of whom belong to agricultural tribes.

The object of the Land Alienation Act was two-fold, economic and political. Mr. Kodand Rao has criticised the economic features of the law in a series of papers which are printed in Appendix IV. I have given a synopsis of his criticism at page 169. As to any political object that may be in the minds of those who passed the Act, it is sufficient to say that the object can no longer be served, now that Responsible Government on democratic lines has been introduced.

(13) No change of franchise rules nor creation of a Second Chamber in which the capitalist landowners will have a preponderant voice will weaken this stronghold of the rural oligarchy. Introduction of manhood suffrage would be useless without free and compulsory primary education. Manhood suffrage does not exist even in England.

If provincial autonomy were given to the Punjab with the present peculiar features of Punjab politics subsisting no member of the non-agricultural tribe will find his way into the Ministry. This will result in the partial monopoly of all services by agricultural tribes as promised by the Resolution of 1919.

(14) Whilst discrimination of civic rights on the basis of caste and creed is condemned by all, it was for Mr. Srinavasa Iyenger to suggest in autumn last how such discrimination was to be interdicted. This could be done only by the insertion of a clause in the Constitution forbidding such discrimination (see page 181 on this point).

(15) The power of making appointments must be taken away from the Ministers and vested in the Public Service Commission, which will deal with all services and before whom should lie appeals against disciplinary action taken by the Ministers.

(16) In my opinion the Indian Courts have the power to pronounce on the constitutionality of a law passed by a Provincial or Central Legislature. But if they have not, power should be given by Parliament to the High Courts.

(17) British element in the services should continue at its present strength for the next ten years.

(18) I propose certain indispensable conditions for any step in political advance in the Punjab, for which see pages 179-183.

(19) Without the safeguard proposed by me for the rights of the Hindu minority in the Punjab, to which reference has been made in the last para., the Hindu minority in the North-West Frontier Province should oppose devolution of power to the people. There are difficulties in the way of dealing with the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan on par with other Provinces. Whether these difficulties can be overcome or not is a matter on which Hindus as such have nothing to say. Their rights will be sufficiently protected if the safeguards proposed for the Punjab are adopted.

A reference to the Civil List of North-West Frontier Province will show how poorly the Hindus of the North-West Frontier Province are represented in the services of that Province, though they are far ahead of the Mahomedans in education (see page 183). Their number in the services has considerably decreased since the separation of the Province, as figures taken for comparison from the Civil List of 1904 will show. The rule that no monopolies should be allowed and that no community should be allowed to preponderate in the services has been completely ignored in the case of the Hindu minority in North-West Frontier Province.

(20) I doubt if any long step towards the grant of Dominion Status can be taken under the present conditions. As I am in favour of retaining the British element in services, it is all the more necessary (apart from meeting the peculiar case of the Punjab) to insert the clause imposing limits, if not forbidding the determination of civil rights on the basis of caste and creed, in order to remove the objection that a foreign bureaucracy will always divide us and will promote our fissiparousness.

Postscript.

Since greater part of this Memorandum was written I came across Dr. Shaffat Ahmad Khan's book "What Are the Rights of Muslim Minority?" This is the only comprehensive statement of the rights of the Muslim minority which I have seen. Dr. Shaffat Ahmad Khan has brought his scholarship and learning to bear on this work, and I am glad to observe that there are many points of agreement between me and him. Our basic and initial difference, however, is due to the indifference of my Hindu friends, against which I have already recorded a protest. Muslims are not in a minority everywhere nor Hindus in a majority everywhere. Our points of agreement are that: (1) Minorities may claim separate electorates, (2) that the constitution should contain a clause protective of the interests of minorities, and (3) that there should be legal machinery to enforce the clause by declaring invalid laws which violate the provisions of the clause.

I have discussed at length the question of separate electorates for Muslims in the Punjab, and I need not repeat what I have already said there. I do not know what Dr. Khan has to urge against the demand of the Hindu minority for joint electorates when he champions strongly the cause of the Muslim minority in other Provinces. Why should solicitude be shown to the rights of Muslim minority and why should it be withheld when the rights of Hindu minority are under consideration? As to the clause protective of the interests of minorities, Dr. Khan has quoted several, apparently with approval. Probably he wants the substance of all of them to be inserted in the constitution. He has not selected any particular clause. I need not reproduce all the clauses cited by him, but I may quote two, the principles underlying which I have adopted. In fact I have referred to only one clause from the Czechoslovak constitution, which would, with some modifications, suit my purpose. I have put forward a draft of my own with a list of exceptions. The draft, with its schedules, is simply meant to show how far the circumstances of the country justify equal treatment of all, and to what extent limit should be imposed on the determination of civic rights by caste or creed. If any one of my countrymen is of opinion that no limit should be imposed (and this is the proposal of the Congress) he is at liberty to say so. But I am not erring on the side of over-refinement in interpretation when I say that separate electorates, reservation of seats on representative bodies, reservation of appointments for certain communities (either on the ground of their backwardness or for the sake of preventing the predominance of one community or caste in services) are incompatible with the clauses which Dr. Khan quotes with approval. At page 35 of his book Article 7 of the Treaty with Poland is given. At page 126 Article 66 of the Treaty with Austria has been quoted. I reproduce them below:—

Article 7.

All Polish nationals shall be equal before the law, and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights, without distinction as to race, language or religion.

Differences of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Polish national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as, for instance, admission to public employments, functions, and honours, or the exercise of profession and industries.

No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Polish national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the Press, or in publications of any kind, or at any public meetings.

Notwithstanding any establishment by the Polish Government of any official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Polish nationals of non-Polish speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the Courts.

Article 66.

All Austrian nationals shall be equal before the law, and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language, or religion.

Differences of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Austrian national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as, for instance, admission to public employment, functions and honours, or the exercise of professions and industries.

No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Austrian national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the Press, or in publication of any kind, or at public meetings.

Notwithstanding any establishment by the Austrian Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Austrian nationals of non-German speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the Courts.

I do not know the conditions prevailing in other Provinces with regard to language; but in the Punjab the Hindus, who form one-third of the population, have a grievance. Provision for teaching of Hindi is inadequate both in the Punjab and in North-West Frontier Province; as far as I am aware Hindi is taught in few Government or aided schools. In the Education Department of the North-West Frontier Province not a single Hindu is employed. In the Mission College at Peshawar the India Staff contains a large number of Hindus. In the Government College there is none. A clause in the constitution has to be very carefully worded and should be as brief as possible. I have not thought it worth while to raise the question of language or of grants-in-aid to schools. These are matters to be left to the Council, which, if constituted on a proper basis, may be expected to deal with them justly. But if my Hindu friends wish to raise the question before the Commission they may do so.

Dr. Shaffat Ahmad Khan wants effective representation of minorities in services. Mahomedans in United Province form 47 per cent. of the total number employed in the service of State, and in Central Province 24 per cent. Their population in United Province is 14 per cent. and in Central Province 4 per cent. Is not this effective representation? Does Dr. Khan advocate that if a larger number of capable Mahomedans were forthcoming they should be refused admission into the services? Does he hold that education amongst Mahomedans is not likely to make further progress? Does he think that 44 per cent. of Tehsildars in United Province and 24 per cent. of Tehsildars in Central Province is sufficient, and no more capable Muslims should be employed on these posts? Does he advocate that a Sikh Jat who owns an acre of land somewhere in a village should be given preference for employment over a Kashmiri Musalman who has in the city of Amritsar property worth 20 thousand, but owns no acre of agricultural land? It is this sort of discrimination which my clause and the clauses quoted by him condemn.

I have noticed two very important omissions in Dr. Khan's valuable work. He does not propose the appointment of a Public Service Commission for the Province. He says nothing as to the desirability (not to speak of the necessity) of retaining the British element in services.

With regard to the former it appears that Dr. Khan thinks that so long as a certain percentage is reserved for the recruitment of Mahomedans in services their interests are safe. He forgets that disciplinary action ranging from supersession to dismissal by a Minister belonging to one community against a public servant belonging to another community creates a good deal of suspicion and consequent discontent. An appeal to the Governor is useless, for the Minister might have consulted the Governor. The greater the power of the Minister the less would the Governor be inclined to interfere with the orders of the Minister. Appeal should lie to an independent board which is so constituted that, whilst all important communities are represented on it, no community predominates, and the members of which in the case of a Provincial Commission are appointed by the Government of India, and in the case of Indian Public Service Commission dealing with All-India Service by the King.

With regard to the retention of the British element in services, I fear that there is no one to bear with me the brunt of criticism which the honest expression of an opinion (shared I have no doubt by a majority of those fit to form opinion on public question) will bring. I have only to hope that this will not be the only suggestion made by me which the Commission will adopt, rejecting all others.

I am very much indebted to Dr. Shaffat Ahmad Khan for all that he has written in the defence of minority rights, with most of which I agree.

Memorandum submitted by the Punjab Zemindars' Association.

PREFACE.

The Punjab Zemindars' Association extends a warm welcome to the Right Honourable Sir John Simon and the Right Honourable Members of the Indian Statutory Commission to the Punjab, and desires to express its satisfaction with the arrangement arrived at finally whereby parallel Committees of the Central and Provincial Legislatures have been appointed to partake with the Statutory Commission in the reforms investigation on an equal footing.

2. The invitation issued by the President of the Commission to organisations and the public in India to submit their views in the form of Memoranda, etc., has been generally appreciated, and particularly so by this Association; although it respectfully desires to submit that the time allowed for the formulation of views and the compilation of Memoranda was much too short. The invitation was issued on the 9th March, just before the harvest and the summer set in, and it was required that all Memoranda should be submitted by the 31st May. It was impossible for an Association of landowners and agriculturists to comply in time, firstly, because the matter could not begin to be attended to until the harvest had been gathered, which was not before the 31st May; and, secondly, because of the difficulty always encountered during the season of extreme heat of assembling committees, etc.

I.—The Punjab Zemindars' Association.

The Punjab Zemindars' Association was established in April, 1922, but at first made slow progress towards becoming a fully representative body of the Punjab rural population. The reasons for this were—

(a) Punjab Zemindars, always having been intensely loyal to the British administration, were discouraged by the attitude of British officials towards political associations.

(b) They were accustomed to traditional methods of making their wishes known to Government, and failed to realise the significance of the drastic changes that had accompanied the introduction of the Reforms; and, still relying on Government to safeguard their interests, they did not realise the need of an organisation for the purpose.

(c) They had been given ample representation in the Punjab Legislative Council, and imagined that their interests had thereby been made secure, not realising that the utterly inadequate measure of representation given to agricultural interests in the Central Legislature rendered them most insecure.

(d) People in India rely on their religious organisations to secure their interests; previously only the commercial classes realised the importance of organisations for safeguarding their material interests.

2. But the development of the Reforms, the influence of retired army men who have served overseas during the war, and the spread of education in the rural areas during the past ten years, have gradually effected a change in the outlook of the Punjab rural classes. This Association has now become a fully representative body; its membership consists of landowners of all creeds, with properties ranging from a few acres to many thousands. Also, its membership has recently been made open to tenants.

3. Separate Zemindars' Associations have been established in every one of the 27 districts of the Punjab, excluding the isolated frontier districts of Dera Ghazi Khan and the small mountainous district of Simla. Twenty-four of these District Associations are federated in this Association, and others of them in the Punjab Zemindars' League, which it is expected will shortly became amalgamated with this Association.

4. Since the nucleus of each of the 24 District Associations federated in this Association consists of the Zemindar members of the District Boards in each district elected on a wide franchise, each District Association is, therefore, a fully representative body, and is represented at meetings of the Provincial Association by elected delegates. The Executive Committee of the Provincial Association is composed of the elected President and elected Honorary Secretary of each District Association.

Objects.

(1) To safeguard agricultural interests.
(2) To cause Zemindars of all creeds to realise their community of interests.
(3) To encourage Zemindars to take their rightful place in the politics of the Province and the country.
(4) To secure adequate representation of agricultural interests in the Legislatures.
(5) To form and support a Zemindar Party of all creeds in the Punjab Legislative Council as well as in the Central Legislature.
(6) To keep the interests of the agricultural classes always before Government.
(7) To act as a channel for the representation of grievances and for their correction on constitutional lines.
(8) To check bribery and corruption of officials and their oppression of the agricultural classes.
(9) To press for the adequate employment of men of the Zemindar class in the Government services, both Administrative and Judicial.
(10) To press for a more equitable distribution of the burden of taxation.
(11) To uphold the Punjab Land Alienation Act.
(12) To counter Bolshevism.

II.—The Punjab and Punjab Zemindars.

The Punjab (British Indian Territory), containing a population of approximately 21 million, is mainly a country of peasant proprietors; but at the same time it contains a large number of substantial landowners, although of owners of very extensive estates there are but few. In the Punjab to all landowners, whatever the size of their holdings, the term Zemindar is generally applied, although in other Provinces the term denotes only large landowners.

2. Practically all Zemindars in the Punjab belong to martial tribes which supply the bulk of the troops for the Indian Army. They furnished troops in large numbers to assist the British forces in the Indian Mutiny of 1857, and they supplied 480,000 troops for the Great War, that is to say, more troops than the whole of the rest of British India put together.

3. Owing to a considerable percentage of the rural classes in the Punjab having served in the army, not only in every part of India but in many parts of the world, many of them have seen more of the world than the agriculturists of most parts of Europe and America.

III.—Punjab Zemindars and the Reforms.

Punjab Zemindars gratefully acknowledge the magnanimity of the British Government's declaration of policy made in 1917 to give India in due course full responsible Government, and they are proud of the fact that it was largely due to the whole-hearted loyalty of the Indian troops during the Great War, of whom they formed so big a proportion, that this declaration of policy was made.

2. Having done so much to earn this boon for India, Punjab Zemindars, proud of their past record and conscious of their importance to India, are anxious to take their rightful place in the new form of Government and assist it to succeed.

3. With the representation granted to Punjab Zemindars in the Punjab Legislative Council, in which 55 seats for elected members were allotted to rural constituencies, they have been able to make their influence felt, with the result that the Reforms in the Punjab have worked smoothly and proved a success, as has generally been acknowledged.

IV.—PUNJAB GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURE.

(a) Demand for Autonomous Government in the Punjab.—This Association, while recognising that a system of partial self-Government was necessary during the first stage of the reforms for the political education of the people, feels certain that a continuation of the present system in this Province will cause discontent and friction between the people's representatives and Government. The people of this Province have shown their good sense, and now desire to be entrusted with full responsible Government.

This Association therefore recommends:—

(1) That officials should cease to hold seats in the Legislative Council, and that the present system of nominated members should be entirely abolished.
(2) That the Provincial Legislature should be unicameral.
(3) That the power to assent to or to veto bills should be vested in the Governor.

(b) Franchise.—The franchise for the Provincial Legislative Council in rural constituencies should be liberally widened and extended to owners of land assessed to land revenue amounting to not less than Rs. 5 and to tenants in respect of land assessed to land revenue of not less than Rs. 20 per annum. All retired or discharged soldiers should continue to have the vote as at present. This Association is most strongly adverse to female suffrage.

(c) Constituencies.—The present constituencies are too large, and the number of them too limited. The population of the Punjab (British Indian Territory) is approximately 21 millions. At least one constituency per 100,000 of the population on an average should be provided, or a minimum of 200 constituencies altogether.

The existing system of rural and urban constituencies should be maintained, but all towns scheduled as Municipalities or Notified Areas should be excluded from rural constituencies. This is particularly asked for in view of: (1) The rural community in India do not live in the country towns as they do in Europe and America. The people of the country towns belong almost entirely to the commercial, trading and money lending classes, and are connected by ties of blood, marriage, occupation and identity of interests with the people of the cities, as also with the moneylending shopkeepers in the villages, through whom they exert financial pressure to obtain votes from the rural community during elections; (2) the "Immovable Property" qualification of electors is grossly abused in the towns included in the present rural constituencies, in order that the number of electors with urban sympathies may be increased; (3) as the elections take place in such towns the town people gather in large numbers at the gates of the towns to support their own appointed candidates and use influence of all kinds, including official and financial pressure, as well as forcible persuasion, on the rural electors, who arrive separately or in small groups, to register their votes.

(d) Qualification of Candidates.—No person should be allowed to stand as a candidate in a rural constituency unless he is qualified as an elector therein. Such a rule would keep out all outsiders who know nothing about the constituency, and are without any sympathy for the rural community, but who, by undesirable means, get themselves elected.

V.—LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Local self-government was conferred by Lord Ripon's Enactment Act XX. of 1883, as affording a field in which Indians might best be trained in the management of public affairs. But, owing to the Government's excessive keenness for immediate efficiency, the management of District Boards has remained in the hands of District Officers, and the educative principle has been disregarded. In spite of a period of 45 years having elapsed since local self-government was conferred, practically all the management of the District Boards is still conducted by the District Officers in an autocratic manner. The members of the Boards, feeling themselves subordinate to official Chairmen, are prevented from expressing their views freely. Moreover, the power of nomination vested in the Deputy-Commissioners is not used to secure representation for minorities, but is used to secure their own authority by nominating people who are likely to be subservient to them. The present system is, therefore, a travesty of local self-government, and has made the promise of the British Government to give self-government to India to appear hollow.

2. To give the people experience in self-government it is essential that the District Boards should be absolutely free from official control in all matters within the jurisdiction of the Boards, and that non-official Chairmen should be appointed. At present the Boards are treated merely as consultative bodies by the District Officers, and, owing to the intensive system of centralisation that still prevails, in spite of the recommendations of the Decentralisation Commission, the necessity of conforming to the rules of Government Departments leaves practically no scope for local initiative. Moreover, the Boards are kept ill-equipped with funds. To remedy this and to give the Boards more financial power, some definite proportion of the Land Revenue, in addition to the present cess thereon, should be allotted to the District Boards. Too great a proportion of the revenues of the Province is being spent on objects that can benefit the people only remotely, if at all; whereas a rural uplift campaign under the auspices of the District Boards, with a view to improving sanitation and encouraging the formation of co-operative societies of various kinds, is the first essential. All officers allotted to districts by the various departments—Education, Agriculture, Health, Sanitation, etc.—should be put under the control of the District Boards, as also should be village panchayats, whose judicial powers should be extended. Moreover, District Boards should be vested with powers to impose taxes and collect dues.

VI.—EDUCATION.

Until some ten years ago the education of the landowning and rural classes had been comparatively neglected by Government. All the colleges and important schools provided by Government had been placed in the cities and towns, which gave more or less a monopoly of education to the urban classes. Rural education had been relegated to the District Boards with their very restricted funds to provide, but even then the schools provided out of District Board funds were largely located in the towns at the instance of the District Inspector of Schools—in many cases men of urban sympathies—and therefore were used mostly by urban people. It was only with the inauguration (in April, 1918) of Sir Michael O'Dwyer's programme for the expansion and improvement of vernacular education in rural areas that the education of agriculturists was seriously undertaken. Since then rural education has made rapid strides, stimulated in no small degree by the influence of soldiers on their return from the several theatres of war overseas, as well as by the introduction of the reform scheme; so much so that even in several of the most backward districts, the educational programme intended to occupy fifteen years was completed in four. This proves that there is no lack of eagerness on the part of the rural community for education: the only impediment to the more rapid and wider spread thereof is the lack of provincial funds. This question will be dealt with in Part VII, paragraph 8, under the heading of "Finance." More schools for the literary, industrial and agricultural education of the rural community in the Punjab are urgently required.

2. It must not be thought that, owing to the previous lack of educational facilities, the number of highly educated people among the rural community in the Punjab is very limited. It is greatly to the credit of the community that this is not the case, which is proved by the fact that the Indian superior establishments of the Revenue, Co-operative and Agricultural Departments are mostly derived from the rural community, that a large proportion of the Indian officers of the army have high educational qualifications, and that a considerable number of members of the legal profession belong to the rural classes. Also the large landowners—the Punjab Chiefs and their sons—have attained a high standard of education by study at the Aitchison Chiefs' College at Lahore.

3. Since the Punjab contains a preponderance of the martial races of India and supplies the bulk of the troops for the Indian Army, this Association would strongly urge that a military college, on the same lines as the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, in England, should be established in the Punjab. The martial races of the Punjab have, ever since the Punjab became included in the British Empire, given proof after proof of their devotedness and loyalty to His Majesty the King Emperor; and the officers holding King's commissions which the Punjab has already supplied have acknowledgedly proved their fitness in every way for such commissions. Indians of the urban classes have been appointed to many of the highest and most responsible positions in the administration and judiciary, and Punjab Zemindars feel very keenly that their unquestionable loyalty should be no less fully recognised by the provision of a military college in the Punjab, to enable them to qualify in larger numbers to take their rightful place in the army, a career which many of them prefer to the Civil Service.

VII.—FINANCE AND TAXATION.

At present Provincial Governments derive the bulk of their revenue from Land Revenue, which is levied on agriculturists, and have no control over income tax, which is levied on the non-agricultural classes and collected by the Imperial Government. Although Zemindars have to pay taxes, however small their incomes may be, and even if no profit should result from their work, the non-agricultural community are not required to pay taxes unless their incomes exceed Rs. 2,000. This is a very high limit for a country such as India, and frees the large bulk of the urban community and non-agriculturists from paying any taxes at all, although they enjoy most of the benefits resulting from the Provincial Government's expenditure on colleges, schools, hospitals, urban improvements, etc.

2. In any event, it is an extremely anomalous arrangement that the rural community should contribute to the Provincial revenues, and that the urban community and non-agriculturists should contribute little or nothing to those revenues, but only to the revenues of the Imperial Government. The result has been that, in the past, when the Provincial Government has been faced with difficulty to balance its budget, it has not been possible to increase the taxation of both communities alike, but the deficiency has had to be made good by the rural classes alone.

3. Under the present arrangement, practically the only tax that the urban classes have to pay cannot be increased without the consent of the Legislative Assembly and Council of State, of which two bodies the members, both official and elected, are liable to income tax, and therefore are adverse to increasing the taxes which they have to pay. The result has been that, even when the Government of India has been faced with great financial difficulties, as was the case between 1920 and 1924, no increase was made in the income tax, although at from 5 to 17 pies in the rupee it was very much on the low side. Instead the salt tax, 90 per cent. of which is contributed by the rural classes in India, was doubled. Such unjust discrimination in the taxation of the rural and urban classes should not be allowed to continue.

4. The Land Revenue system has become a source of great grievance to the people in the long settled districts. It is a system of taxation that has operated from time immemorial, a rough and ready system, suitable for the country when the currency was very limited, and when everywhere there were large areas lying undeveloped and uncultivated. In those days, whatever share of his produce a cultivator was compelled to yield to Government as land revenue, it was possible for him to adjust the area he cultivated to produce a sufficient balance of produce for the subsistence of himself and family. But now, when every acre of culturable land in the longer settled districts has been fully developed, and the land has become very closely settled, many cultivators, owing to their small holdings, no longer have enough to subsist upon after payment of the land revenue. At each fresh settlement of these districts the land revenue is enhanced in order to provide for the ever-increasing expenditure of the Provincial Government, since its resources are confined, more or less, to taxes levied on the agricultural population. The enhanced assessments of land revenue made are based on the rise in prices of agricultural produce between one settlement and the next; but what Government does not take into account is that individual holdings have been growing smaller more rapidly than the value of agricultural produce has been increasing; with the result that, despite the increased market rate of a maund of produce or of the produce of an acre of land, the cultivators have less and less to sell as their holdings grow smaller; and individually they are actually considerably poorer than at the previous settlement. Indeed, in the long settled districts, owing to the small size of their holdings, the cultivators now require the whole of their produce (and even then in many cases it is not sufficient) for their own subsistence. Therefore, since they have no produce left over for sale, the increase in market value does not affect them, except that they have to pay more, with borrowed money, for the food that they are compelled to buy to keep themselves and their families alive.

5. The Land Revenue system, based as it is on the market value of produce and the supposed productive capacity of a unit of land, irrespectively of the individual's income and ability to pay, is the most unfair system of taxation in the world. Moreover, it is rapidly causing the agricultural population to become enslaved to money-lenders, to whom they are compelled to mortgage their lands and to pledge their crops at about half their market value in order to borrow money, often at as much as 60 per cent. per annum interest, to pay their Land Revenue, and to purchase food when their crops are bad.

6. A modification of the Land Revenue system will most undoubtedly be necessary in the near future, or troubles of a grave nature in many parts of India will arise; for political agitators will be certain to exploit this grievance to stir up the rural masses (as at Bardoli recently), should the outcome of the Statutory Commission's Report not be in accordance with the demands of the political extremists. After the success of their efforts at Bardoli the extremists are merely biding their time to make further and more extensive use of this grievance. The matter should be given the most earnest and early consideration and a modification of the present system provided for, before any fresh settlement in regard to finance as between the Imperial and Provincial Governments is made; otherwise the hands of the various Governments will be tied and modification afterwards made more difficult.

7. In order to allow latitude to Provincial Governments to modify the Land Revenue system, and to adjust the burden of taxation as between the agriculturists and non-agricultural classes more fairly, income tax should be made a Provincial tax, the Provincial Governments paying a proportion thereof to the Imperial Government.

8. Further, much more latitude should be given to Provincial Governments to raise loans. At present much of the capital expenditure of Provincial Governments is being met out of revenue, and therefore the present generation is being called upon to pay for benefits which will accrue mostly to succeeding generations. Moreover, the present limitation of the powers of Provincial Governments to raise loans is impeding both development and progress. For instance, the chief impediment to the spread of education is the lack of funds for the provision of schools, whereas expenditure on school buildings of a solid and permanent nature should be regarded as capital expenditure, and financed by means of a loan.

VIII.—RECRUITMENT FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICES.

This Association desires to impress on the Statutory Commission that the well-being and happiness of the rural masses depend almost entirely on the type and class of officials that are set over them both in the administration and judiciary. First and foremost, they require officials who understand and are capable of sympathising with them, otherwise no reformed system of Government is likely to benefit them. The utmost care should be taken in devising a suitable system of recruitment of officers for the public services. What may be a suitable system for England is entirely unsuitable for India, as also is the system that was initiated in India with the introduction of the Reforms which was based on the English model.

2. The sudden determination of the British Government to employ Indians in the administration and judiciary in largely increasing numbers, and the adoption of the principle of competitive examinations, has given all the advantage to the non-agricultural classes, who, until recently, enjoyed almost a monopoly of the educational facilities provided by Government, but who have no sympathy or affinity with the agricultural classes whatever.

3. This Association is very firmly of the opinion that the system of competitive examination is not suitable for India; firstly, because it is too mechanical and is incapable of testing candidates in more than one respect; secondly, because it takes no account of the fact that an immense cleavage exists in India between the trading classes in the cities and towns on the one hand, and the agricultural classes on the other, owing to Indians always having followed hereditary occupations from time immemorial. Nor does it take account of the fact that India, during the past century, has become a money-lenders' ridden country; and that, owing to the advantages in respect of educational facilities which the trading and money-lending classes have enjoyed, these two classes, so distinct from and apathetic to the agricultural classes, will succeed in gaining an ascendancy in the judiciary and all departments of the administration; although neither the hereditary qualities nor the instincts of the money-lending class make them fit to be justices and administrators over the agricultural classes.

4. Qualifying examinations are undoubtedly necessary for appointments to the public services, but selections from among the candidates who pass the qualifying tests should be made by a Provincial Public Services Commission to be appointed by the Provincial Government, since the present All-India Public Services Commission is entirely unsuitable for the purpose, on account of its lack of knowledge of Provincial conditions.

5. To satisfy communal jealousies, until they are gradually overcome, appointments should be apportioned to the zemindar community proportionately to its population. The objection that such an arrangement would militate against efficiency is only a theory insisted upon by the academically minded. All over the world, men who have succeeded best in business, the army, and other occupations, did not succeed best at school.

6. The Provincial Government should be given the power to remove Government servants from employment who prove unsuitable or corrupt. The procedure at present to be gone through, before an official can be discharged, involves so many difficulties, and gives heads of departments so much extra work, that it is only very rarely that any effort is made to remove an unsuitable or corrupt official. This is the root cause of much of the peculation and corruption that exists in the Government services.

IX.—GOVERNMENT OF INDIA AND CENTRAL LEGISLATURE.

(a) Lack of Representation of Rural Classes in Legislative Assembly.—Pleased as Punjab Zemindars are to have been able to assist the Reforms in the Punjab to succeed, they have felt uneasy and disturbed in regard to the development of the Reforms in the Central Legislature. Great was their dismay to find that the rules framed by Government in regard to the qualification of electors and candidates for election, and the arrangement of constituencies, as between rural and urban interests and also as between Provinces, had in actual operation failed to give agricultural interests, which so largely predominate in India, anywhere near adequate representation. Therefore, instead of the majority of the elected members in the Legislative Assembly being properly representative of the large bulk of their countrymen, they represent only the comparatively small urban middle class.

(b) Cleavage of Interests between Rural and Urban Classes.—This Association would impress on the Statutory Commission, with all possible emphasis, that the urban middle class, which is akin to and includes the moneylending class, has no sympathy with the agricultural classes whatever; and that the interests of the two classes are diametrically opposed to one another. The urban middle class, with the academical education they have received, look down upon agriculturists as being only good enough to plough land, produce food, supply the revenues, act as cannon fodder, and to be exploited in every way conceivable. Although the urban middle class have recently proposed universal suffrage, it is only to create a huge irresponsible electorate whom, in their poverty, ignorance and immense numbers, sufficient to swamp all other classes, they expect to be able to keep under their influences. In India the power of the moneylenders is universal and supreme.

The educational policy of Government, whereby educational facilities were limited to the towns, has favoured this class; they have monopolised the Indian Press; they are carrying on propaganda in England and all over the world, pretending to be the spokesmen of India. Their aims are: To rule India and to bring every other class, including the Indian Princes, under their dominion; to obtain and keep a monopoly of Government appointments; to impose almost the whole burden of taxation on the agricultural classes; and to obtain possession of the land by repealing all laws that are at all protective of Zemindars against usury and sequestration.

(c) Defects in the Electoral Rules.—This Association would point out some of the defects in the rules and arrangements in regard to electors, candidates, and constituencies that have led to the present unsatisfactory situation.

(1) Although the agricultural classes form 80 per cent. of the population, only 45 rural and landowners constituencies out of a total of 103 were provided in the Legislative Assembly, and the majority of these were captured by urban candidates for reasons given below. To the Punjab only one rural constituency (Landholders) was allotted. And in the Council of State not a single constituency was provided for Landholders in India.

(2) Large towns, with populations extending in some cases to nearly one hundred thousand, have been included in rural constituencies in other Provinces, and this has assisted candidates with urban supporters to succeed over those with rural supporters, owing to the former being concentrated and the latter being scattered over wide areas. Moreover, the property qualification for electors has been the means of swelling the number of town-dwelling electors to an extent that is out of all proportion to the number of agricultural electors. For instance, in the Hissar District of the Punjab, four towns, whose combined population amounts only to 86,000, furnish 1,057 electors; whereas the rural area of the district, with a population of 730,000, furnishes only 1,131 electors. It is probable that similar proportions exist throughout India. The present qualification rule is obviously most unfair and unsuitable, since the electors in the towns included in rural constituencies are akin to the urban middle class in the cities and allied to them by ties of blood, marriage and identity of interests; and these interests are diametrically opposed to landowning and agricultural interests. Moreover, the property qualification is much abused owing to the officials whose duty it is to check the electoral rolls being, in their turn, either akin to or in sympathy with the town-dwellers. Further, the towns are the homes of the big moneylenders, who, under the protection of the law, have become all-powerful, but who are prevented from sequestering agricultural land. They, therefore, lend their support to the party whose aim it is to repeal the laws which protect landowners from the sequestration of their property.

(3) The lack of any residential qualification for candidates and the very large extent of the rural constituencies gives an advantage to the professional politicians of the only properly organised party in India; and this party is the only one which has adequate funds to assist it in canvassing for votes.

(d) Amendments Required in the Electoral Rules, etc.—To correct the above defects, and to ensure adequate representation for agricultural interests in the Legislative Assembly, this Association begs to make the following recommendations:—

(1) All Municipalities, Notified Areas, Towns and Cantonments should be excluded from rural constituencies, and, instead, they should be grouped into urban constituencies. Or, at least, towns with populations of more than 5,000 should be excluded from rural constituencies.

(2) The immovable property qualification of electors and candidates, which is so much open to abuse, should be abolished; and instead the franchise for the Assembly should be lowered to—

(a) Persons assessed to Income-tax on incomes of not less than Rs. 2,000.

(b) Owners of land assessed to Land Revenue of not less than Rs. 25.

(c) All retired, pensioned, or discharged officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers of His Majesty's regular forces.

N.B.—This would widen the franchise to that at present prescribed for the Provincial Legislative Councils. The abilition of the immovable property clause might induce more persons to declare their incomes above the prescribed limit. At present there is great evasion of Income-tax on the part of the non-agriculturists.

(3) The ratio of rural constituencies to urban constituencies should be according to the proportion of the rural classes to the urban classes. Rural constituencies should be provided in the Punjab.

(4) The Punjab, which supplies more than 50 per cent. of the Indian troops, and which, in point of defence, is the buttress Province of India, should have at least as much representation as the Madras and Bengal Presidencies; and it certainly should have as much representation as the Bombay Presidency, which has no greater population than the Punjab. Bombay's commercial interests are certainly important, but in regard to the defence of the country the Punjab is the Province most concerned that the measures taken should be adequate, for on the Punjab would fall the brunt of invasion, if one should take place.

(5) The total number of constituencies should be increased in order to provide, on an average, one rural or landowners constituency per district. The present constituencies are far too large and unwieldy, with the result that there is practically no contact between the representatives and the electors.

(6) It should be prescribed that every candidate standing for election in a rural constituency should possess agricultural land and be a qualified elector in the constituency.

(7) A knowledge of English is essential for candidates for election to the Legislative Assembly.

X.—AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS IN INDIA.

This Association must give expression to a very grave apprehension that many of the more enlightened Zamindars of the Punjab have been feeling during the past few years. It is the possibility that the interests of the 80 per cent. majority of the population of this vast agricultural country may be sacrificed by the political power falling into the hands of an urban oligarchy, as has happened in Russia; and as would be the result in India were the scheme, put forward in Nehru Report by the so-called "All Parties" Conference at Lucknow, to be acceded to. (One important interest which was almost totally unrepresented at the Conference was that of the agricultural classes.) To this oligarchy was given a predominant portion of the power handed over under the first instalment of the Reform Scheme. To them have since been given in ever-growing frequency many of the most important appointments in India. The Government of India has become an urbanised Government, despite the appointment of our popular Viceroy, and has completely lost touch with the agricultural population. Behind the urbanised Government of India stands the urbanised British Parliament, that is even unfair to the agriculturists of its own country; and to enquire into the reforms necessary for India is the Statutory Commission composed of the representatives of the urbanised British Parliament. Commercial interests during the past half century have gained ascendancy in many countries of the world, which is only natural in countries that mainly depend on their commerce. But, it should be remembered, India is 80 per cent. an agricultural country. Clash as urban and agricultural interests do in Great Britain, the United States and other countries, the cleavage between these interests in India is far greater than in any other country of the world, owing to the people in India always having followed hereditary occupations, which has caused them through the ages to develop in two widely divergent groups. In India the bulk of the urban middle class are akin to, and therefore in sympathy with, the extortionate money-lenders, but in other countries that is not so. Before the English system of law was introduced the money-lenders had not so much power; nor, until security of tenure was obtained under the aegis of the British, did land possess any attraction for the money-lenders. But now, security of tenure and the superior social status which the possession of land confers has made the money-lenders eager to become landlords. Having regard to the affinity that exists in these days between commercial and financial interests all over the world, and to the predominance of commercial and urban interests in England, we feel that the omens are unpropitious to agricultural interests in India, in spite of the apparent concern of the Conservative Party now in power in England for those interests. If that concern be not pretended, let that party look to it, and by its large majority in the House of Commons prevent our interests, which have accumulated through the ages, from being sacrificed to a class that has been battening on the agriculturists of India since the introduction by the British of a very complex system of law. The education of the agricultural classes has been neglected and their increasingly impoverished condition, due to the extortions of the money-lenders, practically ignored.

Unless they are given sufficient representation in the Central Legislature to protect themselves, their condition must inevitably grow worse.

XI.—COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION OR JOINT ELECTORATES.

At first sight it might appear that this Association, a non-communal organisation, would be in favour of joint electorates, since in a joint electorate it would be possible for zamindars of all kinds to vote for the candidate most favourable to their interests as a class, whatever the religion of the candidate might be. But with a politically inexperienced electorate, deeply engulfed in debt and firmly caught in the clutches of the money-lenders, who are members or allies of the urban oligarchy, the danger of joint electorates would be that the influence of the money-lenders would be used to support candidates in the pay, or in sympathy with, the urban oligarchy. The Hindu zamindars fully realise the situation. They have already seen candidates who are members of the urban oligarchy—having no affinity whatever with the rural area—succeed in capturing rural constituencies from candidates respected and popular throughout the countryside. But there are but few Muslims and Sikhs who are not agriculturists, and fewer still who are in sympathy with the urban oligarchy. Therefore, so long as communal representation is maintained, it means that the large majority of Muslim and Sikh seats will be secured by candidates with agricultural sympathies and interests despite the endeavours of professional politicians, who are in sympathy with or in the pay of the urban oligarchy, to capture them. Until the people have learned to combine, in Associations such as this, on the basis of their secular interests, and have realised that they can safely do so without prejudice to their religious interests, it would be injurious to agricultural interests to substitute joint electorates for communal representation. Class feeling amongst the people is gradually developing. Autonomous Government and wise statesmanship should do much to assist this development. But no attempt to force it by abolishing communal representation should be made. Communal representation should be retained during the next stage of the reforms, in the course of which, it is to be hoped, education among the agricultural community will make rapid progress. Then, by reason of their more educated condition, a more fully developed class feeling, and adequate representation in the Legislatures, the agricultural community should be in a better position to safeguard their interests without such artificial aids as communal representation and special provisions for rural constituencies. Moreover, by then, it is to be hoped, the problem of the political destiny of India will have been solved and a federation of autonomous Provinces and States will have come into existence; for a final solution of the question, particularly on such lines, should set at rest the present agitated feelings of the various communities in regard to the uncertainties of the future.

XII.—CONSTITUTION BEST SUITED FOR INDIA.—A CENTRAL OR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

This Association is convinced that, in this vast country, which, in reality, is a sub-continent, containing, as it does, a population of 30 crores (300 millions) of so many diverse races and languages, as well as a large number of independent States, only a federal constitution of autonomous Provinces and States can succeed. Any attempt to make one political entity of India in any other form must inevitably end in failure. It should be remembered that India is as large as, and has a population equal to Europe without Russia, and in India there is a much greater diversity of races and languages than in Europe. The people of the Punjab differ more in character from the people of Madras than the people of Norway and Sweden do from the people of Italy and Greece. Moreover, whereas in India there are several very distinct religions and an infinite number of castes, the people of Europe are all Christians, except for a small minority in the South-East. Yet the statesmen of Europe, with greater political experience than Indians possess, experience difficulty in reconciling the comparatively slight differences that exist between the component elements of the populations of many of the European countries, including some of the smallest.

2. It is true that a central form of Government in India succeeded under the Emperor Akbar, and again under the British until recently, but only because in both cases the Governments were of an autocratic nature, and because, under British rule, the administration has been practically homogeneous. Moreover, this form of Government succeeded only while the people remained in an ignorant and subdued condition. But recently, owing to the spread of education and the introduction of a semi-democratic form of Government, contentions among the people all over India have begun to set in, with the consequence that India, as one political entity, has become too unwieldy for one Government to control. The control exercised by the Secretary of State over the Government of India, and the control of the Government of India over the Provincial Governments ties the hands of all Governments, and leads to misrule rather than good Government, particularly in view of the fact that the Secretaries of State seldom possess any personal knowledge of India, and the Government of India is not acquainted with local conditions in the Provinces.

3. It is essential that, for good Government, the Head of the State should be fully acquainted with the conditions prevailing, that he should be easily accessible, and that he should have full power to allow his Government to effect remedies where and when they are necessary. At present the Central Government, being out of touch with the Provinces, is disinclined to give its sanction to measures required in one Province until all the Provinces have been consulted, the outcome of which may be a compromise that does not prove effective. The machinery of a Central Government is far too ponderous and induces excessive centralisation.

4. For such reasons this Association is emphatically in favour of full autonomous Government for the Provinces, which should be regarded as separate States of a federation. The Governor of a Province should have full power to assent to or to veto Bills that concern the Province only. Also, law and order and the judiciary should be under the control of Provincial Governments; so that the law may be made suitable to the people of each Province, and so that the people may possess a judiciary that understands and is in sympathy with them.

5. The powers of the Government of India should be limited to the control of foreign and political affairs, the Army, Navy and Air Force, the Ports, Customs, Railways, Posts and Telegraphs, the Currency, and the Mint, and such affairs that affect the federation as a whole; and the powers of the Secretary of State should be restricted to the control of foreign and political affairs and of the British Army.

17th October, 1928.

Memorandum submitted by the Indian Chamber of Commerce, Lahore.

This Memorandum, submitted on behalf of the Indian Chamber of Commerce (Desi Beopar Mandal) Lahore, consists of two parts:—

(i) A brief note on the working of Reforms in the Punjab.

(ii) A Memorandum on the constitutional changes desired by the Chamber.

The Chamber has recommended, in the first instance, the adoption of the Scheme of Dominion Status suggested in the Report of the Committee appointed by the All-Parties' Conference. The Report may therefore be considered as formally tendered to the Statutory Commission as a part of this Memorandum. It has been thought unnecessary to attach the Report as an appendix, as it is understood that copies thereof are already in the hands of the Statutory Commission.

In passing it is only necessary to note that this Chamber is the oldest Chamber of Commerce in Punjab, and has a membership of nearly forty members, among whom are some of the largest and most influential business houses in the Province, controlling financial and commercial interests estimated at several crores. The Desi Beopar Mandal is recognised as a Chamber of Commerce both by the Punjab Government and Government of India.

NOTE ON THE WORKING OF REFORMS IN PUNJAB.

Analysing the events of the period constituting the record of Punjab's political developments, certain facts of extreme importance emerge. The Reforms came on the morrow of the terrible finale of the O'Dwyer administration. The spirit and temper of the people was hostile to any form of co-operation with a Government that Gandhi was declaring as Satanic, and considering its recent conduct in Punjab the epithet was not far wrong. Punjab was particularly sore, not only had the events of the previous few months come as a rude shock to her traditional loyalty, but the verdict of the House of Lords and the Morning Post fund to Dyer had added insult to injury. They were fortunate in a conciliatory Governor, but the situation needed more careful handling than mere amiability. Though Sir Edward Maclagan did a courageous thing in appointing Sir Fazl-i-Hussain and Lala Harkishen Lal, both of whom had been intimately associated with the Congress movement in Punjab, he failed, for some reason or other, to guide the destinies of the Province in channels of wisdom.

Sir Edward Maclagan's Failure.

It is difficult to say at this margin of time whether Sir Edward Maclagan's failure to give a proper lead was due to weakness or whether he was himself a party to the new policy. As his Finance Member, Sir John Maynard told the Muddiman Committee, Government soon came into the hands of the Mahomedan bloc led by Sir Fazl-i-Hussain, and not until the end of Sir Edward's term was any effort made towards independence of the official bloc. The authors of the Montagu Scheme intended that the official bloc should, by controlling the balance of power, retain the final voice on all major questions of policy. In Punjab the official bloc entirely capitulated and Sir Fazl-i-Hussain obtained the final voice not only in his own department, but in the departments of his colleagues and in shaping the entire policy of the Government. The Province and the country was thereby stamped to a course that proved disastrous to all the best interests of nation building.

The Death of Dyarchy.

Dyarchy had already died a natural death. Though one minister was aggressive and was gradually making himself and his party indispensable to the reactionary official group, it is doubtful whether anyone in the Government worked with any sense of collective responsibility. Every individual in the Government, the two Ministers, the two Executive Councillors and Governor and the Chief Secretary went their own ways. One member of the Government openly in a public speech denounced the declared policy of another member of the Government. The Province went from bad to worse because the Government was composed of all strong men, but no one strong enough to look after the others. The evil of Communalism, born of separate electorates and winked at by certain prominent official members, grew to abnormal proportions. It was everybody's duty to deplore it but nobody's to set it right; similar was the case of the handling of the Akali situation. The Akali movement once started eventually grew beyond control. The subject of dispute, the Gurdwaras, was not in the hands of the Sikh member of the Government, it was in the Education Member's group of subjects. The Minister for Agriculture had strong views on the subject and was known to be negotiating terms of compromise. In addition to these gentlemen, the Chief Secretary could not be ignored nor the Governor, and between the cooks a pretty mess followed. It was not dyarchy, it was anarchy. Dyarchy was from the outset an utter impossibility. As Sir John said to the Muddiman Committee, if we had worked Dyarchy the whole machinery of Government would have broken down. But because the Punjab Government did not, or could not, work dyarchy it does not follow that it was a unitary Government.

Unitary by Sheer Force.

The Government later, however, became unitary from sheer force of circumstances. Towards the end of 1923 one Minister, tired of the interference of the Government of India, the local finance departments and of the abdication of the official bloc to the sweet will and pleasure of a communal bloc resigned a Ministry about which he had never been very keen. His successor was virtually nominated by Sir Fazl-i-Hussain; the Governor approved, even though the choice had previously been convicted of corrupt practices. But the Ministry was short-lived. It was again unseated for corrupt practices and the Governor was so much in the hands of Sir Fazl-i-Hussain that he had to nominate his successor, who was the former Minister's partner in a Rohtak practice. But Sir Fazl-i-Hussain, from the constitutional point of view, had achieved remarkable success, and there can be no doubt that he overcame the obstacles of dyarchy and, through sheer forcefulness and successful tactics, succeeded to a Gadi of power and influence.

Chaudhri Choto Ram.

The new Minister's career was commonplace. He faithfully, if not brilliantly, discharged his duties. It is an interesting question whether to the growth of communalism in Punjab Sir Edward Maclagan was merely indifferent or weak to check, or whether he was a deliberate party to it. There is no doubt that he agreed to the subsidisation of the "Muslim Outlook," and permitted an official member to draft resolutions for the Mahomedan bloc.

Sir Malcolm Hailey.

Sir Malcolm Hailey's policy was from the first somewhat different. He came with all the glamour of success in the Government of India: he came to dominate and to shape the policy of the Government according to his ideas of efficient Government. In appearance and mannerism very like the late Lord Curzon, he was endowed with a stupendous energy and capacity for long tours and exhausting executive committee meetings. The new Governor covered every track of the Province, shook hands with every local official down to the village lambardar, and had taken hold of every string transferred or reserved in the Government. He very soon gave indications that he was out to free the official bloc from its serfdom to the Mahomedan group. He threw over the nominees of Sir Fazl-i-Hussain to the vacant Ministership, and, when some shuffling was necessary on the return of Sir Fazl-i-Hussain from the Government of India, Sardar Tara Singh, a new recruit to the so-called rural party, headed by Sir Fazl-i-Hussain was Chaudhri Chotu Ram. Sardar Jogendra Singh was appointed, who did not belong to the Ministerialists. In the matter of appointments also there was a distinct change. The vacancy caused by the retirement of Sir Abdul Raoof from a Judgeship of the High Court went not to a member of the same community, but to the Government advocate, who was a Christian. This was all to the good, as also the quashing of the Money Lenders Bill, which was one of the most exciting and bitter chapters of political controversy in this Province. The Money Lenders Bill was moved by a private member, but it was given the facilities of a Government measure, as it owed its inception to an official member, and the private member was merely the putative father.

The elections of 1926 brought further changes in the administrative machinery. Chaudri Lal Chand and Chaudri Chotu Ram had been representatives and nominees of the Ministerial Party. A new alliance was made with the bloc of Raja Narendra Nath and it was quite on the tapis that, with the assistance of the non-ministerialists, Government would carry on. The Government accepted Mr. Manohar Lal as Minister, appointed Bakshi Tek Chand to the High Court, and reappointed Sardar Jogendra Singh. A telegram, however, from one of the Congress members, that the Congress group could not co-operate with any ministry, upset the calculated equilibrium and the Governor had to turn again to the "Ministerialists" for some support. Chaudri Shahabuddin was their nominee, but he was superseded and Malik Feroz Khan Noon, who had the support of five or six votes in the Council, was appointed. Angry meetings were held at the house of a prominent official, where no-confidence motions were drawn up.

The Present Ministry.

The present ministry, if not a very outstanding one, was about as good as could have been appointed. It is somewhat unfortunate that none of the members of the present ministry can be regarded as representatives of a public opinion as understood in the West. There is some semblance of unitary Government, because after the Muddiman Committee some attempt was made to take decisions on matters jointly in the Executive Council. The Ministers have made no secret that the policy of their departments is the policy of the Governor, and it is neither their policy nor the policy of the Council. This state of affairs may be satisfactory from the actual results if the Governor is an exceptionally intelligent man, but whether this is desirable in the light of constitutional development is very dubious.

For the moment the policy of communalism is out of the limelight. It was never a very convincing policy nor carried great weight with the masses. There have been riots and some very bloody riots, but the controversy has been superficial. So long as a people have nothing else to quarrel about, religion is the last resort. There can be no doubt that the evils of communalism originate in communal electorates. In the present system, educated gentlemen have to seek election on tenets and beliefs with which they have little sympathy and their entire public careers are moulded, not in the interests of progress, but in the interests of the retention of their seats and offices. That religion is merely a trade mark for most communalists is distinctly in evidence, that many prominent men who proclaim that Islam is in danger break many tenets that Islam holds dear every day of their lives, and similarly those who plead that Hindu interests are being sacrificed to do the same. The masses are not communally biased. Theirs are economic interests and the man in the fields understands his crops better than his God.

Momentous Years.

The years 1920-28 have been momentous in the annals of Punjab history. Punjab has been traditional for its commonsense and practical nature. To the rest of India Punjab has always been more or less an Ulster. Punjab is generally prosperous and prosperous people are less inclined to favour changes of administration. That is behind the policy of rural encouragement in successive Punjab administrations. But with prosperity comes progress, and progress leads to enlightenment. The reforms in the Punjab have been, if viewed from a detached standpoint, successful. There have possibly been some chapters that do not do credit to the history of these years, but these have been more or less the result of extreme causes rather than inherent incapacity to view matters in their correct perspective. As Sir John Maynard put it, the Reforms in the Punjab have brought forth sensible councils, intelligent electors, capable ministers, and that there is no half-way house between dyarchy and full responsible Government.

If asked whether in view of the history of the communal strife in this Province, we should be willing to entrust the Government to a Ministry entirely autonomous, say, headed by Sir Fazl-i-Hussain, we would answer in the affirmative. No Government, not even a communal Government, can carry on in total disregard of other interests or progress, and parties and groups on issues other than communal are bound to be formed. Shorn of the prominence given to matters of petty communal interest, the Reforms have proved an era of marked progress, of vaulable experience, and enhanced responsibility. There have been shortcomings in some particulars; no scheme of things could or has ever been perfect. The working of the Legislative Council, the handling by Ministers of their portfolios, the co-operation of the Press have, in spite of handicaps, been successful. The outstanding contribution to the development of responsible Government is undoubtedly that of Sir Fazl-i-Hussain. One may not agree with everything that he has done, but he has demonstrated the power and capacity of his countrymen to handle the administrative machinery.

Failure of Dyarchy.

The failure of dyarchy has long been recognised by Indian public opinion, but the main contentions of the Indian standpoint were borne out to the Muddiman Committee by Sir John Maynard, then member of the Executive Council in this Province. A brief reference to the salient admissions contained in this evidence may, therefore, not be out of place.

The contention of the Indian witnesses were, in the main (1) that there was interference by the Government of India in matters which mainly concerned Local Governments; (2) that the powers of ministers have been considerably curtailed and obstructed by the interference of the Local Finance Department; (3) that the services enjoy and have enjoyed special privileges; (4) that the real communal antagonism is not in the masses but in the papers; (5) that the "Reforms" were responsible for the party bitterness; that the system of communal electorates and communal Government must be done away with, (6) that dyarchy has failed and must be abolished; (7) that the people have demonstrated their ability for responsible government; (8) that there can be no half measure and that it must be full responsible government.

It may be surprising but each of these contentions was amply established by Sir John Maynard, (1) as to the interference by the Government of India, Sir John, admitted there was a difference of opinion between the Government of India and the Punjab Government over the assent of the former to the introduction of certain Bills of local importance. Two of the Bills referred to transferred subjects. Sir John further admitted the idea of a development loan and said it was not pursued because it was not put forward seriously. He did not explain who did not take it seriously, and reading into the context it is a fair inference that it was his own department that did not take the question seriously. Sir John further admitted in his evidence that in certain matters the control of Government of India had been too tight, and that in others "the shoe has pinched."

In view of Sir John Maynard's admissions the contention that the Local Finance Departments interfered with the working of other departments was not seriously disputed. The Finance Member said that he regarded it as his duty to advise not merely on the final aspects of any proposal, but upon its general utility also. It may be that Sir John had been acting within his powers and it may be that he had been acting in excess of his powers, but upon the fact that he had considered it his duty to advise not only upon purely financial aspects, but to enter into the merits and demerits of projects put before him, it cannot be gainsaid that his department did not interfere with Transferred Departments. The only difference was that whereas popular opinion said the interference was wrong, Sir John Maynard said it was right. The fact of the interference is common ground. Sir John stated: "We do sometimes have to struggle very hard to get the proper weight attached to the financial point of view."

The Services.

As to the services Sir John took pains to explain that they enjoy no special privileges, particularly as regards preaudience, but it is difficult to see how he could speak for departments other than his own. On the other hand, he made a significant confession of "all sorts of lapses." They may be lapses convenient or otherwise, but the existence of the evil is not denied: the attempt was merely to excuse them. The very fact of pleading the excuse was an admission of the subject of the excuse.

Communalism.

Upon the subject of communalism there was singular agreement between Sir John and the various ministers who preceded him before the Committee. The burden of the song of the ministers was that your Reforms, or the system of your Reforms based upon communal electorates and communal partiality, is responsible for the acute differences that now seems to prevail. One minister to be examined denied the existence of fundamental communal difference and said that the difference was largely in the Press. Sir John Maynard corroborated both sets of opinions. In one place, he said that "Reforms have increased communal antagonism," but he naturally did not explain why. In another place he said that the communal feeling is mainly in the papers that except in certain isolated instances it does not exist nor has existed in the Council. That the division is not communal but rural versus urban. Sir John was against further reform because there was communal strife that the Government was in the hands of a "Mahomedan bloc," that it suffered defeat when it alienated the Mahomedan members; but when charged with running a communal system he pleaded that the parties are not communal but rural and urban: that he was opposed to responsible government because of the attitude of the Swarajists but that the latter are an insignificant minority. A bigger bundle of inconsistency and contradiction has scarcely ever been presented on a single occasion as in this unhappy evidence.

Upon the subject of dyarchy the various ministers were unanimous that it is unworkable, impossible and must be done away with. In his anxiety to show that the Punjab Government of the past three years under the present system worked harmoniously, Sir John gave away his case. He said, and repeatedly reiterated, that there was general consultation, general collaboration and general agreement in the Punjab Government, that it was, in fact, a unitary Government, and that "theoretical dyarchy has not existed," and the "dyarchy has worked in the Punjab because it has been ignored," and that "if dyarchy had been worked the whole machinery of Government would have broken down." These are his words. What more could be said "of dyarchy"?

Turning to the question whether an advance should be made, the view of the Liberal Party and Ministers was that "we have done our best, we deserve more." The testimony of Sir John was that you made excellent ministers, as councillors you are sensible, as electors you have proved to be capable and intelligent enough to know your needs and to support the maintenance of law and order. If this, too, be so, where is the hitch? As to half measures Sir John's view was: "it must be all or nothing." "And that" there is no half-way house between dyarchy and full responsible government.

This is the picture that an official member unwittingly and unwillingly disclosed.

In conclusion we venture to draw the attention of the Commission to the Resolution adopted by the All-Parties' Conference regarding the goal of India's aspiration. At present this has been defined and readily accepted as Dominion Status. While we make no claim to forecast the events of the future, we do believe that a contented India is the surest guarantee of harmony and progress among the nations constituting the Commonwealth of the Empire, and the time has arrived when India should take a footing on position equal to the most favoured Dominions. A refusal or postponement of India's aspirations may lead to consequences disastrous both to India and the Empire.

We have every sympathy with the difficulties of the problem that Sir John Simon and his colleagues have undertaken to solve. But we earnestly put it to the Commission to forget a trait, unfortunately long associated with British constitutional history to refuse a good offer at 10 in the morning and to accept much less favourable terms at 3 in the afternoon. There may conceivably come a time when India would not be content with Dominion Status. It would be an act of statesmanship and courage to accept at 12 a little less than would be necessary at half-past two.

A MEMORANDUM ON THE CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES DESIRED BY THE CHAMBER.

1. This Chamber has carefully considered the various questions raised in the questionnaire, upon which the Commission has invited the opinion of the Chamber, and is of opinion that, whereas it is impossible to suggest a scheme of Constitution Reform acceptable to all parties and persons, the Report of the Sub-Committee appointed by the All-Parties Conference (probably known as the Nehru Report) represents as nearly as possible the Indian view-point. This Chamber therefore earnestly recommends that the Nehru Report be carefully considered, and in the absence of another scheme of Dominion status so carefully prepared and generally accepted, the recommendations of the All-Parties Conference be adopted. The Nehru Report may therefore be considered as a part of this Memorandum duly submitted to the Commission.

2. In the event of the Royal Commission not adopting entirely or in main the Nehru scheme, this Chamber would recommend among other Reforms in certain directions, which have as a result of eight years working become necessary.

3. In the opinion of the Chamber, it is essential in the first instance that certain fundamental civic rights should be recognised:—

(a) No incarceration without a trial by the ordinary Courts of the country.

(b) Free right to carry arms.

(c) Free universal elementary education.

(d) Freedom of speech, freedom of association, freedom of the Press in matters not overriding public order or morality.

(f) Right of writ of Habeas Corpus to every citizen except in times of war and rebellion when suspended by the Legislature.

4. This Chamber is of opinion that the process of Indianisation of the services is too slow to meet the needs and the aspirations of the people. This Chamber would therefore recommend that further recruitment of Europeans to the services be entirely stopped. This Chamber thinks that if recruitment of Europeans to the services is stopped, complete Indianisation comes within measurable limits.

5. (a) The powers of the Secretary of State should be revised, so as the Secretary of State for India holds the same status and powers as the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

(b) Parliament should clearly abrogate its authority to legislate in the matter of Reforms in the manner and to the extent of cancelling or modifying any constitutional Reform, or rights once given to the People of India.

6. In the Provincial Governments, this Chamber would recommend the following principle changes :—

(a) All Provincial subjects should be transferred to Ministers. The position of Executive Councillors should be abolished.

(b) Ministers should be appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister, selected by the Governor from among those who can command a workable majority in Council.

(c) Powers of the Governor should be limited to the powers of Governors in the Dominion of Australia. In the event of deadlock or urgent necessity, in times of turmoil the Governor may dismiss the Ministry and assume for a period not exceeding three months the control of the executive machinery of Government.

(d) Franchise for election to the Legislative Council should be the same as for municipalities, and joint electorates with a reservation of seats for minorities may be adopted for the next ten years. Thereafter universal manhood suffrage without reservation. This Chamber is against on principle allowing to majorities privileges and protection which may be necessary to minorities.

(e) Ministers should be responsible to the Councils.

(f) The number of members in Provincial Councils be considerably enlarged, and nomination of members be not allowed.

(g) The present system of secretaries as heads of departments be replaced by the British system of permanent under-secretaries. Secretaries should not have access to the Governor, as the present privileges of secretaries have sometimes been abused.

(i) Nominated members or officials should not be members of the Council.

7. This Chamber recommends that in the Central Government :—

(a) Membership of the Assembly to be enlarged so as to have one member for every 500,000 of the population.

(b) The constitution of the Council of State be amended so as to enlarge its membership. Election to the Council of State should be from Provincial Councils or from Electoral Colleges composed of various local bodies.

(c) The number of members of the Central Government be increased to eight, of whom at least six should be Indians. All subjects except Foreign Affairs and matters pertaining to Indian States be transferred.

(d) The Viceroy's powers of certification be restricted to only exceptional occasions.

(e) The whole Budget, including military Budget, be votable.

8. (a) This Chamber is definitely opposed to the system of nominating members to the Provincial and Central Legislatures. While there was some justification for the practice in the early stages of constitutional development in this country the time has come to do away with the practice, especially if franchise is to be enlarged and membership increased. This Chamber would make an exception in the case of the Council of State, where, say, 10 to 20 per cent. may be nominated by the Governor-General in Council, not to add to the official vote, but as a recognisation of eminent public service or distinction in arts and letters. Such members should be nominated for life.

(b) This Chamber is also opposed to the practice of allowing officials to sit and vote in the legislatures, as the tactics of the official blocs have often been inimicable to India's interest.

9. This Chamber is on principle opposed to communal representation in any form or manner.

10. The Chamber is of opinion that the present practice, unhappily a growing one, of appointing members of the Legislature to eminent offices in Indian States is not only evil as a form of subtle bribery, but tends to demoralise independence and freedom of action in the Legislature itself. If the practice is to be continued of rewarding non-official members by lucrative positions in Indian States such members should cease on the assumption of foreign service to be members of the Legislature.

11. This Chamber is also of opinion that the practice of permitting Government contractors to be members of the Legislature is an unhealthy one. This Chamber would recommend that the acceptance of a Government contract or partnership in a firm obtaining a Government contract should be a bar to election and after election should automatically vacate the seat.

12. This Chamber would, at the convenience of the Commission, be prepared to tender oral evidence in support and amplification of this Memorandum.

Note from the Punjab and Northern India Chambers of Commerce.

1. Representation of Commerce and Industry on the Legislatures and Local Self-Governing Bodies.

(a) How Far we can Substantiate our Claim to be Representative.—There are no other equally important institutions representative of Commerce and Industries in the whole of Northern India. The actual membership of the two Chambers is 130, but numbers alone cannot be relied on as a gauge of importance. We claim to represent the Commercial, Industrial and Banking interests of Northern India, and to be the custodians of the commercial interests of Agriculture, as the list of members represented on the respective Chambers clearly indicates. The chief industrial interest of Government is also represented on the Chambers through the North-Western Railway. Government is also represented through the Punjab Forest Department.

(b) In What Way the Present Representation of Commerce Falls Short of our Needs.—So far as the Punjab is concerned, the present representation of Commerce and Industry on the Legislative Assembly is restricted to a seat held by the Associated Chambers of Commerce. That Association cannot, however, from the very nature of its constitution, deal with local interests, however important they may be, until such interests have obtained the support of every member of the Association. In illustration of this the following instances are given:—

1. At the annual general meeting of the Association, held in December, 1926, the Northern India Chamber moved a resolution urging the necessity for the reweighment by the railway of consignments of coal at the station of destination. The resolution was passed by a majority, but no action was possible by the Association as it was not passed unanimously. The greatest number of votes against the resolution were from the Bengal Chamber, which is interested in the sale of coal.

2. At the annual general meeting of the Association, held in 1923 and 1924, the Punjab Chamber moved a resolution urging a reduction in freight on coal. (Note.—The freight on coal from the Bengal coalfields to the Punjab amounts to nearly five times the actual cost of the coal.) In these cases also the resolutions were passed by a large majority, but again no action was possible by the Association as the resolutions were not passed unanimously.

We feel that we are entitled to have our own representation in the Central Legislature, at least to state our case. Such representation is absolutely essential for us in the Punjab, as we have our own peculiar problems, which are often essentially different from those of, say, Bengal and Bombay. Our affairs cannot be represented by a member from Bengal appointed by the Associated Chambers, and who has probably never seen the Punjab.

There are essential differences in the interests represented by Chambers at the Ports and those represented by inland Chambers to which consideration must be given. The great wheat belt, extending throughout Northern India, is a factor of far greater importance to the Punjab than to the United Provinces. There is no great difference in area of the Provinces, but the population of the United Provinces is double that of the Punjab, and if the North-West Frontier Province is included the disproportion is even greater, and is far greater still if area is taken into account.

We represent the interests of an agricultural Province pure and simple, whilst Bengal and Bombay, for example, are more industrial and commercial. We do not go into details on every point, and so have not come prepared with them. We stress the broad principle, therefore, that we might have very different views to express on various questions coming before the Central Legislature to that expressed by Provinces whose interests are more industrial than agricultural. The Associated Chambers consists of members representing widely divergent interests, and, if a nominated seat for that body on the Indian Legislative Assembly can be called any representation for us, we may be regarded to have it, but at best the proportion is so infinitesimal that it can very well be neglected. The Commercial interests of the area represented by us is very great indeed. Take, for instance, the case of Delhi alone. It has been said on page xix of the Rules under the Government of India Act that Delhi is now the capital of India, and, apart from that, holds a very important position by reason of its commercial interests. Then there are other cities holding undoubtedly great commercial interests in the area represented by the respective Chambers, and it will not be asking too much if we asked for one seat each on the Legislative Assembly and one seat by rotation on the Council of State. We feel that, in view of the vital interests of Commerce and Industry involved in the scheme of taxation of the Central Government, and in questions affecting currency, railway policy and inindustrial and commercial development which are within the Province of the Central Government, their representation on the Central Legislature should be substantially increased. Owing to the proximity of Delhi and Punjab to the seat of the Central Government, the Chambers of Commerce in these areas are in a special position to take advantage of their share in this increased representation.

The foregoing remarks express our views regarding the Central Legislature. So far as regards the Provincial Legislature, the need for separate representation of Commerce, as apart from Trade, has already been admitted by the Government of India. The necessity for the extra representation we ask for is proved by the fact that to cover the best area we represent it has been found desirable to bring into existence two Chambers of Commerce, who are now jointly before you. Detailed arguments in support of our claims will be found in the Memoranda already submitted by the respective Chambers.

As regards Local Bodies, Commercial and Industrial Representation is equally important.

(c) Other Reasons we have to Adduce for Special Representation.—The Chambers feel that if they are to keep abreast of the needs of the Province it can only be done by direct personal contact with the Legislatures and also all the more important local bodies, otherwise their judgment may not be as clear as it ought to be. Take the question of railways. Our view is that the Province ought to have some say on railway matters, and this can only effectively be done by having our own representatives in the Central Legislature, in order to explain how a railway problem may affect the Province in a special way, whilst in no way interfering with railways from a commercial point of view.

The representation we ask for would also be of benefit to Government. You must assess taxation on broad, commercial principles. As Sir Malcolm Hailey recently said to the Northern India Chamber:

> "There is hardly one of the many activities of a Chamber such as this which do not closely affect Government. As the scope of Government activity increases, there is an increase in the number of matters in which action taken by it vitally affects the commercial community."

Sir Charles Innes told the Associated Chambers of Commerce in 1922:—

> "I feel that the more business interests, the more business men we have in the Assembly, the better for Government, and the better for India."

We also feel that it would be to the best interests of Government if Commerce and Industry were represented in the Legislatures as strongly as possible.

Commerce also requires protection against discriminatory legislation and taxation, both local and provincial. In this connection we may draw attention to some undesirable features of the existing Terminal Tax Schedules. In many cases a tax on foreign-made goods is imposed, amounting to as much as double the tax on similar articles of country make. Also the octroi on wheat at Karachi amounts to neither more nor less than an export duty. Both these instances are, in our opinion, an interference with the functions of the Central Government, as discriminatory taxation interferes with the treaty obligations of Government.

(d) What Representation we ask for.—Our Chambers ask for one seat each in the Lower House of the Central Legislature, to be filled by a member representing the views of the interests of both Chambers.

We also ask for two seats for each Chamber in the Provincial Council and one seat each in any Provincial Second Chamber that may be set up.

On local bodies we press for two seats for each Chamber on the Municipal Committees of Lahore and Amritsar, and also ask that seats should be reserved for Commerce and Industry, through our Chambers, in any town or city where such interests are represented by the Chambers, and where a first-class municipality is in existence.

There is a definite agreement between the two Chambers that any seats granted to us on the Legislatures and local bodies should be statutorily secured to us.

(e) How we Propose that any Seats given us should be Filled.—We are agreed that seats granted to the Chambers should be filled by election, members of each Chamber to form the electorate in each case. In the case of the Council of State the seat may be filled by rotation between the two Chambers.

It is pointed out that for years the Associated Chambers of Commerce have been pressing for adequate representation on the Assembly, but do not do so now as they find it very difficult to obtain suitable men to represent them. This disability does not, however, exist with our Chambers, as we are situated near the seat of Government, and members attending the Assembly from Lahore or Delhi would not experience that inconvenience and dislocation of business which members attending from, say, Bengal or Madras suffer as the result of an absence in Delhi or Simla for many weeks at a time.

Memorandum submitted by the Sind Muhamadan Association.

Preliminary.

The Sind Muhamadan Association has viewed with great interest the appointment of the Royal Commission and the object with which it is connected, i.e., the furtherance of India in obtaining further instalments of self-government. The constitutional principle embodied in the declaration of the British Parliament is "the responsible Government within the British Empire." This Association accepts the principle, and hopes that it will be worked out in conformity with the tendency of the age on democratic lines, taking into consideration the peculiar features of the country like the variety of castes, creeds and religions, the predominance of one community over another, and rank communalism dividing the people. Any constitution providing self-government for India which does not contain adequate provision for safeguarding the interests of the minorities will not suit our vast sub-continent.

In framing the present statement for consideration of the Royal Commission the following are the necessary fundamental principles to be taken into view :—

Franchise and Electorates.

The Association proposes to deal first with the two important question of franchise and electorates, as they form the basis of the constitutional structure.

(a) Franchise.—There is a great cry from the Hindu section of the Indian public about the lowering of the franchise or adult suffrage for our Legislative Councils, Central as well as Provincial, but the Muslim section has not favoured it so far because of the comparatively very low standard of education and literacy among the masses of India, most of whom we must sadly admit cannot exercise their vote properly. But in view of the advancing times and the spirit of the age, this Association is of opinion that the grant of adult suffrage need not be delayed any longer.

(b) Electorates.—This Association strongly favours the retention of the present system of separate communal electorates, as it is essentially necessary in the present conditions of this country. The artificial cry raised by a certain section of the Hindu politicians that separate communal electorates are the cause of the existing Hindu Muslim tension, is entirely devoid of justification. As a matter of fact, the system has removed the ever-recurring cause of friction between the two communities, as is evident from the evidence before the Muddiman Committee of Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, late Minister of United Provinces, wherein he says that the system of separate electorates has promoted mutual co-operations and goodwill between the two communities.

The greatest evil of joint electorates is that the voice of the minority, however important and advanced she may be, will merge in that of the majority, and there will be no real and true representatives in the Councils. Separate electorate is, we submit, the most necessary safeguard against the evil.

Connected with these two questions is that of the size of our Legislative Councils. Compared with the legislatures of all democratic Governments in the West, the size of our Legislative Councils is extremely inadequate to secure effective representation of the Indian population. The Association therefore suggests that in future the number of the members of the Council of State should be raised to 150, and that of the Legislative Assembly to 400. The Association further desires to voice the feeling of Indian Mussalmans in regard to their representation on the Central Legislatures by urging that, in view of the vital interest involved, the Mussalmans of India should in no case have less than 33 per cent. representation on these two bodies, as well as on the Councils of those Provinces where Muslim population falls below one-third, in order to secure effective representation of the Muslim community. The membership of various Provincial Legislative Councils should be increased to provide one representative for each unit of a lakh in the population.

The other point which the Association incidentally desires to consider in this connection is the method of election. At present there are only two classes of electorates, viz., Muslim and non-Muslim. The word "non-Muslim" is so very vague and wide that it includes all minor communities in the term of "Hindus." This operates adversely on the depressed classes, Christians and other minor communities. In fairness to these communities, and to revive their political importance which may have suffered by the present system, it is necessary to adopt a different method of election. The Association is, therefore, strongly of opinion that in future the electorates should be divided into four classes, viz. : Muslim, depressed classes, miscellaneous communities and caste Hindus, instead of the two, Muslim and non-Muslim.

In conclusion, the Association deems it desirable in the best interests of the country, strongly to recommend that, as in the case of the Council of State and the British Parliament, the life of the other legislative bodies in India be increased from three to five years.

Muslim Representation in the Punjab and Bengal.

Out of the nine reformed Provinces the Punjab and Bengal are the only two Provinces wherein the Muslim community claims the majority of population, viz., 55 per cent. of the entire number. But, in spite of it, the representation of the community in the two Legislative Councils is only 44 per cent. in the case of the Punjab and about 40 per cent. in the case of Bengal. This is incompatible with the political status of the important community and the Association, therefore, impresses upon the Royal Commission the urgent necessity of redressing the grievance by, as far as possible, adopting in this particular case, the population basis for representation in the respective Legislative Councils.

Reforms in the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan.

The overwhelming majority of the population of these Provinces has been demanding (and justly, too) reforms for the last several years, but this demand has not been satisfied merely because the Hindu minority is alleged to have opposed it. This state of affairs is very unfair; the Association, therefore, strongly recommends that immediate steps should be taken to bring the Settled Districts of the North-West Frontier Province and British Baluchistan in line with the rest of India. This demand on their part has a wholehearted support of the whole Muslim India, and even the Indian National Congress and the majority of the Bray Committee have recognised the justice thereof.

Separation of Sind.

The Province of Sind has absolutely nothing in common with the Bombay Presidency. The union is based neither on ethnological, geographical, linguistic, agricultural, nor any other sound considerations. A mere accident that it was the army of the Bombay that conquered Sind is responsible for this unnatural arrangement. Our Province has suffered very much on this account. Educationally, economically, politically and socially we are far behind the Presidency. Even the development of the Port of Karachi has been impeded on account of the jealousy of the Bombay harbour. Looking to these, and several other circumstances, this Association strongly urges that the Province of Sind should be separated from the Bombay Presidency and given its own executive and legislative machinery. This is the demand of the majority of Sind population, which includes Musilmans, Parsies, Christians, business people belonging to different communities, and a large section of the broad-minded Hindus. The entire Muslim India is also strongly in favour of this proposal and even the Indian National Congress has recognised the justice of this demand.

Future Constitution of India and the Residuary Powers.

India is a vast subcontinent divided into Presidencies and Provinces, inhabited by peoples speaking different languages, possessing divers characteristics, and living under their own respective Provincial Governments. It is therefore inevitable that the constitutional development of the country must be towards the evolution of the Federal State for India within the British Empire, each territorial unit forming a State in itself and all being governed in matters of important common concern by a Central Federal State. In other words, the final goal of administration in India should be the ultimate creation of a United States of India within the British Empire, the future constitution of the Federal States being on the lines of the United States of America, the Central Government possessing only such powers as may expressly be reserved by it and all the "Residuary Powers," being vested in the individual States. The Association is therefore of opinion that the next stage in Indian constitutional advance should be so devised as to facilitate this end.

Secretary of State for India and India Council.

The powers of superintendence and control over India vested in the Secretary of State under Section 2 of the Government of India Act of 1919, are of an embarrassing character and inconsistent with the spirit of the declaration of the 20th August, 1917. The Association is, of course, cognisant of the fact that the time has not yet arrived when the administration of Foreign and Political affairs, the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, can be safely transferred to the popular control, but it is strongly of opinion that the powers of the Secretary of State in matters relating to the internal administration of the country should be completely relaxed, as this unlimited exercise of power by a British politician, sitting in his office 6,000 miles away, with practically no experience of the complicated Indian situation is opposed to the principles of sound administration and the best interests of the country.

The introduction of this reform will render the costly machinery of the India Council absolutely unnecessary. If, at any time, the Secretary of State for India stands in need of advice on matters of foreign administration, the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, he could rely, as he now does, on the experts of respective departments. In any case, the reform suggested will evidently result in the substantial saving of expenditure now incurred on the personnel and staff of the India Council.

Central Government and Legislature.

A further constitutional advance towards the ultimate goal of responsible Government within the British Empire being necessary, the Association respectfully suggests the under-mentioned alterations in the machinery of the Central Executive Government.

(a) Taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances existing in India which are unknown in all civilised countries of the world (viz., variety of religions, rank-communalism, caste-prejudice, etc.), the Association deems it necessary to suggest that the appointments in the Cabinets of the Provincial as well as Central Governments should be so filled as to give the Muslim community an adequate representation therein consistent with their importance in the political sphere and their voting strength in the respective Councils.

(b) Should there be any minor Provinces (like Delhi and Coorg) under the direct control of the Government of India, the system of administration followed in those tracts should be similar to the one followed in the reformed Provinces, the Central Government being made responsible to the Central Legislature for the administration of transferred subjects in the territories directly under its charge.

As a measure of advance towards the ultimate goal of responsible Government the members of the Central Cabinet, particularly those in charge of our universities and the work of co-ordination of provincial activities in the administration of the transferred subjects, should be selected from among the elected members of the Central Legislature and made responsible to it for the due administration of those subjects.

(c) The control of the Central Legislature over the country budget should be sufficiently widened by increasing the number of votable items, particularly with regard to the All India Services except (if absolutely necessary) those relating to the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the foreign and political affairs, and law, order and justice.

The Provincial Governments and Legislatures.

In regard to the Provincial Governments the Association submits the following changes:—

(a) A unitary form of Government should replace the Dyarchy in the Province as in actual working the latter has disclosed enormous practical difficulties and complications.

(b) As a measure of a substantial advance towards the ultimate goal of responsible Government, full autonomy should be conceded to the Province, placing all Provincial subjects in charge of Ministers responsible for their administration to the Provincial Legislatures, the Governor being the constitutional head of the Provincial Government.

In this connection the Association is sadly cognisant of the unhappy events which have disturbed the peace of this country during the last few years. It might, therefore, be argued (and perhaps rightly, too, to some extent) that time has not yet arrived when the subject of law, order and justice can safely be trusted to the popular control. To meet the situation, and only as a temporary measure, the Association suggests that the subject of law, order and justice might be placed under the direct control of the Governor himself, full autonomy being restored when the disturbed conditions settle down.

(c) The control of the Provincial Legislatures should be widened over the Provincial budgets in the manner suggested in regard to the Central Legislatures.

This Association is strongly in favour of the immediate separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency, but if, unfortunately, this united Muslim demand is not immediately possible of compliance, this Association desires strongly to emphasise the urgent necessity of adopting the population basis in the matter of distribution of the Muslim seats (in the Council and Assembly) between the Province of Sind and the Presidency proper. Under the present arrangement, looking to the comparative figures of population, we notice that the Bombay Presidency has been treated favourably, while Sind has not had her due share. There is no justification for this inequitable distribution of seats between the two sections of the same community. The Association, therefore, respectfully urges upon the Statutory Commission the need of an equitable redistribution of the Muslim seats under the new constitutional arrangement.

The Services.

The rate at which Indianisation of services by direct recruitment of Indians to the Imperial service as well as by provincialising the services, has been progressing is rather slow. Even the halting recommendations of the Lee Commission have not yet been put into effect in their entirety. But, at the same time, the Association is of opinion that time has not yet come when the civil administration of this country should be run by Indians alone independent of European civilians. Unfortunately the communalism and caste hatred in India is yet so very high that there is every apprehension of one community dominating the other. In the interests of justice and equity it is very essential to still maintain such proportion of European civilians in service that it may command sufficient influence over the internal administration of the country in holding the balance between the different communities. The Association, therefore, taking into view all these fundamental points which could not go overlooked, makes the following recommendations:—

(a) The Indian Civil Service is a costly machinery, and, therefore, to make the administration a little cheaper and, on the other hand, to encourage better class of people to enter the subordinate service, it is necessary to raise the proportion of the Provincial service men holding posts of District Collectors and District Judges. The Association is of opinion that 40 per cent. all round will be a fair proportion for the men belonging to Provincial service.

(b) The remaining 60 per cent. appointments should be held by the I.C.S. people. Out of that two-thirds of Europeans should necessarily be recruited every year and one-third Indians. Thus European civilians will have 40 per cent., Indian civilians 20 per cent., and Provincial service men 40 per cent.

(c) In order to safeguard the interests of the Muslim minority in the case of men belonging to Provincial service holding these high posts, the Muslim community should have its proportion equal to its population in each Province; and on the other hand, in the case of Indian civilians, special effort should be made to secure one-third of Mussalmans in service. Till Mussalmans are able to secure this reasonable share in the open competition 25 per cent. of the seats allotted to Indians be filled with Mussalman suitable candidates by way of nomination.

2. Equitable Recruitments.—The unanimous demand of the entire Muslim community in India for their proportional share in the administrative machinery of the country, is perfectly consonant with the principles of justice and equity. The very grounds hitherto urged by the Indian politicians for the Indianisation of our services apply equally to an equitable adjustment of the claims of the various communities to a proper share in the administration of the various departments which manage the affairs of the country and look after the welfare and happiness of the people. Indeed, it is not so much Legislative Councils which comes into direct contact with the Indian masses as the various departments of our administration, and it is in reality in the hands of the latter that the welfare and contentment of the vast population of the country lies. It is obvious, therefore, that it would not be only unjust but would also constitute a grave political danger to allow the services which administer the various departments to become the monopoly of a class. The existing position, undoubtedly, is that with the exception of our fighting forces and the police, there is an overwhelming majority of caste Hindus almost monopolising all branches of our public services, and the Muslim community, in spite of its educational progress and political importance, is inadequately represented in our administrative machinery.

The Association earnestly hopes that means will be devised as a result of which, consistently with the needs of efficiency, the Muslim community would obtain its due share in the services in order to secure the happiness and contentment of all alike.

Separation of Judicial and Executive Functions.

For several years past the Indian public opinion has unanimously demanded separation between the Judicial and Executive functions of the administrative machinery. This Association is aware that for obvious reasons (including the one of expenditure) it is not immediately possible to carry out this much-needed reform, but it hopes that a substantial step will be taken in that direction in the near future. The separation between the two functions may be gradual, but the time has come when it should be taken in hand forthwith.

The Agricultural Class.

The Association views with great regret the fact that the economic position of the agricultural class of this country is rapidly deteriorating owing to the heavy burden of taxation. The agriculturists pay varying from 25 to 50 per cent. of their income towards the State; whereas all the other classes and industries contribute a maximum of one-eighth of their income towards the State. This fact has made agriculture the least paying industry in India. India's main industry is agriculture, and therefore it is the bounden duty of Government to put forth special efforts to ameliorate the condition of the poor agriculturist in the Mufassil. In other civilised countries of the West, just as Great Britain, the landowners pay only income tax just as business people and the people of all other classes. This procedure exempts the peasant proprietors from the heavy burden of taxation, and allows them to make their living out of their small bit of land with contentment, without seeking any other occupation. The principle enunciated in India by the British Government that the ownership of soil vests in the State, is without any foundation, and does not find support from any section of the public. The Indian Taxation Inquiry Committee recently appointed by the Government of India has expressed the view that the ownership of the soil vests in the individual owner and not the State. This opinion of the Committee is supported by various facts. This is one of the main reasons why the state of the agriculturists in India is getting worse day by day. The Association therefore urges upon the Royal Commission to recommend to the British Parliament any such measure that it considers advantageous and beneficial to the agriculturists of this country, so that the great bulk of population of British India may live in peace and contentment.

The Safeguards for the Muslim Minority.

The following are the safeguards that the Association considers necessary to be provided before any step is taken to grant further instalments of self-government to this country. If the British Parliament does not provide these safeguards the Association is quite confident that self-government in India will operate adversely on the Muslim community and other minorities, and it will be a complete failure in this country, peculiarly constituted as it is :—

(a) The retention of present system of separate electorates.

(b) Adequate representation of Muslim community and other minorities in the Central and Provincial Cabinets.

(c) To maintain due proportion of Mussalmans in services high and low, in view of the recommendations made in the special paragraph on the subject.

(d) To allot one-third representation in the Central Legislature and in those Provincial Legislatures where the population falls below one-third.

KARACHI.*

Dated 12th November, 1928.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND), AND OF THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Sind Muhammadan Association.

The deputation consisted of:—

1. Mr. Muhammad Ayub Shah Muhammad Khuhro, M.L.C.
2. Mir Ayub Khan, Barrister-at-Law, First Class Honorary Magistrate.
3. Mr. Abdur Rahman, Barrister-at-Law, Karachi.
4. Mr. Wahidbaksh Illahibaksh Bhutto, M.L.A., Zamindar.
5. Khan Bahadur Jan Muhammad Khan, M.L.C.
6. Mr. Muhammad Kamil Shah, Zamindar.
7. Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally, B.A., LL.B.
8. The Hon. Mr. Ali Baksh Muhammad Hussain, Member, Council of State.

1. Chairman: Mr. Khuhro, you, I think, are going to be the principal spokesman, are you not?—(Mr. Khuhro): Yes, I am.

2. You are, I think, a member of the Bombay Legislative Council for the Larkana district?—Yes.

3. One of the three members, is it not?—Yes.

4. Then I see Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally, whom I had the pleasure of meeting last night. He was a member, I think, of the Legislative Assembly for two periods?—Yes.

5. He is also a special first-class magistrate and a gentleman who has a very long experience of the district?—Yes.

6. Have we also here, I think we have, Sardar Wahidbaksh, a member of the Legislative Assembly?—Yes.

7. What is the constituency he represents?—The Zamindars and Jagirdars of Rural Sind.

8. And in Mr. Abdur Rahman we have an advocate practising at Karachi?—Yes.

9. And the Honourable Mr. Ali Baksh is a member of the Council of State?—Yes.

10. Then, of course, we have Khan Bahadur Jan Muhammad Khan, M.L.C., and others?—Yes.

11. I think the best course will be to ask you, Mr. Khuhro, to make a short statement in support of your Memorandum. You will appreciate that we all have your Memorandum and have read it with a great deal of care; so it will not be necessary to refer to every point mentioned therein. But if you would like to make a short statement you may do so?—I want to submit a short statement of the demands that we wish to put forward on behalf of our Association. The first thing that we want is that Sind should be separated from the Bombay Presidency and constituted into a separate autonomous Province.

12. You want the separation of Sind and the creation of Sind as a separate Province?—Yes. Our next demand is that we want separate electorates for the Legislature, the local as well as the central, the local bodies and educational institutions, such as the university.

13. You want separate electorates wherever there is [illegible] apparently?—Yes.

14. Just let us [illegible] see how it is now. As far as the Bombay Council is [illegible] concerned in Sind there are separate electorates are th[illegible]ere not?—Yes, there are.

15. Supposing that Sind remained part of the Bombay Presidency, do you wish that to continue?—Yes, we wish to be represented by separate electorates, as is the case at present.

16. Do I understand you to say, also, that if Sind were to be separated and a new Province created, in this new Province of Sind you ask for separate electorates?—Yes.

17. The Mahomedans will be in a very large majority?—Yes. At present what we feel is this: It is very essential for us to be separated. If we get separation then the question arises whether the majorities should have separate electorates or not. That is a separate issue.

18. What you really meant was that, as things now are, with Sind as part of the Bombay Presidency, you wish to have separate electorates in Sind?—Yes.

19. But supposing that Sind was made a separate Province, you reserve the question whether there should be separate electorates or not?—Yes, that should be reserved for a subsequent stage.

20. The population of Sind is about 3¼ millions and of those 3¼ millions about 2½ millions are Mahomedans?—That is true, but we have got other disadvantages at the same time.

21. You wish to have the majority protected?—I would submit that, though we are in a majority so far as the population is concerned, we have so many other disadvantages. For instance, most of our population is in the mofussil and the Hindu population is largely in big towns where they can easily go to the polling booths, and, further, they are more educated. Their voting strength at present is nearly equal to ours though their population is about 27 per cent.

22. I would just like to follow that. In the Bombay Government memorandum we have got three figures by adding which we should get the present voting strength of the Hindus. In round figures there are 18,000 of them in Karachi city, there are 24,000 of them in Eastern Sind and 25,000 of them in Western Sind. The total of these figures comes to 67,000. What do you suppose the total Mahomedan voting strength is?—Roughly, I think, it is the same. Over and above that there are other disadvantages, for instance, the bania class exercise great influence in the mofussil. The Hindu community is far more organised on account of their education and other facilities they had already. They are represented in greater numbers in the public service, and they have got a good deal of influence.

23. Do I understand you to say that in the public service of Sind, the Hindus have a larger share than is proportionate to their population strength?—Yes, much larger.

24. And you think that is a reason why you want separate electorates?—Yes, that is also one of the reasons.

25. May we go on to the next point?—Our next demand is that we should have one-third share in the legislature, central as well as provincial.

26. Your point seems not to be limited to Sind but is a more general one?—I am talking of the Bombay presidency as a whole.

27. You think, supposing that Bombay presidency remains as it is now, that the Mahomedans ought to be secured in one-third of the total number of seats?—Yes. At present also we enjoy about 31 per cent. of the seats. As a matter of fact when the investigations with regard to the last reforms was going on the Lucknow Pact conceded enhanced representation for the Muslims wherever they were in minority, and in view of that we got this representation. We think that taking into consideration our political importance and our past history we should have excess of representation.

28. May I say, Mr. Khuhro, that as far as the general argument goes with regard to India as a whole, the Conference has heard a good deal about this argument, and received many memoranda. So I hardly think it will be necessary to discuss this morning the more general point. I just ask you this about it. Do you mean that in your view the Mahomedans in every province should be guaranteed one-third of the total seats, but that in provinces where they have a larger population than one-third, they should have more than one-third of the seats?—According to the Montford reforms there are nine provinces, out of which in only two the Mussalmans have got a majority.

29. Let us take the two where the Mahomedans are in a majority. Do I understand you to ask not for one-third but in proportion to the population?—In those provinces also the Mahomedans have a narrow majority, so that should be maintained, lest majority may not become minority.

30. Can we take your next point?—The next point is with regard to the one-third share in the Cabinet as we have asked in our memorandum, and that should be by an Act of Parliament by which we should get a fixed share in the Cabinet of the local as well as the Central Government.

31. Let us stick for the moment to the Bombay council, or rather to the Bombay Government. At present there is a Mahomedan minister. There was a Mahomedan minister, I understand, who belonged to Sind, and who is now an Executive Council Member. Do I understand you to say that here in Bombay you would like to secure that in the future administration there should always be a Mahomedan member? Is that right?—At present there are two sides, the executive and the transferred.

32. I was assuming that in the future there will be the same administration, which you called a Cabinet—the word does not perhaps matter. You say that apart from representation in the legislature you would like to secure what you regard as a proper Mahomedan representation in the executive?—Yes; we want adequate representation in the executive in proportion to our members in the legislature.

33. There, again, it is rather a general question which the Conference has heard a good deal about in other places. What is your next point?—The next point is with regard to the safeguards for the minorities, such as religious freedom, and that of profession, etc.

34. Safeguards for the minorities?—Yes.

35. Are you speaking of Sind?—I am speaking of the Bombay presidency as a whole. It is a general point, more or less.

36. Does it apply to Sind?—If Sind is constituted as a separate province we will no longer be in a minority.

37. Somebody else will be. If Sind is constituted a separate province, you truly say that the Mahomedans will no longer be in a minority, but when you urge protection for minorities, is that limited to Mahomedan minorities?—At present I was talking of the Muslim minority of the Bombay presidency as a whole. We have no objection to any minority being similarly protected.

38. You are prepared to concede protection for minorities without asking which the minority is?—If Sind is separated, of course there will be minorities of other communities.

39. What is your next point?—With regard to education I wanted to say that we are very backward, and therefore special provision ought to be made by which Mussalmans should have adequate funds for improving their educational facilities, and that should be the first charge on the Government exchequer. And then our last demand is that zamindars and jagirdars should have extra representation. At present they have got only one seat from whole of Sind on the Bombay Council, and the Sirdars and Inamdars and Taluqdars of the presidency get only two seats. And on the Legislative Assembly they (Sind Jagirdars) get one seat alternately.

40. Your last point is concerned with land-owning representation?—Yes.

41. You pointed out that at present in the Legislative Assembly there is one representing landowners in the Bombay presidency. I understand that he represents Sind landowners during one Assembly, and presidency proper landowners during another?—Yes, we get representation alternately.

42. Then you pointed out also that in the Bombay Legislative Council there is one member from Sind representing the landowners?—Yes, that is Zamindars and landowners. There are two from the presidency.

43. What is it which you ask for which would change that?—The number of seats ought to be increased. Now, as a matter of fact, their representation is too small.

44. By how much do you want to have representation in the Legislative Council of Sind landowners increased?—Of course, the Association has not decided on that point, but personally I think that there ought to be two seats instead of one.

45. You are speaking personally, and your view is that you must have two seats?—Yes.

46. Have I fairly got from you the main points?—Yes.

47. Chairman: Before my colleagues put their questions to you, is there anything which others wish to say?

Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally (second witness): I only want to add a few words so far as the backwardness of the Mussalmans is concerned. There is, first of all, the Mahomedan illiteracy and the Mussalman agricultural people, who are the principal voters in the province, are entirely under the influence of the money-lenders, who exercise a very enormous power on these agriculturists. On the one hand, they are under the influence of this moneyed class, and on the other the services preponderate with the Hindu influence. In fact, the proportion of Hindu service men will be about four to five times more than the Mussalmans. Therefore these subordinate Hindu officials also influence the Mahomedan voters, and the result was that even in the local bodies before the Reforms came in we Mussalmans could not get a seat in the municipalities. In the district boards at least there was some influence which the Mussalmans could command, but in municipalities, and particularly in the Karachi municipality, there are very many cases in which not one Mussalman could get elected, although the Mussalman population is fairly large and the Mussalman voters also are equally large. That was chiefly because these joint electorates and the Mussalman voters were influenced so much that they could get hardly a representation. It was on account of that that we got separate elecorates in the local bodies, in municipalities and district boards. If we revert back to joint electorates now, our position will be the same as it was before the Reforms in the municipalities and district boards. And therefore I say that we require separate electorates whether Sind is made into a separate province or continues to remain with Bombay.

Chairman: I might perhaps at this juncture say that Mr. Stewart has added up the figures, and they certainly are very striking. As things are now, the non-Mahomedan voters in Sind amount to 67,000, and the Mahomedan voters add up to 59,000. Certainly it is very striking, in view of the fact that two and a half out of the total of three and a quarter millions are Mahomedans. So that it really comes to this, that the three Hindus who sit in the Council representing Sind have got much more populous constituencies than the fourteen Mahomedans who sit in the Council. That is, 14 members share a constituency of 59,000 voters, while three members share a constituency of 67,000. That is striking.*

48. Major Attlee: You said that the Mahomedans are very much under the influence of the bania class?—Yes.

49. Can you tell us the process in which the influence is exercised?—The thing is the Mussalmans who are the agriculturists generally belong to the peasant class, and they do stand in need of borrowing money from the bania money-lenders. It naturally follows that at the time of election, if there were joint electorates, the bania who would be directly interested, will bring to bear his influence of money, and the Mussalman voter who is under his thumb will certainly consider twice before he does anything against his will.

50. But how is that done? Supposing you have an election and a large number of voters vote for the Mahomedan against the will of the bania, how is the influence exercised?—There are other difficulties also. For instance, a bania does not advance loans only by taking mere receipts. He lends his money on the mortgage of landed property. Supposing he advances Rs. 1,000, he takes the extra precaution to get mortgaged a property worth Rs. 10,000, which also is done by a clear sale deed, hence the future fate of that Mussalman more or less is in the hands of that bania.

51. But supposing you have an election, and supposing for the seat there are only Muslim candidates. What has the money-lender got to do with it?—There the money-lender could insist on a particular Hindu candidate being put up and voted for against the Mahomedans. The Mahomedans have got no such organisation among themselves as to make it a common thing and join together in voting.

52. Then the second point is this. When it has been suggested that there should be joint electorates with reservation of seats, is has been said that in that case what you call bad Mahomedans would be put up against good Mahomedans?—Yes, that has actually happened.

53. Why has not the bania now with separate electorates succeeded in putting up his candidates?—At present the fight is between one Mahomedan and another Mahomedan, and one Hindu and another Hindu, and therefore, as a matter of fact, the bania is not interested. Of course, even at present a certain amount of influence is exercised, but it is not so much as it will be if the communal electorates are changed into joint, when he will have a strong additional advantage of Hindu voting.

54. Why not? Supposing you have a politically conscious bania class, why do not they do it now?—At present the Mussalmans, as they have got their own separate electorates, generally select the best Mahomedan candidates to stand, and they succeed almost always, although occasionally there might be some difference here and there.

Chairman: I was going to make this suggestion for the sake of good order. I think it might be a convenient plan if questions to these gentlemen about their desire for the separation of Sind—a very important point—were put as it were together separately at the end of our morning sitting, because otherwise all points will be mixed up. Perhaps there might be a few questions to be put by other members on other matters.

55. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: You consider the Sikhs in Sind a distinct community from the rest of the Hindus?—No; they are for all practical purposes Hindus, but they are very few.

56. But you consider the depressed classes a distinct community?—As a matter of fact, there are very few depressed classes people here. Their number is absolutely negligible. In Thar and Parkar district we have got a few.

57. You have recommended separate electorates for them in your memorandum?—We have said that ultimately that should be the method to secure their proper representation, which otherwise will be difficult to ensure.

58. Do you recommend adult suffrage now?—The Association, of course, by a majority decided it.

59. You have stated at page 202 that the grant of adult suffrage need not be delayed any longer?—The Association did decide so by a majority, but my own personal view is that some time ought to be taken before adult suffrage is given.

60. Then, on this matter, you differ from the others?—Slightly I do, and that for two reasons. One is that at present there is the objection of Mussalman women going to the polling booths. They observe purdah, and that is one of the difficulties in our way; and secondly, there is the backwardness of education among the Mohamedans.

61. But your Association has recommended it?—Yes, that is the majority demand.

62. Does this recommendation apply to Sind alone, or does it apply to the whole country?—Of course, we are talking for the whole of India.

63. Sind, if it is separated, will also have adult suffrage then?—Yes.

64. In that case you will have 74 Mussalmans to 26 non-Mussalmans. That will be the percentage of your voting strength in Sind?—Ordinarily the percentage will be according to population, I think, which is roughly 72 per cent. against about 28 per cent. non-Muslims.

65. The population is 72 per cent. Mussalmans?—Yes, roughly.

66. Still you demand separate electorates?—We recommend separate electorates, as I replied to the Chairman when we consider the question as connected with the Bombay presidency. But when Sind is separated, we say that it will then be quite a separate issue, because we will not then be in a minority, and the question will then arise whether a majority community should have a separate electorate. Along with that there are other difficulties in our way. We do not think that we have got the majority of voters, and therefore, we will not be able to return a good number of our representatives unless adult suffrage is also granted along with it.

67. You want 33 per cent. Mussalman representation in provinces where they are in a minority?—Yes.

68. You want that representation in Madras and the Central Provinces as well?—In Madras the Mussalmans are very much in a minority. But then you have got their political importance, and other things also to be taken into consideration. At the time when we were considering this question we were mainly thinking of the Bombay presidency, and in the Bombay presidency they must have one-third. And I think the Mussalmans all over the country wherever they are in a minority must have excessive representation.

* NOTE.—The figure of 59,000 was challenged as too small next day by the spokesman of the Hindu deputation, vide p. 238. Q. 11.

69. Your memorandum says that the Mussalmans should in no case have less than 33 per cent. representation even in councils of those provinces where the Muslim population falls below one-third?—Yes, because of the other considerations that I have pointed out that the Mussalman minority is a very important minority, and it does need a special concession.

70. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Your recommendation is that in those provinces where Mohamedans are in a majority, a majority of seats should be reserved for them, and in the provinces where they are in a minority at least one-third of the seats should be reserved for them?—Yes.

71. Are you prepared to concede the same privileges to the Hindus as well?—No, because the Hindu community is in a very large majority throughout India, while the Muslim community is in a minority.

72. You are going to penalise the Hindus for their advanced state of progress?—No, it is a question of safeguarding the minorities.

73. Do you not think that by giving effect to your proposal the backward communities will rule the advanced communities?—I do not think so, because I think personally that if the backward communities are given their share in the public services, and also in all the elected bodies, even then they will not dominate the situation. May I tell you my personal experience of the Bombay council that, though we have got at present an excessive representation, if all minorities join together we are nowhere, unless and until Government comes to our support. As an instance, I might cite the recent voting that took place on the University Bill. All the members of the non-Brahmin party, the Mussalmans and the depressed classes were united, but because Government did not support them, our amendments were thrown out.

74. Your position is like this, that though you may get all you want you are not sure of safeguarding the interests of your community unless you have the Government bloc at your back?—No; the Government bloc may not remain hereafter. What we want is that the minority must have excessive representation, so that it may not be terrorised and subjected by the majority communities.

75. That is perfectly true, but what safeguard would you give to the other communities to see that they are not penalised by your community?—Our community being in a minority the majority communities need have no such fear.

76. Your point of view is that the advanced community is likely to terrorise your community while your community is not. Well, on page 202 of your memorandum, you say that "The Association is strongly of opinion that in future the electorates should be divided into four classes—Muslim, depressed classes, miscellaneous communities, and caste-Hindus." You want separate electorates for all four of them?—I think so; otherwise there is no chance for the depressed class and other communities being represented when the Legislatures are wholly elective. At present they come in only by nomination.

77. Having given you a majority in Sind and in the provinces where you have a numerical strength, how would you apportion the rest of the seats?—I will first fix the seats for the Mussalmans and then distribute the remaining seats amongst the other communities.

78. You say "Give us what we want and divide the rest amongst yourselves as best as you can"?—Yes.

79. Now as regards the influence of the bania, has there been any single case in which your community has complained, and complained successfully, either by an election petition or otherwise, of any election having been influenced by the bania?—My colleague gave you the reply that before separate electorates were given in the municipalities hardly any Muslim was returned.

80. That is not the answer to my question.—(Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): May I have your permission to answer that question?—I would say that it is very difficult to prove this influence of one class over another; it is impossible to put in any election petition on the point. You know, even corruption at elections is very difficult to prove. So there have been few election petitions after the Reforms in the various provinces, and none in Sind.

81. We can then take it that this is your allegation, but that it cannot sufficiently be proved?—I deny that proposition.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I am asking you whether this thing has ever been put to test?

Chairman: Let me summarise. The opinion which is strongly and firmly held by these gentlemen is that, in fact, there is the influence of the bania; but on the other hand it is quite frankly admitted that it has never been made the subject of election petition, and no proof of it in an election petition has ever been offered. That, I think, is a fair summary.

82. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You have said that the non-Muslims or the Hindus are better organised than yourselves. Now, if we give you what you now want, will that improve your organising capacity? How will that improve when you are so much illiterate and so much backward?—Education will improve.

83. What is the stimulus you have left for organising yourselves?—Education will be the stimulus.

84. How will you educate yourselves? If you were to get a special education grant, that is a different matter. But by apportioning political power in proportion to your numerical strength, would it not perpetuate your backwardness by giving you what you ought not to get till you are advanced?—(Mr. Khuhro): It will take some time for us to organise ourselves, as we are backward . . .

85. I quite admit that you are not sufficiently educated, and as well organised as the Hindus. Having assumed that, we say we give you certain facilities which you would not be entitled to, but for your backwardness. Now, by giving you special facilities, by giving larger representation, what guarantee is there that you would then come up to the Hindus in point of education and general progress?—(Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): May I point out that one of our demands detailed in our memorandum is that we should have special facilities for education. Education is the one thing that will organise us. Along with these special privileges as you may call them for the time being, if our education receives an impetus by special provisions, we will, in course of time, be better organised than what we are now. The Hindu community also organised itself after it received education, and now the Hindus are well organised because they are highly educated. Similarly, as our education improves from time to time, we will be better organised, and all these special difficulties that you are referring to will vanish. I cannot say—and it is impossible to say—that because you give us some special facilities, that in itself will remove backwardness. But along with these we want special facilities for education, and as soon as we are on a par, so far as education is concerned, with the other communities, all these special privileges will vanish and we will be better organised and be in a position to stand on our own legs.

86. How long, Khan Bahadur, will it take before you are better organised?—That will depend upon the special facilities we get.

87. Supposing we give you all that you want. May I ask you how long the other community has taken to organise itself?—If special facilities are provided for education we will organise ourselves soon; the more funds you give us for education the less time we will take.

88. Taking the view that you do, Khan Bahadur, and supposing all reasonable and adequate facilities are given and the concessions you ask for are granted, how many years, do you think, it will require for you to organise yourselves?—It is impossible to prophesy.

89. Roughly?—It all depends upon what special facilities you give us and for how long.

90. What I am afraid of is that it might lead to the perpetuation of this system, which I think should be avoided.—(Mr. Khuhro): I do not exactly follow you. I want to know what do you call in the present case a concession or a facility.

91. Chairman: Let me try again just to sum up the point. It seems to me that the point of Sir Hari Singh Gour's question is really this. If you are guaranteed the same representation and the same political rights, however backward you are, do you think that is a good way to encourage your progress? I can quite understand that people who feel that they are at a disadvantage ask for and may require special protection. But you always have to consider the other argument: Is the protection which you give them likely to encourage them to be strong enough afterwards, to live in a freer world? Exactly the same question arises in economics. One of the difficulties about granting protection by tariffs is that it tends to make people rely upon protection and therefore go on asking for more. In the same way, the question of Sir Hari Singh, if he will allow me to say so, is if the Mahomedans here are guaranteed the same representation, however backward they may be and however much they may fail to resist influences like that of the bania, do you think that that is going to create a spirit of political independence which will make them afterwards stand on their own feet?—(Mr. Khuhro): In India there are many divisions, there are many religions, unlike other countries. It will have a peculiar Constitution. We are divided on religious grounds. If the minorities have not got any safeguards, it will be difficult for them to live; the minorities must have safeguards for their existence. We therefore consider that this safeguard of extra representation or separate electorates must be granted to minority communities, not as a concession but a necessity for protection.

92. Chairman: I understand you, Khan Bahadur, to say that you do not look forward to the indefinite preservation of separate electorates, but you think that it is necessary at present and for some time to come. Is that right?—(Khan Bahadur. Wali Muhammad Hussanally): Yes, Sir.

Mir Ayub Khan: I think the answer to Sir Hari Singh Gour's question is that when the Mohamedans who have been under this domination find that the domination has gone, that will be an impetus and encouragement to them to organise themselves better than what they are at present, and having learnt that lesson after experience of some years, I am sure they will come to that standard to which you expect them to come.

93. Sir Hari Singh Gour: That is your hope?—Yes. I may also add, Sir, I think it will be fair that in such places or provinces where there are other minorities, in fairness we must extend to them the same privileges and the same protection that we claim.

Mr. Abdur Rahman: I agree with my friend Mr. Mir Ayub Khan.

94. Chairman: Your proposal is for protection in the special circumstances of India, and you are prepared to say that it should be applied indefinitely, whatever the minority may be?—Yes.

95. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Do you want separate electorates?—(Mr. Khuhro): Yes.

96. Do you think that is necessary for your existence as a community?—Absolutely necessary.

97. Do you think that if this right is not conceded to you, you will become a political nonentity?—We will be nowhere.

98. Do you think that if this right is not conceded to you, your progress will not proceed as rapidly as that of the sister community, and that you will be hampered at every step by the diligence or the superior culture of the Hindus?—I think our progress will be entirely blocked if we have no separate electorate.

99. Your progress will not be as rapid as you expect without establishing your separate rights?—Yes.

100. Could you please tell me whether you want provincial autonomy?—If adequate safeguards are provided for the minorities by the British Parliament, we will agree to any further advancement, provincial autonomy or anything else, but unless that is done we do not think we can recommend the grant of provincial autonomy.

101. What do you think should be the controlling authority of the Central Government or the Government of India?—I think His Excellency the Viceroy, as representative of the King Emperor, should be the controlling authority.

102. That is true. What I want to know is, do you want the Government of India to be invested with sufficient authority in order to control the provinces?—Yes; in certain cases it will be found necessary that the Government of India should have control; the Central Government ought to be sufficiently strong in cases of emergency.

103. What do you think about Law and Order—should it be reserved or transferred?—I cannot recommend it to be a transferred subject at present; it should be reserved.

104. Chairman: You say in answer to Sir Zulfiqar's question whether you think Law and Order should be transferred that you do not think it should be transferred at present, but you think it should be reserved. Is that an expression of your personal opinion or is it the view of your Association?—We have laid that down in our memorandum.

105. You are speaking for the majority of your Association?—Yes.

106. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Can you tell me what is your idea of the recruitment of the services? Should efficiency be the sole criterion of appointment to the services?—No, I do not think so. All communities should have a fair share in the public service of their country, and that should be the main consideration.

107. I want to be very clear on this point. It is a very important subject for all concerned. If you are not given your proper share in the public services, and even with the Indianisation of services the monopoly of services is given to other communities, would you under those conditions demand Indianisation of services?—We will not demand Indianisation of services unless our community, or all minority communities are given their due share in the public services. I certainly attach more importance to the share that will be allotted to all communities, including the minority communities, than to the Indianisation of services which will result in a monopoly of certain advanced communities in the services, which is most objectionable to our Association. I therefore submit that our definite view is that our community must have a proper proportion in public services and so all minorities.

108. Chairman: Let me put it this way. Do I understand you rightly to say that you attach more importance to securing that the Mohamedan community gets what you regard as an adequate share of the posts than you do to Indianisation in the abstract, and that you would be opposed to the application of Indianisation if it resulted in the overwhelming predominance of one community? Do I put it quite right?—Yes, quite right.

109. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: With regard to the services, you want adequate representation to every community in every province in the country. When you say that, may I know whether you have due regard to the efficiency of the services?—So far as efficiency is concerned, my view is that efficiency is already sacrificed with the question of Indianisation. There is a great demand that there should be Indianisation of services. So efficiency is already out of question.

110. Do you mean that if efficiency is already sacrificed, that mistake should be repeated in future?—I do not think it is a mistake. I think it is fair that a proper share is given to all communities in the administration of the country.

111. Even at the sacrifice of efficiency?—Efficiency will not be sacrificed. If at all you believe so it is already sacrificed.

112. What mode of recruitment do you suggest for the recruitment of services? Should it be by a Public Service Commission or should it be by nomination entirely by the head of the province?—If there is a question of selection it must be from all communities, and so long as they are competent they must be nominated by the head of the province and the minister in charge, just to see that all communities are properly represented.

113. Are you aware that in provinces where the appointment lies in the hands of the minister there is a general complaint that too much favouritism is shown for the sake of communalism?—(Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): So far as that is concerned, so long as the appointments are made by any human agency, that complaint will remain; but the question to decide is whether such complaints have any substance.

114. You advocate universal suffrage? Do you include women also?—(Mr. Khuhro): Our council has already given the right of voting to women.

115. Do you think that this right will be fully exercised by the women of your community?—It will take some time before they fully exercise the right. It is only very recently that this right has been given. Personally, I think that it is too early to extend that privilege to them because of their lack of education. But unless some special arrangements are made they may not be able to exercise that right fully.

116. Chairman: The question as to whether there should be or should not be women suffrage under the present arrangements is a question to be decided by the various Provincial Legislatures in India?—The discretion was given to the Provincial Council, and there was a resolution moved by Dr. Paranjpye in the Bombay Council for the extension of franchise to women which was carried by the Council, though the majority of the Mohamedans were opposed to it.

(Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally, witness): May I supplement the answer? So far as the question of joint and separate electorates is concerned, it may be noted that there is a very strong sentiment of purdah amongst us Mussalmans, though the purdah amongst the Mussalmans is being given up very slowly. Therefore if there are joint electorates we will be at a very great disadvantage, because our women will not go to the polling booths in great numbers, and it will take perhaps thirty or forty years before our women fully exercise their votes. But if there are separate electorates for ourselves, then whether the women have got the right of voting or not will not affect it materially.

117. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: May I know the percentage of literate adults in Sind?—(Mr. Khuhro): The percentage of literate adults is very very low; it is something like two or three per cent.

118. And still you advocate universal suffrage?—Yes, that is the opinion of the majority, though personally I am not for its immediate grant, as I have already stated.

119. Great stress has been laid on the influence of the bania class. I have not been able to understand how that is detrimental to the interests of the Muslim community?—I stated that things had gone to such a pitch as we anticipated. Our apprehension is, as I have stated, that if circumstances change, then it will be a question for serious consideration.

120. Dr. Suhrawardy: I find that the number of non-Mahomedan voters is 67,000 in Sind and the number of Mahomedan voters is 59,000. May I know if the franchise is the same in both the constituencies or is there any difference in the franchise?

Chairman: It is the same.

121. Dr. Suhrawardy: You have stated in your Memorandum that in every province where the Muslims are in a minority you want one-third representation, and where they are in a majority you want representation according to the population. Do I understand you to mean that in cases where the numerical strength of the Mussalmans does not entitle them to one-third representation you want that, on account of their political and historical importance, they should be given one-third representation in order to make them an effective minority, whereas in cases where they are in a majority, for example as in Bengal and the Punjab, you will be quite content if they get their share of representation on the basis of population?—Yes.

122. You know that under the existing arrangements the Mussalmans are nowhere in a position to tyrannise over other communities because they are in a minority in almost every province, and in Bengal and in the Punjab they are in a bare majority. Is that correct?—Yes, it is absolutely correct.

123. But in the event of the separation of Sind and the introduction of Reforms in the North-West Frontier Province, the Mussalmans may be in a majority in these two provinces and the non-Muslims may be less than one-third of the population. In that case are you prepared to concede to the non-Muslim population the same privileges and the same representation which you are now asking?—I have no objection to that.

124. Chairman: You would be prepared to see the minority given one-third representation?—Yes.

125. Sardar Mujumdar: Have the Sind Mahomedan Association written and published a book or pamphlet with reference to the book published by Professor Chablani?—There are pamphlets written by many individuals.

126. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: Can you give an instance where in joint electorates undesirable candidates have come in in spite of the union of the Muslims?—There are certain instances. For instance, there is the Thar and Parkar district school board, where there is the joint electorate and the reservation of seats for the minorities. The Mussalmans have got a narrow majority in that school board. Out of nine seats on the board four are occupied by the Hindus and five by the Muslims. What happened was that the Hindus put up two undesirable candidates among the Muslims, one was a private servant of a bania and the other was his cultivator. They both were returned, as all Hindu voters combined to vote for them. Thus Hindus got majority by indirect means. So the Hindus will always have their way. Similarly I remember there were questions in the Bombay Council regarding the Ahmedabad school board. A capable Muslim, an M.A., was thrown out, and in his place an ordinary man who was not even a matriculate was taken up, because Hindus had the majority of voters.

127. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: You mean that all communities should get adequate share in the services?—Yes. I said I was opposed to Indianisation unless all communities get their proper share.

128. So far as efficiency is concerned, is it not the opinion at least here in the Province of Sind that since recruitment from England stopped, particularly in departments like Irrigation, efficiency has already suffered?—Efficiency has, of course, already suffered because of the cry for Indianisation, and the best people cannot be recruited.

129. May I understand that all the members of the deputation that are present here to represent the Sind Mahomedan Association are individually against universal suffrage?—Yes, we want that extended to males only.

130. Some people attribute that the present friction between different communities is due to separate electorates?—I certainly disagree with that view, because I may point out that separate electorates were first granted to the Mussalman community under the Minto-Morley Reforms, and subsequently they were given representation on a larger scale by the present Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. There were no frictions between the two communities until lately in 1924. It was only after 1924, when a general movement of Shuddhi and Sangathan was started by Hindu leaders like Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and others, that these things about communal frictions cropped up. But before that, even though there were separate electorates, there was no friction. I may also point out that at the time of the Lucknow Pact the Hindus never objected to separate electorates.

Mr. Abdur Rahman (witness): My own opinion is that the peace between the two communities is considerably attributed to separate electorates.

Chairman: That is a matter on which either of the two views may be held. I follow your view.

Mr. Abdur Rahman: We must take into consideration the circumstances immediately before it and subsequent to it. I am particularly speaking of Sind.

131. What is the dividing line? When did the change take place?—(Mr. Abdur Rahman): For instance, before the introduction of communal representation with separate electorates. Take, for example, voter "A." He could vote for "B," a Hindu, and "C," a Mahomedan. The result was that the Hindus had it all in their own way on account of their influence. But after that the Hindus ceased to create any influence on the Muslim community.

132. I see the force of that. I appreciate your point. Your point, as I understand, is that if you have a separate electorate, say in the municipality, there is no occasion for the members of one community to concern themselves in the election carried on by the other community. I follow that. But there, after all, communal tension does not arise merely on election basis?—Probably so.

133. There is something to be said both ways. We have to remember that. We are all trying to do quite fairly by both sides. I think it is quite reasonable on the one hand to say that if the communities vote separately in connection with the election there is less likely to be conflict between the communities. But there is also the other question, of course, that if you have a system of separate electorates there is a tendency among candidates to appeal for support on the ground that they are the embodiment of the communal view, and consequently to increase in the long run the intensity of feeling between one community and another. I will not say which way it will go, but I think myself that we must recognise the reason on both sides. Do not you think that is perhaps correct?—(Mir Ayub Khan): You are putting, sir, one apprehension which is present in the minds of many. But I would like to say this, that looking after the interests of one community should not be misunderstood and that that term should not be applied to tension between the two. I think one should always be strong and able enough, in spite of the conditions that exist now, to look after the legitimate protection of one's own interest.

Chairman: That is a very important way of putting it.

134. Dr. Ambedkar: Your Memorandum says that there should be adult suffrage. But your Association is divided on that issue?—(Mr. Khuhro): Yes.

135. How can there be a majority?—It was put in a public meeting and was carried by a majority.

136. Was it a very narrow majority?—I think it was not a big majority.

137. With reference to the answer which you gave that purdah is one of the hindrances in the way of granting adult suffrage, is it not a fact that in the village the women do not observe purdah?—No.

138. So you confine yourself to the city?—Even there some may not observe purdah.

139. So far as purdah is concerned, it is not observed in villages?—The Mussalman women generally observe purdah, but the very poor class may not observe it. Even then they will strongly object to go out of their village to distant places for the purpose of recording their vote and things of that kind.

140. Khan Sahib Abdul Latif: You said, Mr. Khuhro, that in the case of reservation of seats the Mahomedans would be sure of election, but do you consider that proper Mussalman candidates would be returned?—Certainly not. Proper candidates will not be returned.

Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally (witness): May I add a few words? In a matter of this kind, where seats are reserved, the result will be that people will put up their own candidates favouring their particular views. For instance, the Mussalmans who favour the Khilafat view will put up candidates who are in support of that view, and the opposite community will naturally put forward such candidates as are in favour of the Congress view or the Khilafat view. The result will be that the bulk of the Mahomedans who do not favour either the Congress or the Khilafat view will go unrepresented.

141. Do you think that Land Revenue should be reserved or transferred?—(Mr. Khuhro): I think it should be transferred.

142. Rao Sahib Patil: You say that if the Mahomedans are given joint electorates with reserved seats, desirable persons will not be returned. What do you mean by "desirable persons"?—As it has been repeatedly said, the other communities will put up candidates who will not truly represent the Mussalman interests in the Legislatures, and those candidates are bound to succeed when there are non-Mahomedan voters in a majority.

143. But the same number of Mahomedans should be returned?—Only Mahomedans in name will be returned. I said that Mussalmans who are not the true representatives of the Mussalmans and who will be merely dummies will be returned.

Mir Ayub Khan (witness): If the voting be entirely in the hands of Mahomedans they will return a Mahomedan who will be holding their own views. But if the election be in the hands of a mixed electorate, they might put up a man representing their our view, but who at the same time does not represent truly the Mahomedan view. Although the number of candidates returned will be the same, they will not be truly representing the Mohamedan interests.

144. Chairman: Let me see if I have understood you clearly. If I may say so, the point is a very familiar one and we have spent much time on it. It has been said on behalf of very many Mahomedans that in the case of joint electorates with reservation of seats, although the number of Mahomedan members of the Council will be the same, the view of those Mahomedan members and their quality might be different?—Yes. That will be a Hindu view, in fact.

145. I think the argument put is this. It is said that as long as the Mahomedans choose their representatives by themselves, they can make sure that the man selected is a satisfactory Mahomedan representative, whereas, on the other hand, if you have joint electorates with reservation of seats, although it would still be possible to return the same number of Mahomedan members, the individuals, owing to the Hindu influence upon them, would not necessarily be satisfactory to the Mahomedans?—Yes, exactly.

146. Rao Sahib Patil: Supposing you have communal representation. Do not you think that the Hindus will also exercise the same influence so as to return undesirable candidates?—(Mir Ayub Kahn): The Hindus are already so advanced, and they are too clever to commit that mistake, in which there is not much chance of success as well.

147. If you have separate representation, do not you think that those persons who exercised their influence in the case of joint electorates will use that very influence even in case you have separate electorates?—In the case of whom?

148. In the case of Mussalmans?—They have no votes.

149. I will make my arguments clear. Suppose you have joint electorates with reserved seats and some non-Mussalmans there will be who will use their influence so as to return an undesirable person, and suppose you have got communal representation, will not the non-Mussalmans use the very same influence with the Mussalman voters so as to return undesirable candidates?—No. He will not be able to succeed, as he would in joint elections, owing to his own voters (Hindus) as well.

150. Why not?—When the electorate is entirely in our hands we have to vote for our own candidate. Otherwise they have at their back the voters whom they could influence. Here we have our own votes.

151. May I understand that what you mean to say is that Mussalmans holding particular views are persons who may safely be called desirable, while persons who hold different views are undesirable?—Different views from the majority of the Mahomedans.

152. What is the view of the majority of the Muslims so far as national aspirations are concerned?—National aspirations in what respect?

153. The progress of the country?—We want the country to progress. The Mahomedans should have adequate representation, not only from a political point of view but also in services, and we want what I may put in a nutshell, Dominion Status under British rule. But with adequate safeguards for minorities.

154. Do you not think that so far as Karachi city is concerned, the Hindus, although they have got more voters in the city have got only one seat, while the Mussalmans have got two seats with a smaller number of voting strength?—In Karachi city the Mussalmans have got one seat.

155. I am talking of the urban constituency so far as Karachi city goes. Of course, Karachi includes Karachi district also?—Karachi district has two seats and Karachi city has one.

156. Rao Sahib Patil: On what basis do you think should representation be founded? Is it according to voting strength or according to population?—Population should ordinarily be the criterion.

157. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: You said that representation should be on population basis. Would you like that other improvements should also be taken into consideration?—I understood the question to be whether the seats should be according to voting strength or according to population, to which I replied that it should be according to population.

158. Supposing adult suffrage is not ordinarily granted, would you like to lower the franchise or do you think that it should be maintained as at present?—Let it be lowered; I have no objection.

159. How far should it be lowered?—I cannot make any definite proposal at this stage.

160. In both rural and urban areas?—No, only in rural; in urban it is already lowered.

161. Chairman: Gentlemen, I have tried to assemble a certain number of questions which bear on the separation of Sind, and on behalf of the Conference as a whole I will try to put two or three questions to these gentlemen. The first question that I wish to ask is this: Have you yourself considered in any detail the financial side of this proposal?—The figures that are supplied to us by Government from time to time are, I have reason to believe, not quite reliable.

162. The figures which Government have from time to time supplied you have considered, but you do not feel satisfied that those figures are reliable?—I will give reasons for them. In 1916-17 the Sind Conference appointed a committee—that was mainly a Hindu Conference which appointed a committee—to investigate into this question and that committee obtained figures from Government. The figure that they got from Government as income from Sind for that year was Rs. 2,60,00,000, but the figure that was supplied in 1924, in reply to a question in the Bombay Council, shows that the income of Sind in 1921-22 and 1922-23 was about Rs. 2,10,00,000, whereas in 1926-27 they show the income to be only Rs. 1,80,00,000. I cannot understand how income has decreased.

163. I do not think we can possibly go into these figures which you produce for the first time; there is no mention about this in your Memorandum.—We have collected some figures later.

164. We cannot go into these detailed figures now. Would you like to prepare and submit to the Conference a memorandum that contains these figures?—Yes.

165. I think, gentlemen, we shall be obliged. It will be a very great waste of time for 23 of us to listen to these figures which we had not had the opportunity of studying before.—I was telling you, sir, that the income of Sind in 1922-23 was about Rs. 2,10,00,000, then again it goes down to Rs. 1,80,000 in 1926-27. I cannot see how could that be so! I would illustrate another argument of the inaccuracy of these figures supplied from time to time. But about two months ago the Secretary in the Finance Department of the Government of Bombay replied to one of my colleague's query that there is a deficit of Rs. 50,00,000 so far as Sind was concerned. But now, I am informed, he says the deficit will be about Rs. 1,00,00,000, and presumably he expressed that before this Commission.

166. I should be very grateful and so would my colleagues, I am sure, if your Association will prepare a supplementary memorandum. May I ask this: When you quote these different statements, will you give complete references? When you refer, for instance, to a letter written by Government to one of your colleagues, either set out the letter or give the extract in inverted commas so that we may see what it is.—(Mr. Khuhro): Our request is that there should be an expert independent committee to investigate this question of finance.

167. Chairman: I can assure you that we will examine this question thoroughly. As you all know, we have already secured the services of a financial expert to advise us on financial questions. But let us begin by getting the material.

Mr. Khuhro: I can send a supplementary memorandum on this point.

168. Chairman: If your supplementary memorandum contains the figures which you were referring to, we shall be able to study them before we deal finally with this question.

The next question refers to debt. Have you or your Association gone in detail into this question of how you would deal with the capital debt which may perhaps, if there was separation, have to be borne by Sind?—From the accounts kept by the Bombay Government, it will be seen that capital accounts are kept separately, such as, 41 Irrigation or 60 Civil Works. Only a sinking fund is provided to meet the interest, and this fund runs over the loan period. The amount is borrowed from the Government of India by all provinces. A similar arrangement might be resorted to in the case of Sind.

169. Chairman: If you wish you can suggest in your memorandum how you think any principal loan should be dealt with, as, for example, there has been a very large capital outlay, partly secured by loan, in connection with the Sukkur barrage; and you may be able to indicate how you would suggest that this should be dealt with.

Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally (witness): May I just add a word, sir? So far as this financial bogey is concerned, I may remark that we are fighting against odds so far as the question of separation is concerned. The Bombay Government is against us, the European Association is against us. The Chamber of Commerce, Karachi, years ago was in favour of separation. They even, if I recollect rightly, supported that Sind should be joined to the Punjab, but now they are against the proposal of separation of Sind. Therefore, unless we are supported by any other source, it is very difficult for the Association to obtain reliable figures.

170. Chairman: Whatever figures you are able to obtain you can supply them. If they are examined with prudence and judgment by fair-minded men they may help to ascertain the truth. You may be quite certain that we shall be fair-minded. It does not matter in the least bit to the Statutory Commission that there are various bodies of opinion which are opposed to your proposal. You may be quite certain, as far as we are concerned, that we will examine it without any reference to the different bodies of opinion.

Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally (witness): So far as the separation of provinces on linguistic basis is concerned, it has been acceded to and admitted by even the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and Hindus themselves until a few years ago were in favour of separation of Sind.

171. Chairman: If you will allow me to say so, we are merely using phrases. There is nothing easier in this world than to announce in general terms that you are in favour of linguistic provinces or this or that, but if people are really and truly trying to consider constitutional rearrangements they have to get below these phrases and see how things are and how they can be worked out.

Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally (witness): I might say, sir, that we are at a considerable disadvantage to arrive at accurate figures so far as the financial position is concerned, however much we may try our best to submit a correct memorandum upon that point, because the Finance Department will not help us. I think the Commission will be in a better position to obtain correct information.

172. Chairman: I am not saying that you have got to prove anything to me. I am merely making a most reasonable request that the figures which the spokesman of the deputation has quoted should be put on paper, so that we can study them when we examine this question finally.

The next question refers to the point which the Khan Bahadur has just mentioned. He said that the possibility of Sind being joined to the Punjab was discussed some years ago. I should like to know whether you can answer this question as far as your deputation is concerned. If it were a question of choosing between going to Bombay or joining to the Punjab which would be the choice?—(Mr. Khuhro): The question of Sind being joined to the Punjab was raised many years ago, and at that time the majority of Sindhis supported it for the reason that irrigation facilities, land revenue and other things resembled more those of the Punjab than those of Bombay, and that the River Indus, which supplies water to the whole of Sind, is coming from the Punjab. But the unfortunate position is that question was deferred then, and now it is too late to think of it.

173. Chairman: Let me summarise your view. Supposing we were dealing with this matter years ago before the five rivers of the Punjab which flow into the Indus had not been so largely depleted by the Punjab irrigation works, the view might have been favourably received, but in the present circumstances those for whom you speak would not view with favour union with the Punjab.—It is too late to consider; I think we can stand on our own legs now.

174. Are you prepared as a province, if you stand on your own legs, to see any reduction in the scale of expenditure in this province on nation-building departments?—The nation-building departments, on the contrary, are starved very much in this province, and that is our chief complaint.

175. Let us consider the question as practical men. You wish that more money should be spent on education in Sind, especially Mahomedan education?—Yes.

176. I suppose you will agree that if Sind is a separate province it must raise its own money for education?—Yes.

177. How do you think you would be able to pay taxes for education if Sind is separated?—The first thing will be to adjust the Budget—whether the expenditure incurred at present is proper or it is extravagant, whether it can be retrenched and so on. Then the question will be in what way the expenditure on nation-building departments could be met and in what manner taxes should be raised.

178. You recognise that if more money is going to be spent more money will have to be raised?—Yes.

Chairman: I have mentioned these points merely that you and your deputation may appreciate some of the material questions to be considered. You will not, if I may say so, be dealing at all sufficiently with it if you merely say that you are in favour of separation or you believe in linguistic provinces, because the difficulties as well as the advantages have to be studied. But I quite agree, if I may say so, with the Khan Bahadur that it would not be fair to put on your Association the business of proving the case. It will be for the whole Conference to consider it with the help of the material which we have been able to collect. Do not think that anybody is opposed to your view, but we must consider it, you see, like statesmen.

179. Lord Burnham: Granting that you are in favour of separation of Sind from Bombay and being constituted as an autonomous province, do you not think it possible, especially having regard to the financial conditions even as you see them, apart from the figures we have here, that separation might be postponed to a certain number of years, the number of years to be fixed either by anticipation now or later on by some other process?—The Association think that the time has come when Sind should be separated.

180. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: What are the main grounds that you urge in favour of separation?—There is nothing common between Sind and the Bombay Presidency. Geographically it is quite distinct from Bombay. Our language is quite separate and also our habits and customs. Sind is very far away from the capital of the Bombay Presidency. It has been even admitted by the Government of Bombay that they cannot have rigid and proper control over the Sind administration from that distance. The result was that as long ago as 1868 the Commissioner in Sind was invested with extra powers according to the Delegation Act, and he exercises at present the powers of a local government without being responsible to any Legislature. Even otherwise it is apparent that more or less the Government is treating Sind as a separate province. In all other departments, for instance, Excise, Forests, the Commissioner has got extraordinary powers, and even in the judicial branch the Judicial Commissioner's Court is not subordinate to the High Court. So from all points of view, even at present Sind is administered differently and the Commissioner has got extraordinary powers. When the Montford Reforms were being discussed there was agitation on this point. There are numerous considerations why Sind deserves to be separated from Bombay. With regard to the nation-building departments, we feel that Sind does not get its proper share in the matter of improvement of these departments. For instance, roads and communications are in a rotten condition here, and we are very much behind in these matters. Thus Sind does need special attention from many points of view. There has been agitation on this point from the European Association, from the Chamber of Commerce, from the Parsee community, from the Hindu community, and other bodies. There have been addresses on the subject to His Excellency the Governor and His Excellency the Viceroy.

181. Chairman: I think myself that Sind undoubtedly is entitled to say that in actual practice for many purposes it is treated not in the fullest sense as a part of the Bombay Presidency but rather as a special part. It is true, indeed, as I dare say you know, that if you go through Bombay Presidency they sometimes talk of the Presidency proper, by which they mean to exclude Sind?—Yes, in Bombay when they talk of the Presidency they will never mean Sind. The thing is that it is more or less one man's rule. As a matter of fact, most of the things are dealt with by the Commissioner himself. They do not even go to the Government of Bombay. We have been protesting against it and nothing has been done so far.

182. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: You have the Act of 1868. If there is delay in the separation of Sind, would you have that Act repealed immediately?

—The Act puts us in a very great disadvantage, and we are in no way in favour of that.

183. Do you know that the loan for the Sukkur Barrage has been raised by the Government of Bombay, and the whole Presidency is responsible if it becomes a failure?—It was definitely stated when the scheme was prepared that most of the loan would be met out of the sale of land and the extra assessment that would be realised when more water is available. Therefore I do not think that any burden falls ultimately on Bombay, though the security at present is on the whole of the Presidency.

184. The question is if the whole of the Bombay Presidency will be responsible if this scheme proves a failure?—If there is gain, it will be gain for the whole Presidency, and if there is loss it will be loss for the whole Presidency.

185. Chairman: I think the actual position about the loan for the Sukkur Barrage is this. It was the Government of India that borrowed the money on the securities of the Government of India, and they lent the money to the Bombay Government. Is that correct?—Yes.

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: I made it quite clear that if this scheme proves a failure, then the responsibility is on the whole of Bombay Presidency.

186. You said that some time back the majority of the people of Sind were for its amalgamation with the Punjab. Was it a suggestion by some people or was it by a majority?—I was talking of a thing that occurred 25 years ago. (Mr. Abdur Rahman): I may say that that view was not shared by the masses of the Mahomedans.

187. Subsequently that proposal was rejected?—(Mr. Khuhro): Yes.

AFTERNOON.

1. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: Are you prepared to tax yourselves for the nation-building departments?—Yes, if Sind is separated.

2. Is that the view of the Muslim community only, or did the Hindus also join with you?—In support of separation, yes, this view is not only the view of Muslims, but of the All-India Congress Committee and the two Mussalman Leagues.

3. Chairman: I do not think that is the question; the question is with regard to other bodies inside Sind.—In Sind all the Mussalmans are united in the first place, and there are people from the Hindu community and the Parsi community also in favour of it. That means that Hindus are not all united to oppose this.

4. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: But some Hindus are opposed to it?—Men of liberal mind are in favour of it. Some have been actually writing for separation, men like Swami Govindanand and Jethmal Pursram, who are definitely in favour of separation, and Mr. Jamshed Mehta and others in Parsi community.

5. Have you any proof of that with you?—Yes, I have pamphlets here.

(Pamphlets by Haji Abdul Haroon, Mr. Jamshed Mehta and Swami Govindanand handed in.)

6. You say you wish that the Commissioner should have his special powers abrogated, because the rules operate almost autocratically?—Yes, something must be done, because otherwise we are quite differently administered from the rest of the Presidency.

7. So that the Commissioner should be brought to the level of other commissioners of the Presidency?—Yes.

8. In order to make him more amenable to the Legislature?—Yes.

9. Has this autocratic rule affected the attitude of the subordinates in Sind?—Of course, in the matter of services I may say that during the last two years out of ten appointments of deputy collectors, nine went to non-Muslims and only one to Muslims, in spite of the predominance of Muslim population, and recently there has been a similar instance in the recruitment now being made for sub-inspectors of police. Though Mussalmans are admittedly fitted for the police service, out of fifteen appointments only four or five have been given to Mussalmans.

10. Do you attribute that to the independence of the Commissioner?—It is the general attitude of the Sind administration towards us. That may be one of the causes.

11. Have you considered the question of the amalgamation of Sind with Baluchistan, and making it a separate autonomous province?—That also is an old question, and personally I have no objection to it; but the thing is that Baluchistan itself is not self-supporting, and the Government of India gives a subsidy. If the Government of India continues giving that support, there should be no objection; otherwise it will be a burden on Sind for some time at least. (Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): With regard to joining with Baluchistan, I differ from that view. That is a Hindu view.

12. Rao Saheb Patil: You have just told us that most of the Hindus are opposed to the separation of Sind?—(Mr. Khuhro): Yes.

13. Can you tell me why they say so?—The main reason will be that the Mohamedans will be in a majority, and it is the communal feeling.

14. What will be the result according to them?—That is their dominant feeling. God knows what they think, but that is all I can attribute it to—because they think that the Mussalmans will be in a majority.

15. Therefore they would be in a position to hurt them?—I do not know that they can harass them.

16. But what is the fear in the minds of the Hindus if Sind is separated from the Bombay Presidency?—I do not know that. I only think that they are opposed to it simply on this ground, that in Sind the Mussalmans are in a majority, whereas in the Bombay Presidency they are in a minority, hence the Hindu majority in Presidency will be converted into a minority in Sind.

17. You have been a member of the Legislative Council for the last five years?—Yes.

18. Even before the Reforms Sind has been a deficit province?—No.

19. It is not a fact?—No.

20. Do you know that ever since the introduction of the Reforms Sind has been unable to pay its way and that there is a deficiency of some 25 lakhs?—I dispute the figure. I do not accept that to be true.

21. Am I right when I say that the chief sources of the income of Sind are land revenue, stamps and excise?—Yes, they are, in all the provinces.

22. I am asking this question so far as Sind is concerned?—Yes, it is the same in all provinces.

23. Do you think you have the least chance of expanding your income in respect of these three subjects?—There is nothing exceptional in that. The resources are exactly the same as all other provinces.

24. But what I want to ask you is this. Supposing you take the state of land revenue, stamps and excise, do you think you have immediate prospects of an expansion so far as an increase of these three sources are concerned?—I think there would be many ways of improving the finances of the province.

25. Will you kindly answer my question? Tell me the resources which will help you?—Any extra taxation could be imposed for the improvement of the nation-building departments, as I have said. At random I cannot make any suggestion of new taxation.

26. Will you kindly tell me what would be the advantages Mussalmans will enjoy if Sind is made a separate Province?—I think all communities will equally share in those advantages.

27. You think that the interests of the minority will be quite safe in the hands of the majority?—Of course they will be safe, when there will be safeguards. We have recommended safeguards for the minorities. They will certainly be as safe as those of Muslim minority and other minorities in all other Provinces.

28. What do you suggest in the case of the new Province?—The same conditions will apply as in other Provinces.

29. Will you give me some idea of the safeguards, in case Sind is made a separate Province?—For instance, increased representation, we suggested one-third.

30. Anything else?—Separate electorates? (Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): And what other safeguards are needed if they get a sufficient voice in the new council to be established in Sind? I think that is all they want, and to that we have no objection.

31. Have you read this pamphlet, "Sind as a Separate Province," by M. Jairamdas Doulatram, with a Foreword by Dr. D. G. T. Hingorami?—I have not seen it.

32. It is stated on page 4 that "the deputation, consisting of Hindus and Muslims, which waited upon the Secretary of State and the Viceroy ——" ?—In what year?

33. I will read this to you——.—I am asking in what year this deputation waited upon His Excellency the Viceroy. I have in my possession a Report of the Committee of Hindu Gentlemen appointed by the Central Conference. Mr. Jairamdas was a member, and they made out a very strong case for the separation of Sind. This was in 1916-17, the very time to which you are referring, and, therefore, I do not think it can be correct.

34. Chairman: There is a document by Mr. Jairamdas Doulatram annexed to the Memorandum submitted by the All-Sind Hindu Association, so we shall hear about it to-morrow perhaps. If it is right, it says that in November, 1917, there was a special Provincial Conference to consider the position of Sind in the coming scheme of Reforms. It says that this special Conference passed a resolution, and that the resolution was moved and supported by Hindu and Muslim speakers, and that they did not ask for the separation of Sind, but were for making it a more integral part of Bombay. Then it says that there was a deputation consisting of Hindus and Muslims which waited upon Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford, and they put the question to that deputation whether the Sindhis wanted to be a separate Province, and the reply was a definite "No." Now, it does not in the least affect the view which people may hold now; but can you tell me whether that account, so far as it goes, is right?—No, I can say it is not so. The proceedings of that Committee are in my possession, to which you can refer, and I will read to you two or three lines from that which will convince you what view Hindus held at that time. They say: "The Committee is of opinion that the cause of the backwardness of Sind is the neglect of Sind by the Bombay Government, and the one-man rule that prevails here at present ——." Now, this is most clear and emphatic on that point, and I can produce this. (Document handed in.)

35. Rao Saheb Patil: It is stated in the Memorandum presented by the Association that the Indian National Congress has also recommended the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency, but it is also stated by the Congress that we should accept the solution of joint electorates with reserved seats for Muslims?—That is a separate recommendation.

36. Then am I to understand that you want to accept what is convenient to you and reject what is unpalatable to you?—No, only I wanted to bring out one point, that the All-India Congress also recognised the fact that there is sufficient force in the demand for the separation of Sind. I did not want to go into the other question, because it has no bearing on this and is quite a separate issue.

37. Sardar Mujumdar: Would you like to have educational qualifications for a candidate in the local and central legislatures?—I do not think it is necessary.

38. Chairman: Has this something to do with the special question of the separation of Sind?

Sardar Mujumdar: Yes, if Sind is separate.—I do not think we should put special conditions for the separation of Sind like that. (Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): That point is rather debatable, and I for one, and I believe my friend Mr. Rahman also, do not agree with the view expressed by my friend, Mr. Khuhro. We two do say that some education qualification is necessary, and I personally should go further and say some English knowledge is necessary for the members to understand the debates. (Mr. Khuhro): That is a matter of personal opinion, of course. I am not in favour of it.

39. Sir Arthur Froom: With regard to this question of the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency, has due consideration been given to what would be the position of the Mahomedans in Bombay proper (as we may call it) should Sind be taken away?—Yes. They would be in a minority; their proportion would be nine or 10 per cent.

40. May I put some figures to you. The total population of Mahomedans in Bombay Presidency is, I believe, somewhere about 3¾ millions. The total population of Mahomedans in Sind is somewhere about 2¾ millions?—About 24 lakhs, yes.

41. So that would reduce the number of Mahomedans in Bombay Presidency (and their influence on general affairs in the Presidency) from 3¾ millions to 1 million?—But there are still fewer Mahomedans in Madras and the Central Provinces.

42. I am talking about Bombay. You agree that would be the position?—Yes, that will be the position.

43. Let us look at the position in another way. The total population of Sind is about 3¼ millions?—Yes.

44. Of which the Mahomedans form about 2¾ millions and the Hindus about half a million. If, therefore, you were to separate Sind from the Bombay Presidency proper, it would be of advantage to the Hindu population of Bombay Presidency to the tune of about 2¼ millions of population. I just want to put the figures before you. That is so?—Yes.

45. I have one final question relating to these figures I have put before you. How do the Mahomedans in what is frequently described, as our Chairman put it, as the "Presidency proper" (i.e., excluding Sind) view the suggestion for the separation of Sind, which takes away something like 2¾ millions of their supporters?—The Mahomedans are very glad. At least all the Mahomedan members of the Legislative Council signed a manifesto in that sense, in reply to the Nehru Report, to the effect that they objected to the Nehru Report because the separation of Sind has been shelved in that Report. The Bombay Mahomedans are in favour of the view that Sind should be separated. Mr. Jinnah is also in favour of it, and most of the Mahomedan members of the Bombay Council have expressed themselves in favour of it. The Bombay Mahomedans have publicly expressed their view.

46. The Bombay Mahomedans in the Presidency proper are in favour of the separation of Sind?—Yes, they are in favour of the separation of Sind; I know it definitely. (Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): Even if they do not want Sind to be separated, are we to suffer on that account?

47. I was only trying to take the larger view of the situation?—(Mr. Khuhro): My definite information is that they are in favour of it.

48. In other words, the Mahomedan community in Bombay is already in an inferior position as regards numbers, and you do not object to their being placed in a still more inferior position as regards numbers to the tune of 2¾ millions?—It is to the advantage of the Province of Sind as a whole, and we look at it from that point of view.

49. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: If the separation of Sind is objected to on the ground of financial difficulty, will the great majority of the people of Sind be prepared to shoulder the extra cost of running it as a separate province?—Certainly, yes.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

52. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You say because you are a backward community and want more education, further advance, and the development of Sind, therefore you want separation, but have you considered other means of achieving that end without separation?—We do not see any hope of it without separation.

53. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: In reply to a question by Raja Nawab Ali Khan, you said the people of Sind would be prepared to bear the cost of a reformed government. May I know whether you mean those who favour separation, or the whole population, including those who do not favour this?

Raja Nawab Ali Khan: I said the great majority?—The question was whether the majority of the people are in favour of the separation of Sind and would be prepared to bear the burden, and I said yes.

54. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: Do you suggest that a certain community should be taxed, while the other community should not be taxed?—I did not mean that also. But, however, that is a matter of detail.

55. I want to be clear on this. In the Memorandum submitted by the All-Sind Hindu Association, on page 233 it is stated that in 1918 the Sind Mahomedan Association submitted a memorial to Baron Chelmsford and the Right Honourable Edwin Montagu. Do you know anything of that Memorandum which was submitted in 1918?—Regarding?

56. Regarding the Reforms which were then under contemplation?—(Khan Bahadur Wali Muhammad Hussanally): That is a long time ago. We have no information about it. Even supposing that was done, it was a long time ago, and things have changed since then.

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: To refresh your memory, I may read one or two sentences from it.

Chairman: What is the year of it?

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: 1918.

Chairman: Then it is before the Montford scheme had come into effect?

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: Certainly, when the inquiry was being made about the future constitution.

Chairman: I think there is force in what the Khan Bahadur said, that the views people might be disposed to express in Sind in 1918, when they had not their present experience, ought not to be treated as governing their view now. That seems fair, does it not? Subject to the observation that it was some time ago, and was before actual experience of the working of the Reforms was available, there is no objection to the Sardar Sahib reading the sentence if he wishes.

57. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: It is stated in that memorial: "Your memorialists do not wish to refer to other parts of India, but will confine their observations to Sind. This Province is not yet ripe or ready for democratic Government. Its history, tradition, the heredity and disposition of its peoples, its want of homogeneity or community of interests, social, religious, or any other kind, all point to the other way. Less than a century ago, it was from time immemorial under the rule of a monarchical government. The short time that has since elapsed is not sufficient even under the beneficent influence of the benign British Government and the blessings of Western education to evolve the spirit, sentiment and disposition essential to the success of democratic institutions."

Chairman: What I want to ask is whether, during the last ten years, such extraordinary progress has been made in the educational and social position of the population that they have come forward with a demand for a reformed government for Sind?—(Mr. Abdur Rahman): Yes, very considerable progress has been made in education, in political views and so on.

58. And still the percentage of educated people is about 3 per cent.?—No. We should compare the position ten years ago with the position to-day. That is the point.

Chairman: The duty of the Conference is not only to hear what are the wishes of the different sections of the community here, but also to assemble the practical considerations which must, of course, be given due weight—financial considerations, administrative considerations, and so forth. We shall, therefore, be very glad if you are able to supplement what you have said to us to-day and what you have said in your Memorandum by any further memoranda you may wish to put in, and which you may be quite sure we shall study carefully. The question is a difficult one, admittedly, when you come to what we may call practical politics, and, as practical men, we all of us have to look at the thing, not only from the abstract and sentimental point of view, but also from the point of view of practical politics. On the other hand, I should like to assure you we shall consider the matter most carefully, and we shall not in any way be prevented from considering it favourably because, as you have pointed out, there are bodies of opinion opposed to it. We shall consider it as well as ever we can upon its merits, and for that purpose we shall be very glad of your additional material. Thank you very much.

Memorandum submitted by the Karachi Chamber of Commerce.

We, the Chairman and members of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce, have the honour to address you with regard to the Reforms in India generally and in the Presidency of Bombay particularly. In doing so we desire to express our sincere regret that we are late in the submission of our evidence, which is due to unavoidable circumstances.

The Karachi Chamber of Commerce is the premier Chamber in Karachi and its members, numbering eighty-two, include all the most important European mercantile, industrial, shipping, banking and financial firms in Karachi and a number of prominent Indian firms in addition.

We are in general agreement with the Memorandum submitted by the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon, to which we subscribe. To this Memorandum, however, we desire to add our views on the importance which we attach to the question of the method of introducing the gradual development of self-governing institutions in India, which is not alluded to in the above mentioned Memorandum.

The Method of Introducing the Gradual Development of Self-Governing Institutions in India.

We realise in the Government of India Act, 1919, the preamble envisaged that the time and manner of each advance can only be determined by Parliament. We have, however, been impressed by successive events since the introduction of the Reforms and somewhat concerned by the attitude adopted towards the Royal Statutory Commission, and inferentially towards the Secretary of State for India and the Imperial Parliament by a large and influential body of politically minded Indians. These foregoing circumstances, the views we take of future political developments in British India, and the acknowledged intention of the Imperial Parliament to develop self-governing institutions in this country have lead us to the general opinion that after a period of autonomous provincial government the future progress towards, or retrogression from, further autonomy both as to time and manner should be substantially left to the will of the people and not be determined only by the Imperial Parliament.

The Associated Chambers have recommended the grant to provinces up to full responsible autonomy under certain conditions. With this recommendation we are in full agreement. Such a proposal comprehends ordered and logical progress and is an endorsement of the pledge of the 20th August, 1917, to which we attach a sacred character. It is, however, fundamentally static in character, whereas we wish to make it a stage in a fluent constitution in which the future impelling influence will essentially be the Indian people themselves.

Holding these views we attach the greatest importance to the provincial autonomy stage being an educative period whereby the implications, the difficulties and dangers of democratic Government and Ministerial rule will be brought home directly to the mass of the people. The recommendations which we give expression to hereafter in regard to local provincial government and smaller self-governing units are substantially dictated to us by this consideration.

We do not feel disposed to lay down any definite period during which we would recommend that the static constitution should be operative, but we think from our experience of the present Reforms that a period of some seven years would affect a large measure of education. Further, we do not think that the terminating point of seven years would be so distant as to negative the recognition or depreciate the value of so liberal a doctrine amongst those Indians who have the welfare of the country at heart and aspire to a greater measure of internal political control.

We believe that the scheme we advocate will lead to the greater contentment of the Indian people and so to more satisfactory Government.

We also believe that it will lead amongst the greater mass of the Indian intelligentsia to a fuller appreciation of the efforts made by the British Parliament and the British administrators impartially to mete out justice, to foster the prosperity of India, to further the welfare of the masses and to alleviate distress.

Further, we believe that it will lead to Indian political questions being discussed, considered and decided on their intrinsic merits and not, as is so frequently the case to-day, on their purely extrinsic bearing to British Imperial policy.

Lastly, we believe that it will vitalise into activity a mass of intelligent conservative and moderate Indian opinion, which to-day depends upon the vicarious offices of the Imperial Parliament and is not prepared to be vocal for fear of criticism and obloquy from the extremist element. With the advent of this party into active politics and the spread of education consequent upon a period of genuine provincial autonomy we see no reason to anticipate extreme reactionary measures when the term of the static constitution is completed.

We are, however, not oblivious of the dangers created by the unfortunate communal tension which now exists and will we fear continue to exist, or of the possibility of certain irreconcilable and Bolshevistic politicians endeavouring to subvert common sense or remove the practical necessities in any constitution for the continuance of law and order, and the general welfare and economic progress of the people.

Certain fundamental and unchangeable provisions would, therefore, in our opinion, be necessary as much as in the static period of the constitution as in the dynamic and, inter alia, we append in brief outline the following:—

(1) That India shall remain part of the British Empire and accept the obligations and liabilities of any other self-governing dominion forming part of the British Empire and shall not exceed the prerogatives of such a dominion.

(2) (a) That the Army in India shall continue to be commanded by a Britisher and that those responsible for the superintendence, efficiency and control of the Army in India shall remain British.

(b) That a fixed percentage of British officers shall be retained in the Indian Army.

(c) That a fixed percentage of British troops to Indian troops be maintained in India at the cost of India.

(d) That the cost of the Army in India shall be the first charge on the Central revenues.

(e) That any modification of the foregoing shall rest solely with the Imperial Parliament, and that the above provisions shall be constant for a period of not less than 25 years.

(3) That no discriminatory or differential legislation or taxation shall be enacted against any person or body of persons living in or having business with India unless that person or body of persons be a national of a foreign country, colony, state or dominion who discriminated or differentiated unfavourably against Indians.

(4) That a Supreme Court, the officers of which shall be nominated by the King Emperor, shall be an integral and continuing feature in the Constitution both to interpret the constitution and to adjudicate on matters arising as between the Central Government and other local government and public bodies.

(5) That the service of internal and external loans remains the first charge on all the revenues of the issuing authority (ies), the Army alone taking precedence in the case of the Central revenues. That no loans issued prior to the time when the static constitutional period ends may be repudiated before or after that time.

(6) That there shall be free trade between the Provinces of British India.

(7) That the Governor-General or the respective Governors in their own Province shall be the authorities to proclaim Martial Law, either individually or collectively.

(8) That the Governor-General and the Governors retain their powers of veto.

(9) That Provincial Second Chambers shall be an integral feature of all democratic Provincial constitutions; that the Second Chamber shall have revising and overriding powers and shall be composed of men in responsible positions and preferably with material vested interests in the country.

(10) (a) That only British subjects shall be entitled to serve in the Indian administration and in the Army.

(b) That any officer displaced by reason of a change in policy shall be entitled to the proportionate pension he has earned and reasonable compensation.

(c) That the option of retirement on a proportionate pension shall be a continuing option for any British servant who joined the services prior to the termination of the static period of the constitution. We use the term British here to denote a servant of non-Asiatic domicile.

On such a technical subject as the amendment or revision of the constitution after the end of the static period we feel at some less to express any definite opinion. We can only recommend in general terms that it should be by agreement amongst the people concerned either directly and/or through the Legislatures.

We realise that in the consideration of the Indian constitutional question the Indian Princes and the Indian States are a no less interested party than the British Indian Provinces themselves.

Under a self-determinated form of constitution, we appreciate that the eventual or the progressive stages of the constitution might take a variety of forms. If the status quo were maintained or a retrogression to autocracy in the Central Government were made, the position of the Indian Princes and the Indian States would not be substantially altered, if at all. But in the more probable alternative of an advance to a Federal form of Dominion Government, the existing equilibrium as between the Indian States and British India would be thrown out of balance and require readjustment. To restore this equilibrium it would be only equitable to permit the Indian States to share in the Central Government in a proportionate relation to the British Indian Provinces. It would, we think, be necessary, therefore, to permit the Indian States to be represented in the Central Legislatures at any time after the end of the static period, if they chose to seek entry, but we think that only such Indian States should qualify for such admittance as themselves fulfilled certain constitutional criteria. Once an Indian State had sought and obtained entrance to the Federation which we have pre-supposed, that State should have a relatively equal voice to other units of the Federation in the formation of the constitution.

We think that any alterations or additions to the Provincial constitutions should be subject to the ratification of the respective Governor and the Governor-General, and similarly any alteration to the constitution affecting other than the Provinces or smaller units should be subject to the ratification of the Governor-General and the Imperial Parliament.

Provincial Government of Bombay and Smaller Governing Units in the Presidency of Bombay.

So far as the Provincial Government of Bombay and smaller self-governing units in the Presidency are concerned we beg to make the following recommendations. We should again like to emphasise the importance we attach to political education and the necessity for vitalising political consciousness and responsibility. For this reason we advocate adult suffrage for village Panchayats where their introduction is practical, and common electorates (non-communal) for district local boards and municipalities. Lastly, we favour the handing over of law and order by placing the police under Ministerial control. We realise the grave possibilities and dangers of this step and only favour it because we feel that real responsibility can thus alone be brought home in a direct and convincing fashion to the people.

We recommend:—

(1) That the village Panchayat system be developed in the Province where possible. Election to be by adult suffrage, with limited but definite powers of taxation for village requirements.

(2) That the franchise qualification be not lowered, that the electorate be a mixed one (non-communal) for the municipalities and district local boards of Sind.

(3) That full responsible autonomy be granted, including the Ministerial responsibility for law and order provided:—

(a) That the Governor-General in Council be given powers of intervention in the event of a breakdown or partial breakdown of Government in the Province and the Governor shall have similar powers in the case of lower units of Government.
(b) That a Provincial Second Chamber be set up.
(c) That adequate safeguards be provided for the protection of the police administration.
(d) That the Governor retains his constitutional prerogative of "veto."
(e) That the Meston Award be re-examined.
(f) That a Public Service Commission be appointed.
(g) That all bills passed by the provincial legislatures shall require the assent of the Governor-General in Council.
(h) That the recommendations of the Lee Commission as to the Services be adhered to.

In regard to the foregoing we desire to make the following observations:—

Our proposals in regard to the composition and electorate of the Second Chamber are very tentative and general. We are of opinion that quite a small Chamber is desirable, not exceeding some thirty-three members. We think that about two-thirds should be elected and one-third nominated by the Governor, that election should be by and from those whose names appear on the electoral rolls of the Council of State of the Bombay Presidency. We would, however, in the rules for the qualification of an elector, lower the income qualification for other than Hindu joint families from Rs. 30,000 to Rs. 20,000 and omit membership (non-official) of Indian legislatures as a qualifying factor. In the event of insufficient candidates for election we would recommend filling the vacancies by the nomination of the Governor. In principle we do not recommend the nomination of officials.

As regards the constituencies, we do not feel in a position to make any detailed recommendations, but generally we would favour the inclusion of the "commerce and industry" constituencies of the existing Bombay Provincial Council. In doing so we have in mind that these represent a rational, educated and highly interested element in the country, and we attach the greatest importance to the necessity of the Second Chamber being a reliable check on the lower House.

We feel that special protection should be accorded to the police, so that they should not be treated wrongfully or unfairly as the scapegoats for Ministerial ineptitudes.

Whilst favouring the retention of the Governor's "veto" we think that the power of "certification" should be abolished.

We recommend that the patronage of all superior posts should be the privilege of the Governor, whilst that of other posts should be vested in the Public Service Commission.

Turning now to the Provincial Council, we do not favour any lowering of the franchise qualification. We recommend direct election and that communal representation be retained. With due consideration to interests for which it would appear to be impossible to create constituencies, we would like to see nomination eliminated.

With regard to the composition of the Provincial Council, we are not in a position to make more than general remarks.

The present composition of the Bombay Legislative Council is as follows:—

Members of the Executive Council (ex-officio)	4
Elected members	86
Nominated by the Governor	24
	114

Of the twenty-four nominated members not more than sixteen may be officials and eight are nominated to represent interests as under:—

The Anglo-Indian community	1
The Indian Christian community ...	1
The labouring classes	3
The depressed classes	2
The cotton trade	1
	8

The nature of the constituencies represented by the eighty-six elected members is as follows:—

Urban constituencies	16
Rural	60
University	1
Commerce and industry	7
European constituencies	2
	86

As regards the twenty-eight nominated seats, including the four ex-officio seats of the members of the Executive Council, we should like to see the number of nominated seats reduced to seven to represent the following interests for which the creation of constituencies would appear to be difficult and would, it seems, therefore only obtain representation by means of nomination:—

The Anglo-Indian community	1
The Indian Christian community ...	1
The labouring classes	3

We omit the cotton trade as we are of opinion that a constituency could be formed to enable this interest to be represented by election.

The position would then be as follows:—

Elected members	86
Nominated by Governor	7
Cotton trade (by election or nomination)	1
	94

3rd October, 1928.

or a decrease of twenty members. We do not make any specific recommendation about filling these seats, but if thought desirable we would prefer that new constituencies be created and/or that additional seats be granted to existing constituencies.

We do not favour the nomination or election of officials. We desire to make the executive subordinate to the Legislatures so as to inculcate responsibility into the latter and thereby obtain the maximum educative effect possible during the static period of the constitution to which we have previously referred.

We think the Presidents of the Legislatures should be elected from amongst the members of the respective Houses.

We recommend Cabinet Government without joint responsibility. In principle we favour joint responsibility, but are doubtful if it could be worked at the present juncture. Further, we recommend that the Governor shall be head of the Cabinet that the Governor shall request the leader whose party he believes has the majority in the popular house to form a Cabinet. In the event of the leader's refusal or inability the Governor shall form a Cabinet as he thinks fit.

We recommend that all Bills, including money Bills, require the majority assent of each House before they are passed.

In the event of a disagreement between the two Houses we recommend that it be left to the discretion of the Governor (a) to dissolve the Lower House or both Houses or (b) to refer the question by a referendum to the electorate of the Second Chamber, or (c) to call a joint session of both Houses.

We think it advisable that the division between Central and Provincial subjects should be reconsidered to minimise future friction.

We are in favour of the gradual abolition of terminal taxes, as we consider they are an inequitable and undesirable form of taxation. We are of the opinion, however, that the abolition should be gradual, as any drastic action might lead to dislocation in municipal finances, which, in many cases, are largely dependent on this form of revenue.

General Recommendations.

We recommend that the Governor should be chosen as now, from prominent men in the United Kingdom, and, further, that his salary and emoluments should be a second charge on Provincial revenues.

In principle, we think it is most desirable that judicial and executive functions be separated. We are not able definitely to recommend this division, as we have no information as to the additional cost involved by the innovation.

We do not recommend the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency as the wealth of Sind is insufficient to bear the cost of a Provincial Government and the need for development is considerable, which can best be attained by combination with a major Province.

The Chamber, through its representatives, offers to give oral evidence in Karachi.

Deputation from the KARACHI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The deputation consisted of :—

J. R. N. Graham, V.C., of Grahams Trading Co., Ltd., Merchants and Shipping Agents (Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce).

C. S. Wentworth Stanley, of Forbes, Forbes, Campbell and Co., Ltd., Merchants and Shipping Agents.

W. B. Hossack, M.L.C., for the Karachi Chamber of Commerce Constituency, Manager of the Karachi Tramways.

168. Chairman : * * * Mr. Hossack, have you been the member for the Karachi Chamber in more councils than one, or is this the first council ?—(Mr. Hossack) : I have been on a previous council.

169. I think I am right with regard to these gentlemen who represent Chambers of Commerce that sometimes the representative shifts from time time; it may happen that a gentleman is going home, and it is usually done, I imagine, by arrangement ?—We have to resign, and a fresh election takes place.

170. A contested election ?—In the case of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce, no, not in my time. (Mr. Graham) : May I explain, before we begin, that Mr. Stanley will answer any questions on the general memorandum we have submitted, and I will answer anything on the question of the separation of Sind, Terminal Tax, the Meston Settlement, etc.

171. That is a very convenient arrangement. As regards the general question, I think we shall be glad to have a short statement. We have made arrangements to consider the broad general question probably at Calcutta, and it has been found, I think, that that is a convenient plan, and both you gentlemen, and both your associations, of course, are associated with the central bodies. I gather, too, Mr. Graham, upon looking at the memorandum from the Karachi Chamber of Commerce, page 218, that you are in general agreement with the memorandum submitted by the Associated Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes.

172. I think we should like to hear your view about the proposed separation of Sind. Perhaps we might take that first ?—The Chamber of Commerce have no very definite opinion on that subject, but generally they feel that we are best as we are. At the same time, we realise that the situation may change, and we would like the door left open for Sind to separate and stand on its own, or secede from Bombay and join the Punjab.

173. Of course, you, Mr. Graham, as a business man, will appreciate that these questions which from time to time arise, of separating off a portion of an administrative area may raise some difficult financial questions ?—Yes.

174. On that, one is naturally bound to ask for some detailed figures and some expert help. I do not suppose at the moment you are offering detailed figures about that ?—I am not in a position to do so. I do not know the figures.

175. I wish you would tell me this, which certainly may have a bearing one way or the other. Are you interested in the trade at Karachi as distinguished from Bombay, or are you interested in both ?—I am interested in both, personally, as a firm.

176. Then you are more impartial ?—I am very impartial.

177. I can see Sir Arthur Froom looking at you. I have heard the suggestion made, and I have seen it in these papers, that Karachi has become a very important port, not so much, I think, because of the trade in its immediate neighbourhood but because of the trade that comes to it from a distance, as the natural outlet, let us say, of the wheat-fields of the Punjab, and so on, and I have heard it suggested that Karachi does not necessarily prosper as it might do if it was in a separate area from the port of Bombay. Now, frankly, do you think there is anything in that ?—No, sir; my information is that Karachi has not suffered as a port from being under Bombay.

178. If you have interests in both ports, you are not tempted, I should think, to favour one ?—Actually to-day I am giving the view of the Chamber of Commerce Committee, which consists of ten very representative men representing both the importer and the exporter. I raised this question in committee the other day, and after about twenty minutes' discussion the general feeling was that it was a leap in the dark, and they did not quite know where they were; they would rather remain as they are, because, apart from anything else, there is the financial question about Sind not being able to stand on its own feet at present.

179. I am making no statement about it, but I was interested to know what business men like yourselves thought about it. It must obviously be remembered that if there was a separate area constituted, a separate province of Sind, then, of course, that province will have to face its own financial problem without looking for aid from a neighbouring province ?—Yes.

180. That manifestly raises very big technical difficulties ?—Exactly.

181. So whatever may be said on other grounds—and I am not at all shutting them out hereafter—the grounds of sentiment, the ground of the special circumstances of the area, grounds based on its physical separation from the presidency proper, I gather you to say on behalf of the Chamber that the Chamber to-day does not think from the point of view of the trade of Karachi they would press for such a change ?—No.

182. Mr. Miller : The trade of Karachi is chiefly with the Punjab; actually in Karachi and Sind the trade is very small ?—Yes. There is a good deal for Afghanistan as well.

Chairman : The question put is whether the trade of Karachi is not very largely, so far as it is an export trade, dependent on the Punjab.

Mr. Miller : And also in regard to the import trade.

183. Chairman : Yes—whether the imports passing through the port of Karachi are not very largely for the Punjab. I understand Mr. Graham to say that it is so to a large extent ?—Yes, and for Afghanistan.

184. And beyond ?—Yes.

185. Mr. Miller : And quite a number of offices here have sub-offices in the Punjab ?—That is correct also.

186. So that largely, so far as trade is concerned, Karachi is mainly interested in the Punjab ?—Yes.

187. Dr. Ambedkar : It was said by one witness this morning that the Chamber of Commerce had at one time held the view that Sind should be separated from Bombay ?—Was that so ? I am not aware of it. It is the first I have heard of it.

188. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You are a business man, and you look at the question from the business point of view. Do I understand that if Sind is separated from the Bombay presidency it will enormously increase the overhead charges of the administration of Sind ?—That is how it would appear to me.

189. That is to say that the overhead charges would so increase that the result would be incommensurate with the increase in expenditure ?—As I understand it, broadly speaking Sind does not pay her way now, and if you add a further burden to her, you are only putting her deeper into debt.

190. It is as if a company was not a paying concern, and you were to increase the pay of the managing director?—That is so.

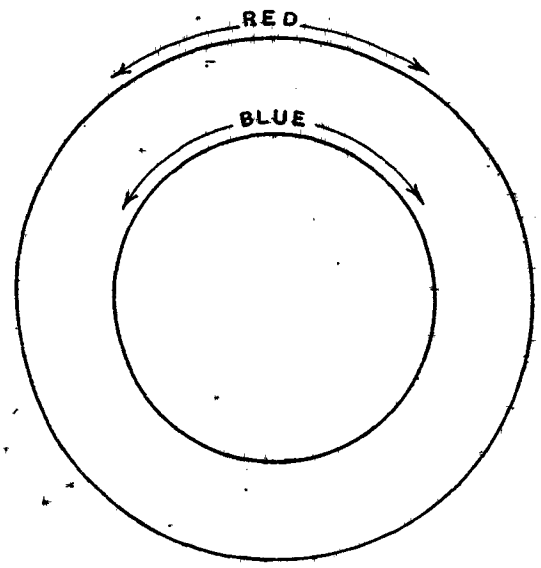
191. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: Have you really studied the economic conditions of Sind in so far as industry goes and revenue goes?—I frankly admit I have not.

192. Chairman: I understand the evidence is strictly confined to the view of the Chamber of Commerce, which, I gather, has had a discussion on the subject?—The Chamber of Commerce naturally at the moment is practically all merchant and banker representatives, as there are practically no industries, I think I am right in saying.

* * * * * * *

195. Chairman: Now let us take the other point. Mr. Stanley, may I try and shorten matters? If I may be allowed to say so, there is a suggestion in your memorandum which I regard as of great importance, and it is only right that I should say it is also to be found in a valuable document which has been sent to us by Mr. E. L. Price. The suggestion, as I follow it, is this, that in recommending changes in the Constitution of India the Conference should not assume that the new structure should be absolutely rigid and fixed and incapable of internal adjustment, but that it might be well worth considering whether the new system might not be such as would contain within itself, as it were, without further reference to the Imperial Parliament, some opportunity of rearrangement and progress within a general boundary. I understand that to be the suggestion. It is what you call a dynamic, as opposed to a merely static, scheme. Am I correct, or not?—Correct, sir, except that we certainly contemplate that certain proposed changes of constitution should be referred to the Imperial Parliament for ratification.

196. I should like you to put it in your own way, but I wanted to focus attention on what I regard as an extremely interesting suggestion?—Might I be allowed to explain it with the help of this diagram?



197. Yes?—All within this blue circle represents provincial autonomy. In our memorandum we have recommended going forward to full provincial autonomy, including the transfer of Law and Order. On further consideration, we thought it would be better initially to exclude Law and Order, and later on permit the major provincial legislatures to take control of Law and Order should they desire to do so. When all the major provinces have reached this blue circle (which is full provincial autonomy), we then think a period of time should elapse before any further change takes place. We name seven years in our memorandum, but we think, on the whole, this period is on the short side. That static period is for education, to enable the provincial electorate to understand the dangers and the difficulties and the implications of autonomy. After that period of full provincial autonomy, we think the provinces by agreement should be enabled as a unit to apply to the Imperial Parliament for power to take over the control of certain central subjects, included between the blue inner circle and the red outer circle. All subjects which the Crown must control to enable it to carry out its obligations to the Indian States lie outside this red circle, and remain under the exclusive control of the Viceroy in Council. I may instance the Army, Foreign Relations, Railways, Ports, Telegraphs and so on. We by no means imply that only such subjects as it is obligatory on the Viceroy to control should lie outside the red circle. Once the full period of static provincial autonomy has elapsed, we visualise all within the red circle being subject to appeal to the Imperial Parliament for constitutional modification, in which I include recession. We want the provincial electorate to be educated, and during these experiments in the provinces we want no advance whatever in the Central Government. That implies that dangers will be localised, and there will be a strong Central Government untrammelled by internal changes and able to deal with any provincial breakdowns should they occur. Our proposals are subject to certain fundamental safeguards laid down in our memorandum, which I need not repeat.

198. You might refer me to the pages?—Yes. In the Chamber of Commerce memorandum there are some on page 218. We lay great stress on the words "Inter alia" on page 218. Then page 218 continues to deal with the central position and page 219 with the provincial position.

199. Page 219, beginning with the word "provided"?—Yes, paragraphs (a) to (h).

200. I see that (b) on page 219 is "That a Provincial Second Chamber be set up." I think we have already had that?—Yes, but we are dealing with the static period at the end and the dynamic period at the beginning of page 219.

201. In the same way, page 219 speaks of the Governor retaining his constitutional prerogative of veto, which we have already had (I understand you to say for a later period) earlier on that page?—That is correct.

202. On page 219 (f) you refer to a Public Service Commission. Would that be a provincial Public Service Commission?—Yes. The heading . . . . under which these come, is "Provincial Government of Bombay and Smaller Governing Units in the Presidency of Bombay."

203. I see, yes. Please finish what you were saying; it is very interesting?—I should like to emphasise the need we feel for a clause invalidating discriminatory or differential legislation or taxation.

204. That is a reference to page 218, sub-clause (3), is it not?—Yes. We wish also to emphasise the need for a Supreme Court of Judicature and for a Public Service Commission for the province of high-standing personnel to safeguard and satisfy the services.

205. When you suggest there should be no discriminatory or differential legislation or taxation and so on, I suppose you mean that in the Constitution there should be a clause which says that?—Yes.

206. And when you suggest there should be some court to apply that, you mean that if people think that condition is not satisfied they should be enabled to appeal to the court?—Yes.

207. There may be great difficulties in all that, but, at any rate, it is perfectly intelligible. What is your proposal with regard to the Public Service Commission?—We specially emphasise the necessity for a provincial Public Service Commission of high-standing personnel to safeguard and satisfy the services. We are not satisfied with the veto alone; we want some additional safeguard, and the Supreme Court is what we suggest for your consideration.

Then we recommend mixed electorates for local municipalities and district local boards, and communal electorates for bigger units of goverment, so that experience of both systems will become available. From what I have said you will see we hope you will find a way to eliminate a series of Statutory Commissions, which we think breed unrest and, consequently, result in a lack of application to internal problems.

* * * * * * *

208. I should like to be quite sure I understand the meaning of this interesting pictorial illustration. Let me see if I can hit the bull's-eye, in the very middle of the smaller circle. Is the boundary of that smaller circle supposed to represent what should be the degree of responsible self-government now, at the present stage?—No, it is only when all the major provinces have taken over full responsible government, including Law and Order; it is not until then that the blue line is reached.

209. The first stage, as you see it, will not carry everybody to the blue line?—No; it will be less Law and Order.

210. Your idea is that to start with (I mean, from now onwards) Law and Order should continue to be a reserved subject?—Yes. It should continue under the present system of diarchy, but we think the Governor should have more than one member of Council; we think he should have two.

211. That is working it out; I want, first of all, to get a broad view. Your broad principle is that you do not consider the time has come at once to transfer Law and Order?—That is right.

212. Do you think the time has come to transfer everything else which is within the provincial sphere?—That is a difficult question to answer.

213. That is why I ask it?—You see, the scheme we have put up to you does necessitate educating the "man in the field," and we feel that if provincial subjects such as irrigation do come under ministerial control you will get rapid education in the provinces which we think will result in responsibility and enable this further stage to be undertaken with that sense of responsibility which we feel is so essential.

214. If I may say so, in so far as your object is to urge a scheme which is calculated to encourage the rapid growth of a sense of responsibility, I should think everybody who is a real friend of India and who wishes to see India advance towards the goal will agree with you. But, after all, we have to consider what are the practical steps to be taken now, and I gather your view is there ought not to be a transfer of every reserved subject now, but that there ought to be further transfer if possible, saving, however, for the present Law and Order. Is that it?—Yes.

215. Your view is there ought not to be a complete transfer of all the reserved provincial subjects now, because you want to except Law and Order?—Correct.

216. Whether you could or not transfer all the other subjects is a point you are not quite definite about, but you would like to see, if possible, some further transfer now?—Yes.

217. And you put that on the ground that the more that is done, the more likely will ordinary people here (what you call the "man in the field") be to learn something of political responsibility?—That is so.

218. We have not got to your blue circle circumference yet. Explain to me (I have not quite got it) what is it that is going to bring us to the blue circumference?—Assuming that every single item of provincial subjects was handed over to ministers, except Law and Order, and that it was left to the individual provincial councils to take over Law and Order of their own volition, when all the major provinces had, of their own volition, taken over Law and Order, that blue line is reached.

219. Then you have filled up the blue circle?—Yes.

220. Is your suggestion that the new Constitution should provide that it is within the power of each of the provincial councils by resolution to take over Law and Order?—Yes, but not immediately.

221. After an interval of, say, seven or ten years?—No, because this is a modification of our original memorandum.

222. Do not bother about your original memorandum. I want to know what the plan is now?—We think until the provincial councils have settled down it is very undesirable they should immediately consider this very controversial subject of Law and Order, and therefore we should like an intervening period before Law and Order is taken over, so that they may settle down.

223. Have you any ideas on the subject of how long the intervening period should be? I can quite understand your saying you have not fixed it, but I should like to know your idea?—I do not know I can do more than say it should be sufficient to give the councils with their extended powers time to settle down, adequate opportunities to settle down.

224. That is a perfectly fair answer. It is difficult to fix these things, and not very useful, as a matter of fact, to try to fix them dogmatically. Very well. You contemplate that, after the limited time which you describe as a period for settling down, it should then be competent for the provincial councils, by their own volition, to decide to take over the remaining subject, Law and Order?—Yes.

225. So there would be a provision in the Constitution that after so many years the provincial councils shall have that power?—Yes.

226. Have you worked out whether they are to have the power of deciding it without any opportunity for anybody to veto or override them? Are they to have a free option to do it when the time comes?—No, we consider the power of veto should rest with the Governor permanently.

227. They might pass the resolution, and yet the Governor might veto it?—That is possible.

228. However, there would not be any reference—this is the point—to the Imperial Parliament. The Imperial Parliament would have nothing to do with it except for making this provision beforehand?—Exactly.

229. That is what you mean by saying you want to see a Constitution devised which, after the visit of this present Statutory Commission, will not call for the intervention of the Imperial Parliament at every stage afterwards?—Yes. That, of course, is one stage only.

230. That will bring you to the blue line. One more thing I think I understood you to say—that you could only reach the blue line if all the provinces had passed through this?—All the major provinces had reached the blue line.

231. What do you mean by the major provinces—the nine?—Yes. I am excluding, for instance, the North-West Frontier Province.

232. For the moment you are speaking of the nine Governors' provinces?—Yes.

233. I have not quite followed why you say that. Is it not possible on your scheme that one province or more, for very good and sufficient reasons, might want to take over this remaining topic, although, perhaps, some other province had better wait?—It is very possible.

234. Then what is the reason for the provision in your scheme that all the provinces must ask for it together before anything more can happen anywhere?—Because we do not think that any province, unless it has taken responsibility for Law and Order, can possibly have that sense of responsibility to approach the questions of the central subjects.

235. But I have not got to the central subjects yet. I am up to the blue line. Tell me, is it, or is it not, part of your plan that there can be no transfer of Law and Order anywhere until all the provinces have asked for it each for themselves?—Oh, no; any province can ask for it when they want it.

236. And if the Governor does not veto, after so many years it will get it?—Yes.

237. That brings us to the blue line, does it?—Yes.

238. Now, what is the moment at which there is a prospect of passing beyond the inner circle into the middle, into the ring?—We contemplate a static period when the last province has reached that blue line, so that the last province to reach it should have an opportunity of internal education.

239. Then that comes to this, does it, that, though different provinces may reach the blue circumference at different times, they must all reach it before any province can go beyond it?—Yes, and there must also be a period after that point.

240. Then I gather that the advance from the inside boundary, the blue, to the outer boundary, the red, is an advance in the nature of provinces taking over not reserved provincial subjects but taking over certain central subjects?—That is correct, with the consent of the Imperial Parliament.

241. What sort of central subjects have you got in mind?—Well, I am not prepared to make any definite answer to that.

242. It will not happen for some time?—I might just indicate the type of subjects which might be possible.

243. I am interested to know what there is between the inside blue and the outer red, because at present it is rather a vacuum to me. Do you see what I mean?—I follow what you mean. We would rather not give a definite answer to that.

244. Do you contemplate this, when the time comes to move from the blue boundary out to the red boundary, that it would be necessary for the Central Government to assent to what the provinces want?—No, sir; the Imperial Parliament.

245. So it would be this, that the provinces would pass a resolution, or whatever it was, make a representation urging that they should have additional powers given to them which are now being enjoyed by the Central Government, and that the Imperial Parliament would have the opportunity of saying, "Very well, we agree, as you wish it; we will help you to get it"?—May I just explain on that point? These are central subjects only, and our idea was that the various provinces as a unit should ask the Imperial Parliament that they should take over control of part of the Central Government—namely, certain definite central subjects—and it would not be a question of transfer from the Central Government to the provincial Government at all, but diarchy in the Central Government.

246. Lord Strathcona: Do you contemplate now the immediate handing over of land revenue?—We do contemplate it, yes.

247. Colonel Lane-Fox: Do you contemplate a differential system as between various provinces? You do not suggest a uniform system; at different points different provincial Governments will have different powers?—We were not contemplating that the major provinces would have different powers. We were contemplating that they would all be on a parity, on one straight line, which would exclude Law and Order.

248. As I understood you, they would make a different rate of progress; some would get forward more quickly than others. That is your point of view?—Yes, up to the point where they include all those matters within the blue circle.

249. Mr. Cadogan: The progressive provinces would have to wait on the blue circumference until they had all reached it?—Yes.

250. Some of them would reach the blue circumference before the others. At the blue circumference they will wait for the rest?—They will have to wait for the rest, and then when the last one has got there, there must be a static period so that the last province shall have a chance of getting its education.

251. Colonel Lane-Fox: You said you would give the provinces power to take over on their own conditions Law and Order after a certain period?—Yes.

252. Do you think there is any province, if a resolution was put before it suggesting the taking over of further powers, that would not immediately adopt it? Therefore, what is the value of that provision?—Well, sir, one can only express an opinion. I am not by any means certain, speaking for myself, that all the provinces would go for taking over that subject of Law and Order forthwith when it was permitted.

253. If that did happen, then the only safeguard would be the veto of the Governor, and different Governors having different personalities, there might be a case in which one Governor was rather more cautious than another, and the province might feel a considerable grievance. Would not that put a further serious burden of responsibility upon the Governor?—Of course, to veto anything is a serious responsibility.

254. Major Attlee: As far as the All-India Government is concerned, the Central Government, the Central Legislature and so on, you have really got a double static period up to the blue and up to the red before anything is going to happen now?—Yes. Of course, Law and Order is one static period, because there is going to be a time period for the individual provinces to settle down, and then take over Law and Order. Then they get to the blue line. Then there is the full static period before the provinces can appeal to the Imperial Parliament to take over certain central subjects and devise some method by which they should be worked as responsible government.

255. But the Central Legislature is completely sterilised during all that period—they have no power of asking for anything?—That is so.

256. You are satisfied with the present position?—No.

257. But you are prepared to carry it on for another twenty years?—We want no further advance for the Central Legislature now.

258. Mr. Cadogan: I did not quite follow what central subjects are between the blue and the red lines?—Assuming that from that blue line up to here (the witness indicated a point outside the red circle) are all the central subjects, all I actually mentioned were those subjects which the Viceroy must control to carry out the Crown's obligations to the Indian States, they must rest outside, necessarily outside that red circle. All the other subjects can rest between the blue and red circles, but we do not imply that they should necessarily rest within this area.

259. Chairman: May I put it in this way? I think it answers Mr. Cadogan's difficulty, which was also mine, but you have now made it clearer to me than I had made it for myself. Your view seems to be that, whatever happens in the future about the power of the different provinces, there may be a list of things, of which the defence of India would probably be an example, which must always lie beyond any possible provincial sphere?—Precisely.

260. And you say that whatever happens in the future, those things you were excluding from the possibility of becoming provincial subjects; but you say as long as you keep those things which are in their nature and essence central, how much of the rest of the central powers may ultimately on application pass to the province is a matter which you think would have to be considered on its merits if the provinces asked for it to time. Have I put it rightly?—Yes, sir; but may I just say this: we are not contemplating any transfer of central subjects from the existing Central Government to the provinces. Is that clear?

261. Then what is the addition which you think the provinces may get when they pass beyond the blue line?—Just as you gentlemen are sitting here as a Commission so all the delegates from provinces may sit together and say that they would like to take over certain central subjects.

262. Stop there a moment. Supposing they say that, and supposing they get their way, then they would be taking over certain central subjects?—Yes, but they remain central. The only difference is this, that those central subjects, instead of being worked as they are at present under the existing Constitution, would be worked by some other method which I have envisaged as responsible government, but the subjects would still be part of a central legislature. (Mr. Graham): May I say something so as to make it clear? Take America and Prohibition. If Prohibition happened to be a central subject, the majority of States want to take over Prohibition. If that was outside the red circle, it would immediately come inside the red circle, and become an Indianised subject. Am I clear now?

263. I think you mean the blue circle?—It would remain central, but it would pass from the existing Central Government into an Indianised part of the Central Government.

264. Major Attlee: That is the question I was asking, if there was any possibility of advance in popular control at the centre, and you said no; but I gather now that there may be, but it cannot be done by application of the Central Legislature, but only by application of all the provinces?—(Mr. Stanley): Precisely.

* * * * * * *

268. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: You want separate electorates for the provincial councils?—(Mr. Hossack): Yes. Which memorandum are you referring to?—(Mr. Stanley): Would you mind telling me the page?

Chairman: The gentleman has told you he would be in favour himself of joint electorates in local self-governing bodies and of separate electorates as a principle for the legislative council, and he has said that by that means he thinks that public opinion would have the opportunity of judging which method was the better.

Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: I want to know his reasons why he wants to introduce joint electorates in local bodies.

Chairman: I have no doubt he will tell you why.

269. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: Have you any practical experience of local self-governing bodies in this presidency? Have you ever been elected or stood as a candidate for a municipal or district local board?—(Mr. Hossack): Might I also add a further reason to that expressed already by the Chairman of the Commission? We as a Chamber of Commerce consider that we are pledged to retain communal representation to the Mahommedan community until such time as that community chooses voluntarily to surrender it.

270. So if they do not want it, you do not want to thrust it upon them?—Certainly not.

271. Rao Saheb Patil: I want to ask whether you have studied the working of diarchy in the Bombay legislative council for the last nine years?—I have only been connected with the Bombay council for the last three years, but I have certainly studied for about seven years the working of the council.

272. Have you studied the working of diarchy?—Yes, I have in the last three years, not nine.

273. Is it not a fact that the ministers have worked satisfactorily as far as the transferred subjects are concerned?—To the best of my knowledge I think they have worked satisfactorily.

274. What are the objections to transferring Law and Order to the popular control?—Mr. Stanley will answer that. (Mr. Stanley): We have given this matter most grave and careful consideration. We originally thought it would be desirable to transfer Law and Order, but on further consideration we are of opinion that it would be better not to transfer Law and Order to begin with, but to allow the provincial councils to settle down, to get into the saddle, and then when they were functioning all right, if they cared to take over Law and Order they could do so. That is a repetition of what I have already said.

275. Rao Saheb Patil: When do you think that Law and Order will be made a transferred subject?—We have been considering this matter for the last eight or nine months, and admittedly our opinion has changed several times.

276. And you have changed your opinion during that period of nine months?—We have changed our opinion, yes.

277. What were the circumstances that led you to change your opinion?—Further consideration and more information.

278. What was the further consideration, I want to know?—We have modified our ideas.

279. But what are the materials on which you have modified your ideas?—It was because we had further considered the matter; we had received further information, and therefore we came to the conclusion that it would be undesirable to advocate the immediate handing over of Law and Order to a provincial council.

280. What circumstances came to light which inclined you to take this view?—It is a matter of vital importance to all the interests concerned, and we feel that to advocate handing over Law and Order forthwith is a matter of grave responsibility.

281. We have never doubted it is a matter of great responsibility?—(Mr. Graham): We have a mandate from a body of men whom we represent, and beyond that we cannot go. These things are often decided by vote.

Chairman: It is not a matter of reproach to anybody, least of all to anybody who has studied the thing carefully, that in the course of reflection he should find his opinions have somewhat changed, in whatever direction it may be. For example, it would be quite useless to be a member of this Conference if one came here with fixed opinions, and, after all, the work of the Conference remained of the same opinions. I do not want you to regard it, therefore, as a matter of reproach that people on reflection should find their first judgment has varied. I do not say in the least whether I should agree with your first judgment or your second. Conference means we should try by reflection to arrive, if possible, at the wisest conclusions at the end, which is not always the same as starting with a fixed opinion in the beginning.

282. Sir Arthur Froom: On page 218 of your memorandum you say: "The Associated Chambers have recommended the grant to provinces up to full responsible autonomy under certain conditions. With this recommendation we are in full agreement." Now, having made that statement, you are fully acquainted with the memorandum of the Associated Chambers, Mr. Stanley?—(Mr. Stanley): Yes.

283. The Associated Chambers, with regard to this rather vexed question of Law and Order, say that some Chambers were averse to transferring this subject, but that the majority believed the risk must be taken. I take it this Conference should now recognise that the Karachi Chamber in this matter sides with the minority?—(Mr. Graham): The answer is yes.

284. It says the majority were in favour. Your opinion must now be recorded as against?—(Mr. Stanley): Yes. We side with the minority.

285. In quoting a majority, were the Associated Chambers of Commerce counting the number of Chambers or the votes? I may explain that the voting power of the various Chambers of Commerce in this country who belong to the Associated Chambers varies considerably with the size and importance of the Chamber, so it is important to know whether "majority" means majority of Chambers or majority of votes?—I cannot tell you.

Chairman: Do you know, Sir Arthur?

286. Sir Arthur Froom: No, I do not. (To the witness.) Turning to page 219, to your paragraph under the heading "Provincial Government of Bombay and Smaller Governing Units in the Presidency of Bombay," I take it that you want the Conference to understand that the opinion of your Chamber is entirely revised?—So far as Law and Order goes, yes.

287. I make rather a point of this, because I have always understood that memoranda are accepted, and we generally ask questions to get some explanation of them, so I should like to have it recorded that the opinion of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce with regard to that paragraph, and especially with regard to Law and Order, has entirely changed?—Yes.

Chairman: This is the point brought out just now by Mr. Patil. He said: "At one time you favoured handing over Law and Order, and now you say you do not think it ought to happen yet." His cross-examination was designed to get what it is very natural to want, but very difficult to give, namely, exactly why the change was made, and so on. I think these gentlemen said it was the result of further consideration and further information, and they admitted quite frankly that it was a change.

288. Sir Arthur Froom: Then you told the Chairman that after a certain period you considered each Province should have some sort of statutory right to decide or to apply to take over Law and Order?—Yes.

289. But somebody should have the veto over that?—Yes.

290. Was there to be some sort of body set up to inquire into the matter?—We do not contemplate that. We contemplate the legislature themselves should be the inquiring body.

291. Chairman: The legislature really consists of the Governor and the Council, so the real meaning of it is that if the legislature decides to take it over after a time they may; but you wish to make it plain you expect the Governor's veto to be exercised if the Governor thinks it right to exercise it?—Yes.

292. Sir Arthur Froom: It is not a case of vetoing an ordinary legislative measure; here it is a constitutional matter?—We have also suggested the Governor-General should have the power of veto. If the Governor felt it put him into an invidious position, he might let it go past him, so that the veto is exercised through the Governor-General.

293. At any rate, you are satisfied the Governor and the Governor-General should have the power to decide this?—Yes.

294. Supposing the transfer is decided on, would you reintroduce the safeguards you set out here?—Yes.

295. I should like you to make that point quite clear. You first of all favoured the transfer of Law and Order, and then you changed your opinion; but when you were in favour of transferring Law and Order you wanted certain safeguards. If in so many years' time it is transferred, will you still want these safeguards?—Yes, we should want precisely the same safeguards as we have asked for now.

296. As regards the transfer of all subjects except Law and Order, has your Chamber considered the question of finance very closely? Do you conceive the Central Government should still have some control over provincial finance?—We think it possible it would be necessary to correlate the borrowings of the various provinces by the Central Government.

297. That is a very important proposition; I am glad to see you have considered that. The question of loans and borrowings is a very important matter, and must be co-ordinated amongst the provinces. Your final recommendation, as I understand it, is not dealt with at any length in this Memorandum, but I understand that during this further advance in the Provinces your Chamber does not wish for any alteration in the Central Government?—We want no advance whatever.

298. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I find that your Memorandum is dated 3rd October, 1928, Mr. Stanley?—Yes.

299. On that date your Chamber was in favour of full autonomy being granted, including ministerial responsibility for Law and Order, subject to the provisos set out in clause (3) on page 5: is not that so? You say "That full responsible autonomy be granted"?—Yes.

300. I see from page 218 that you have 82 members in your Chamber. Did you hold a meeting of your Chamber after October 3rd for the purpose of consulting them as to whether they were in agreement with the modifications you wanted to make as regards the reservation of Law and Order?—The Committee met.

301. There was no meeting?—(Mr. Graham): No general meeting, no.

302. That is what I mean. Your Karachi Chamber of Commerce passed this Memorandum, but you did not convene any meeting of your Chamber for the purpose of placing before them your view that Law and Order must be reserved and getting their consent to say so on their behalf here?—No. But we never called a general meeting on the Memorandum at all. The Committee had full power to deal with this question.

303. Did you call a meeting of the Committee?—Yes, the Committee has been sitting.

304. Chairman: It is very important to get this quite clear. I understand that you say that the printed document, called the memorandum, submitted by the Karachi Chamber, which as far as the print goes is dated October 3rd, 1928, was a memorandum which was drawn up and ultimately printed because it was agreed to by the Committee of the Chamber?—Yes. It was circularised as well, but no general meeting was called.

305. It was not only drawn up (perhaps in draft) by the Committee, but it was circulated to the members?—Actually in its complete form.

306. Was that with a view to seeing whether the members agreed or disagreed?—Yes. They were given a certain amount of time, and no objections were received.

307. Then I think Sir Hari Singh Gour was entitled to say that as the document is in print it might be fairly treated as being put forward with the authority of the members of the Chamber?—On the other hand, subsequently there was a Committee meeting.

308. I am coming to that. The memorandum as printed must be regarded as having been put forward at the time as representing the views of the members of the Chamber? That is the first step?—Yes.

309. My learned friend has pointed out that since then there has been some revision. I do not blame you in the least, but I want to understand it, just he does. I understand the revised views you have expressed today are expressed not on your personal behalf, but on behalf of the Committee. How big is the Committee?—Ten members.

310. Have you had a meeting of the Committee specially?—Yes, last week.

311. We could not help noticing that when Mr. Stanley was speaking just now in this interesting way he was in part reading from a document, a note or draft. Are the opinions or suggestions contained in that draft things which were agreed upon by the meeting of your Committee?—We have the entire consent of the Committee behind this revision.

312. One is entitled to know how it comes about. Was your committee meeting one at which the suggestions were discussed?—Mr. Stanley gave a full exposition of the memorandum as he has given it today.

313. But there has been no opportunity of circulating it to your members apart from your Committee?—No.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Nor is there any resolution of your Committee on what Mr. Stanley mentioned to them. There is no resolution adopting this modification?

Chairman: If you mean the formal thing I do not care a button. I should like to ask this. I make no complaint, nor does Sir Singh Gour.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Quite.

314. Chairman: We do not complain that the Committee should have the candour, and I think the public spirit, to come forward and state quite frankly it has modified its view. It is necessary everybody should do that if it is so. I wonder, however, whether you could find some means of circulating to your members the modification as you have suggested it today, and whether later on you could let the secretariat know whether the modified opinion you have given us is accepted by your members, or whether they prefer the original view?—Certainly.*

315. Chairman : Dates do not matter, but authority does matter?—Yes, certainly.

316. Will you do that?—Certainly.

317. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Mr. Stanley, you have spoken of the static period and said that within that static period provincial autonomy would be created; in other words, everything within the blue line would be given to the provinces after the static period of seven years or whatever it may be, and after that you speak of the central subjects. Those subjects, I understand, would be transferred to a responsible government, but not a provincial government. Do I understand you to mean that after the static period, when full provincial autonomy is in force, all the provinces become autonomous provinces?—(Mr. Stanley) : Yes, the major provinces.

318. Then we have reached the blue circumference and we are dealing with the red circle. After that, to whom will you transfer the subjects which come within the red circle, the central subjects? Will it be to a responsible Cabinet in the Central Government?—Agreement has to be come to by the various provinces, as a unit, as to the form in which they desire to work certain central subjects in an autonomous manner.

319. All the provinces must join together in asking the Central Government to transfer all the central subjects, parcelling them out amongst the provinces?—No. There is no question of the provinces being able to take over responsibility from the Central Government; it is merely a question of making some form of alteration in the existing central Constitution by agreement among the various provinces.

320. Then you want to make an alteration in the Central Government depend on the volition of the provincial Governments?—On the provincial legislatures, who, as a body, will say to the Imperial Parliament: "We would like to take over certain central subjects and work them in this manner."

321. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You wish to place the Central Government at the mercy of the provinces under this scheme?

Chairman : I do not think he has worked it out in detail. Let us see if this expression is at all helpful to you. I am only trying to understand it. It seemed to me, when I listened to you just now, that you could express your idea in this way. When you have filled up the blue space, you suggested there would be a united resolve by all the provinces. That is as it may be, but supposing there was some central subject which was not going necessarily to be reserved outside the red line, it would be rather like starting diarchy at the centre?—It would be diarchy.

Chairman : I think that is the effect of it, that when you have exhausted all the provincial topics and filled up your blue circle, then the time will come for considering whether there may not be some central subjects which could be under ministers subject and responsible to a Central Legislature. On the other hand, he thinks there are other central subjects (such, for instance, as defence or international relations) which, according to his view, would be beyond that, because they would not only be outside the blue moon, but outside the red sun as well.

322. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Your position, then, amounts to this, that as regards central subjects you give the provinces a voice in determining what measure of diarchy shall be introduced in the Central Government?—That is correct.

323. And to what extent and subject to what limitations?—We have not gone into details, but if they put up their proposals to the Imperial Government, it was up to the Imperial Government either to accept those proposals or give the grounds for refusing to accept them.

324. Then there are two breaks; you provide for two. One is the veto of the Governor, and the other is the veto of the Governor-General. It then comes to this, that there are only two obstacles to the full grant of autonomy, namely, the veto of the Governor and the veto of the Governor-General?—No, not at all. In the case of full provincial autonomy it has got to be ratified by the Governor and Governor-General. In the case of any of the central subjects that are transferable being taken over by the volition of the provinces to form a new Constitution so far as the Central Government is concerned that is subject to the ratification of the Imperial Parliament.

325. You say you do not want to see the Statutory Commission again in this country, but the Imperial Parliament is not likely to do anything without the advice of a Commission?—An amendment of the Canadian Constitution is subject to the assent of the Imperial Parliament.

326. As regards the provincial Government, you introduce the Cabinet system into the provincial Government, page 220?—(Mr. Stanley) : Yes, but we modify that, as a matter of fact. We think on the whole there must be joint responsibility.

327. Here again you depart from the memorandum passed and circulated to your members?—Yes.

328. One more question as regards the veto of the Governor. You have a Cabinet form of government with joint responsibility, and supposing the Cabinet and the legislatures had decided one way, could you ask the Governor then to exercise the veto? Will the Governor act in consultation with the Cabinet or without consulting the Cabinet?—I am unable to answer that question.

Chairman : We are very grateful to you, gentlemen.

Copy of letter No. 10 Pn. 39 dated the 14th December, 1928, from J. R. N. GRAHAM, Esq., V.C., Chairman, the Karachi Chamber of Commerce, to the Secretary, Indian Statutory Commission.

"I have the honour to state for the information of the Indian Statutory Commission that the amendment made in the oral evidence of this Chamber re Law and Order has been ratified by Members of the Chamber. This is in fulfilment of the undertaking given by the undersigned to the Chairman that this would be ratified in due course."

Memorandum submitted by THE ALL-SIND HINDU ASSOCIATION.*

Introductory.—This Association was started in the year 1924, and held its first conference in Hyderabad (Sind), at which 380 delegates attended from all parts of Sind. Its primary object was to ventilate the legitimate grievances of Sind Hindus and to protect their interests, whenever necessary. While anxious to co-operate with other Hindu organisations in Sind for the attainment of common objects the organisers of this Association desired to avoid methods that might prevent Hindus who were not extremists in politics from joining them in their efforts for the advancement of the Hindu community in Sind. This Association is open to all sections of Sind Hindus, and counts among its members leading citizens, merchants, landlords, educationalists, and professional men.

This Association would be failing in their duty if at the very outset they did not draw the special attention of the Commission to the disabilities from which the Hindu community in Sind has been suffering owing to a change in the policy of the Local Government during recent years. When the British conquered Sind, they professed to be the deliverers of the people, especially the Hindus, from the oppressive misrule of the Mirs. The Hindu community loyally co-operated with them in their efforts to evolve order out of confusion; and looking back to the progress of Sind under British Rule during the last eighty years the Sind Hindus can legitimately claim that they have contributed more than any other Indian community to the political, economic, educational and social advancement of Sind. Though a minority, they have never asked for any special protection or privileges for themselves; all that they have been pleading for is security for their person and property in the rural areas of Sind, and freedom from vexatious restrictions on their enterprise, energy and ability. And yet, during the last thirty years or so, with but occasional interruptions, the officials in Sind have been pursuing a determined policy of discrimination against the Hindus and of favouritism to the other communities, regardless of all consideration of justice and fair play towards all citizens of the State. The introduction of communal principle in the composition of the legislature and its recognition in the public administration of the country has aggravated the evil and made the position well-nigh intolerable.

In the opinion of this Association, the principle of communal representation and separate electorates is incompatible with the conceptions of nationality and responsible government, and they are firmly of opinion that no extension of reforms of 1919 will do any good to the country, especially to Sind, unless this blot on the constitution is immediately wiped out. The Lucknow pact which accorded excessive representation to the Muslim community on the Bombay council has given the Muslims a key position in the Bombay council, which they have utilised to the full for bargaining with Government for communal and individual ends at the expense of Hindus in Sind. The union of the official block with the Non-Brahmin and Muslim blocks has made it very difficult for Sind Hindus to secure fair treatment at the hands of Sind officials, and is responsible for a distinct fall in the standard and tone of the administration.

Far more potent for mischief than even the Lucknow pact has been the extension of its vicious principles to local bodies, services and educational institutions, etc. The authors of the Lucknow pact fondly imagined that communal representation will be strictly confined to the legislatures and took care to state this expressly; but the poison which they introduced into the body politic has spread itself to almost every department of the State. A Muslim Minister of Local Self-Government introduced into the local bodies in Sind, not with a view to protect a minority, but to permanently place a credal majority in power. The solemn declaration of the Court of Directors in their despatch No. 44, dated 10th December, 1834, accompanying the India Act of 1833, to the effect that "the meaning of the enactment we take to be that there shall be no governing caste in India, and that whatever other tests of qualifications may be adopted, distinction of race and religion shall not be of the number," has been ignored, and appointments to public offices in Sind from the highest to the lowest are now made openly and on a large scale on the basis of the creed which the applicants profess. The magnitude of the injustice can be easily realised from the fact that during the last 25 years, not a single Hindu has been nominated directly to the Executive Branch of the Provincial Service in Sind, though quite a fair number of Hindu Sindhis have proved their fitness for appointment to the Indian Civil Service at the open competitive examination held in London.

This Association desire to draw pointed attention to the fact that though in the process of Indianising the services the rights and interests of European servants have never been encroached upon, the Mahommedanising of the services in Sind is being carried on in utter disregard of the rights of Hindu employees who entered the various services when the rules of Government clearly laid down that promotion and appointments would go by seniority and merit. The Hindus in services have been superseded not only by Mahommedans, but also by Christians, much junior to them. (See Appendix II for some cases of supersession.) The advocates of communal principle in services often argue as if the point at issue is the just distribution of offices between the diverse communities in India, losing sight of the fact that it is individuals and not communities that are appointed to offices. Religion is a personal affair of the individual, and the State has no moral right to make any enquiry about the creed of an applicant for an administrative job, much less to make an invidious distinction against individuals whose only crime is that they happen to be born in a particular creed or community. The adoption of this communal policy in the matter of appointments and promotions in services, irrespective of seniority and merit, has had a very pernicious effect on the administration of this Division. It has affected adversely the standard not only of efficiency but also of purity among the public servants. It has infected some of the public servants with the communal spirit, with the result that they inspire little confidence among the public for their impartiality. Moreover, this vicious policy of promotion and recruitment is a violation of the principle of religious neutrality of the State as it tends to encourage conversions from one religion to another. In the long run, this policy of favouritism conduces neither to the efficiency nor to the stability of the State. Ability cannot be suppressed for ever; its righteous discontent is bound to seek a revolutionary outlet if it is not allowed a fair scope in the State. In this connection, this Association cannot help inviting the attention of the Commission to the full implications of the reply to their representation on this subject from the Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay, a copy of which is submitted herewith for convenience of reference (see Appendix II).

A word may here be said as to the inconsistency of the Muslim demands in this connection and the peculiar position in which the Sind Hindus find themselves in this Presidency. While the Muslims in Sind do not desire to allow the minority an open door to the public services, the Muslims of U. P., Bihar, and C. P. are actually enjoying as a minority a share of the posts in the public services, much in excess of their population ratio. It is obvious that the Muslims cannot have it both ways. If it is wrong for a majority to reserve for itself the lion's share of public services and so prevent able members of a minority community from capturing the number of offices they deserve, it cannot be right for Muslims in Sind to impose a restriction on the number of posts the Hindu minority can capture in Sind through an open door of recruitment. If the Muslims are to be given any concession as a minority in the Bombay Presidency, either the same concession should be extended to the Hindu community in Sind or Sind should not be treated as a unit by itself for recruitment to services, and Hindus of Sind should be allowed to compete freely for posts in the Presidency as a whole.

The introduction of communal principle into the Local Boards has told seriously on their efficiency. The latest official report on the working of reforms admits that during the preceding three years, the growth of Hindu-Mahommedan tension in certain parts of Sind has had " a serious effect on the administration of the local self-governing bodies," that " in nearly all the Districts of Sind, the School Boards elected under the Primary Education Act of 1923 consist mainly of Mahommedans and many of the members have little education or administrative experience," and that " the appointments of administrative officers so far have been made entirely on communal grounds " (page 117, Report on the Working of the Reformed Constitution 1927). The entire policy of the Taulka and District Local Boards is dominated by a desire to secure exclusive benefits for the members of the majority community. Almost every question is determined on communal considerations. As the latest report on the reforms puts it, " so far there has been little or no signs of a growth of political party feeling in the local bodies. Members as a rule are divided into communal groups, and vote on communal grounds." Even schemes of taxation are devised with a view to penalise the minority community, as was admitted by even the Muslim Minister of Local Self-Government in his answer to an interpellation on 30th September, 1927, in the Bombay Council, reproduced below :—

Mr. Jairamdas Doultram (Eastern Sind) :—Will Government be pleased to state—

(a) Whether it is a fact that the District Local Board of Hyderabad Sind has forwarded its recent proposals for taxing professions irrespective of income to the Commissioner in Sind for sanction through the Collector of Hyderabad;

(b) Whether it is a fact that the Collector of Hyderabad returned the papers to the District Local Board for reconsideration suggesting that certain professions followed practically exclusively by Muslims which had been exempted by the Board should also be taxed;

(c) Whether it is a fact that the District Local Board rejected the suggestion and refused on various grounds to tax the Muslim professions which had been exempted;

(d) Whether it is a fact that the proposed taxation has been criticised in the local Press as unfair in its incidence and designed to fall largely on Hindus ?

The Honourable Sir Ghulam Hussain :—(a) to (d) Yes.

Worse than even this is the mentality of Muslims when in power to suppress even the Official reports against the local bodies in which the Muslim Community is in power, as is clearly shown by the refusal of the Muslim Minister of Local Self-Government to reveal even to the Bombay Legislative Council the contents of the Collectors reports on the Local Boards in Sind (vide Bombay Council Proceedings on the 28th of July, 1927).

The Education Department has made itself no less notorious for its policy of injustice to Hindus. All sorts of devices have been used to supersede able Hindus by Muslims (see Appendix IV for a few examples). The tragedy of the whole affair is that an educationally advanced community is being forced to have its children educated by members of an admittedly backward community in Sind. Even areas which are predominantly Hindu are being compelled by a policy of favouritism followed in the admission of teachers to the Government Training College to prefer inferior Muslim teachers to superior Hindu teachers.

The police is predominantly Muslim owing to a wrong policy of recruitment, and in the present phase of communal tension inspires no confidence among the Hindus, especially in the rural areas where a sense of insecurity at present prevails among the Hindus. Kidnapping and kidnapping for the sake of conversions is on the increase, and no serious efforts are being made to bring the offenders to book, or to break up the organisation which there is reason to believe exists for the purpose.

Even Justice is not free from a suspicion of being influenced by political pressure. The resolutions of the Muslim Association and the pressure brought to bear on the Local Government through the Muslim members of the Council in the Larkana Riot Case has seriously undermined public confidence in the impartiality and independence of the Magistracy. That the Police and Magistracy should have failed to prevent a serious riot in broad daylight accompanied by loot and murder in Larkana, a district headquarter town, or to find sufficient evidence against even one real culprit reflects great discredit on the police and the judiciary. No adequate explanation has ever been given why persons against whom complaints were lodged by responsible people, and whose names were disclosed in the evidence recorded by the special magistrate who tried the Larkana case, were not arrested and brought to book as early as possible (see Appendix V). Subsequent events have not only weakened the prestige of the Executive, but have also produced a painful impression on the public mind that the Bombay Government in their desire to secure the votes of the Muslim block of the Bombay Council is prepared to go any length to please the Sind Muslims and to tolerate any behaviour on their part. As a result of the Muslim agitation against Mr. Brown, I.C.S., the Collector of Sukkur, he was suddenly transferred from the district. No heed was paid to the demand for some action being taken against those Muslims who at the Muslim Conference at Sukkur on the 20th February, 1927, made inflammatory speeches against the Hindus and indulged in open threats and ridicule against the officials, as can easily be seen from the following sentences taken from a Press report of these speeches :—

> " Mr. Brown carried on correspondence for filing a case against me and Sheikh Abdul Majid. If Collector Brown had got the case filed, we would have taught him a lesson and along with him the Hindus also."
> " I have given the name of Mr. Rewachand to Mr. Rieu (Commissioner) and I shall give a Hindu name to Mr. Brown."
> " Anyone following the footsteps of Mr. Brown would like him be summarily bundled away."

The attention of the Commissioner in Sind was drawn by this Association to the rabid writings of the Muslim Press; but the reply which they received to their representation was to the effect that Hindus should not read such writings (see Appendix VI). The " Zabardasti " (high handedness) that is sometimes allowed to prevail in rural areas is revealed by the fact that during the Moharum of 1927 one Sayed in Talti issued an order that " Hindus should accompany the Tazias bare-headed, and on their refusal to do so, they were attacked with drawn swords," and that during the Moharum this year, in the village of Gulam Nabishah in Samaro Taulaka, " Muslims forcibly removed the headwear of the Hindus, put dust into their heads and beat them, because they refused to accompany the Tazias."

Constitutional reforms have no meaning for a minority community confronted with such a situation. As a preliminary to any constitutional advance that the Commission may recommend for the Bombay Presidency, this Association therefore urges that at least in all Districts and Divisions in which the Muslims form a majority of the population or of the voters.

(a) Communal representation and separate electorates for the Legislative Council be abolished

(b) No minority be given representation on the legislature in excess of its equitable share on the basis of a uniform principle applicable to all communities.

(c) That no local body be constituted on the basis of the communal principle.

(d) That recruitment to posts carrying a salary of more than Rs. 100 per mensem be made on the results of open competitive examinations.

(e) That the Judiciary be made subordinate to the High Court which should be completely independent of the provincial executive and the legislature.

(f) That adequate constitutional safeguards be provided for preventing legislatures and elective bodies from discriminating against any individual on the ground of his birth, caste or creed in the matter of (1) admission to educational institutions maintained or aided by the State, (2) appointment to any post, office of power or honour in the public administration of the country, (3) and purchase and sale of land or exercise of any trade or calling.

(g) Minorities of every territorial unit of administration be given the right to demand a commission of enquiry from the Provincial Government in the case of local bodies and from the Central Government in the case of Provincial Governments into allegations of discriminations against them, and provision be made for enforcing the recommendations of such a commission.

I. THE REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM AS APPLIED TO BRITISH INDIA.

(a) Basis of Franchise.—The existing scheme of Franchise appears to the Association to be based upon no principle whatsoever. The Southborough Committee adopted for the most part the varying proposals of local Governments but made no attempt "to correlate the size of the suggested electorates with the progressiveness of the provincial populations whether judged by wealth, education or political activity." The distinguished authors of the Montagu—Chelmsford report said in para. 225 of their report, "we must, in fact, measure the number of persons who can in the different parts of the country be reasonably entrusted with the duties of citizenship," but the Committee seemed to have paid no heed to this test while laying down their recommendations. They ignored education altogether, and while adopting property rating as the basis for franchise, "made no comparison of the property qualifications" which they proposed in various provinces, nor did they explain the variations they recommended between different parts of the same province. (Para. 4, Fifth despatch on Indian Constitutional Reforms.)

The most obvious defect in the existing electorate is the small proportion of literate and intelligent voters among them. In the sparsely populated areas of rural Sind, practically without roads and other means of communication, it is impossible to keep in touch with the voter unless he is literate. The Southborough Committee did not think it "fit to impose any literary test although this course was urged by some witnesses, since this would exclude many electors who are competent to manage their own affairs." But that was hardly a justification for not recognising literacy, especially literacy in English, as a sufficient qualification in itself for voting at elections to the local legislative councils. So far as Sind is concerned, this would not have increased the number of voters to any such inordinate length as to create any practical difficulty. According to the census of 1921, the total number of Muslim literates in Sind above the age of 20, including many who already have a vote, was only 32½ thousands, of which the males numbered only 29 thousands. Among the Sind Hindus the total number of adult literates was only 87 thousands, of which nearly 79 thousands were males. It is, moreover, far more democratic in the conditions prevailing in Sind to enfranchise all the literates than to lower even substantially the property qualification, for the bulk of the people have no proprietary interest in the land. Out of a total population of 32 lakhs, only 52,000 individuals own holdings of more than 25 acres of land; and the number of adults over 20 years of age must be much smaller. Incidentally, the enfranchisement of all literates would act as a great incentive to the spread of education in the country.

Another most glaring defect in the existing arrangement is the almost invidious distinctions between different provinces and between even different districts of the same province in respect of the qualifications for voting. There is no valid reason why the minimum income necessary for a voter at the elections to the Council of State should be 5,000 in Burma, 15,000 in the Punjab, 20,000 in Madras, and 30,000 in Bombay. Similarly, there is no rational explanation available for fixing the necessary minimum income for a vote at the Legislative Assembly elections at Rs. 2,000 in Madras, U.P., C.P., Burma and Bombay and at Rs. 5,000 in Bengal, Delhi and Punjab. Even more unjustifiable than this is the differentiation between Muslims and non-Muslims in Bengal and Bihar in respect of franchise qualifications for elections to the Central Legislature.

Apart from extending the franchise to all literates in rural areas, this Association is not in favour of any further increase in the number of voters in Sind, as the political education of the electorate has not yet been taken in hand seriously even by professional politicians or candidates for election to the councils and as any great extension of franchise would only increase the power of the Zamindar and the rich capitalist to buy votes.

(b) Method of Election.—This Association is not in favour of reversion to the method of indirect elections. While recognising that the Muslim electors in rural constituencies in Sind have been lacking in political sense, they believe that it will be a retrograde step to deprive the councils of the real constituencies to which they are likely to become more and more responsible with the growth of primary education among the masses.

In the opinion of this Association one of the most serious obstacles to the political education of the voters is the existence of communal electorates. There appears to be no justification whatsoever for their continuance, especially in Sind where the Muslims form a majority and the minority community (viz. the Hindus) has never asked for them. Joint electorates and Territorial constituencies, each electing three or four members by means of a single transferable vote, would be a great advance on the existing system which encourages the voter as well as the councillor to think exclusively in terms of his own credal community and which effectively prevents the members of educationally and politically advanced communities from taking in hand the political education of backward communities and from directing their energies to constructive measures for promoting the welfare of the people as a whole rather than that of a particular section of them.

(c) Adequate representation of certain interests.—The existing distribution of seats on the Bombay Council appears to this Association as very inequitable. The excessive representation accorded to the Muslim community at the expense of the other communities admits of no valid justification. For instance, no fair-minded person can tolerate an arrangement under which the Eastern non-Muslim constituency of Hyderabad, Thar and Parkar and Nawabshah districts with a male population of 253,000 and 21,000 electors is given half the representation accorded to the Muslim constituency of Thar and Parkar with a male population of only 139,000 and an estimated number of electors of only 14,000 in 1919 (now reduced to 4,000 only). Neither population, income, property, education, nor commercial and industrial position entitles the Muslims to the number of seats reserved for them at present. Even their so-called political importance cannot be called in aid to justify their existing privileges in this presidency, for excepting in Sind they were not the rulers of any part of it on the eve of the British conquest. Even the Lucknow Pact on which the Southborough Committee based its recommendations has now been scrapped by the All-Parties Conference held recently at Lucknow. No class of people have a right to demand any special privileges based upon the religion of its members; all that a minority can legitimately demand is equality of treatment and a method of election that will ensure its representation in proportion to its real strength in the electorate.

Even if a minority be given any special privileges, it is better to reserve for them seats in proportion to their voters or even their population with liberty to contest any number of general seats. But in that case the proper unit to take is not the province as a whole but a plural constituency or at most a Division. For instance, the Muslims form a majority in Sind and will be in a majority in most of the plural constituencies that can be devised for Sind. There is thus no reason why they should be given the privileges of a minority community in Sind at all. It is the Muslims in a minority in other divisions and the Hindu minority in the rural constituencies of Sind who alone can legitimately claim the concessions due to a minority. It is not Religious Communities as such that are entitled to any concession in matters of political representation, it is only the minorities in different parts or constituencies who can legitimately claim their due share of representation or even exceptional protection. Apart from these fundamental objections to the existing distribution of seats on the Bombay Council, this Association wishes to invite attention to certain facts that demand a change in the existing scheme. The Muslim population of Sind at the Census of 1911, which was taken as the basis by the Southborough Committee, was 26 millions; at the Census of 1921, it was only 24 millions, calling for a reduction in the number of seats reserved for them. The Muslims in the Karachi District were given two seats on the assumption that the number of electors would be about 6½ thousands; as a matter of fact the number of electors at the last election was only 4,030.* Larkana Muslims got three seats on the basis of 14 thousand electors; actually the number is only 10,601.* The Thar and Parkar Muslims were allotted two seats in the belief that the number of their electors would be 14 thousands; the recent figures show the number to be only 4,475 electors.*

Even a casual examination of the relevant figures will reveal the extent of injustice done to the Hindus of Sind by the Southborough Committee. In spite of their admitted superiority in respect of education, wealth and political consciousness, the weight attached to a Hindu vote is much smaller. In the city of Karachi 8,330 Muslim electors have one seat reserved for them as against one seat for 18,057 non-Muslim voters in the same city. Thirteen Muslim seats in rural Sind had only 50,000 electors in all, in spite of a very low qualification for franchise in Upper Sind Frontier District which has a swamping majority of Muslims; the average thus works out to be 3·8 thousand electors per seat. The Thar and Parkar District had two seats for only 4,475 Muslim electors, the average being only 2,238 per seat. But the whole of the non-Muslim Eastern Constituency has been given only one seat, although the number of its electors was estimated at 21 thousands by the Southborough Committee and is at present 24 thousands. Similarly the non-Muslim Western Constituency with its 26 thousand voters is entitled at present to only one seat on the Bombay council.

* See Bombay Council Proceedings, 11th Oct. 1927.

The present distribution of seats is exposed to the charge of inequality of treatment not only between Hindus and Muslims but also between Sind Hindus and Presidency Hindus. The Southborough Committee assigned one seat each to Surat with its 7,000 electors and Sholapur with its 6½ thousand voters but left out the City of Hyderabad with its 12½ thousand electors and the town of Shikarpur with its 8½ thousand voters. East Khandesh Hindus with their voting strength of 33½ thousands were assigned three seats but the Hindus of Sind with their voting strength of 46½ thousands were given only two seats. The average number of electors per non-Muslim seat in the Presidency (except Sind) was estimated to be about 10 thousands. The number of voters in the Eastern constituency for Sind was estimated at 21 thousands and that for the Western constituency at 25½ thousands; while the recent figures show the number of non-Muslim electors in these constituencies to be 24 and 26 thousands* respectively. The highest number of electors for a non-Muslim rural seat (Broach) was 15½ thousands in the Presidency and 25½ thousands in Sind (non-Muslim Western Sind constituency). The lowest number of non-Muslim electors for an urban constituency in the Presidency proper was 7 to 6½ thousands (Surat and Sholapur) and that for a rural constituency was 6 thousands (Satara) as against 13 thousands and 21 thousands respectively for Sind in the year 1918, and 18 thousands and 24 thousands in the year 1926. Judged by the figures quoted above, in order to place on a footing of equality the non-Muslims of the Presidency and those of Sind, the existing distribution of seats should be modified so as to give the urban non-Muslim population of Sind two seats for Karachi and one each for Hyderabad and Shikarpur and the rural non-Muslims at least three seats more.

In the opinion of this Association the urban classes have not been given adequate representation on the various legislatures. The Franchise Committee itself admitted the justice of the principle that the superior standard of wealth and intelligence of the urban population, the larger interest evinced by them in political questions, and their extended experience of the use of franchise justified the representation of urban constituencies on a liberal basis. The Government of India, in their fifth despatch on Indian constitutional reforms, rightly pointed out that "after religion and race, the boundary between town and country is the greatest dividing line that runs through the Indian people. It corresponds closely with the division between progress and conservatism; between English education and vernacular; between experience of self-government and lack of such experience; between the existence of newspapers, professions, bar, libraries, societies etc., and their absence. It is roughly the difference between the old India and the new, the forces that are pressing us forward and those that are holding us back." (Para. 28.) This Association begs leave to point out that the Southborough Committee has made very inadequate allowance for the factors referred to above in the case of India in general and have ignored altogether all these considerations in fixing the seats for Sind Hindus, who are predominantly an urban community in Sind. Out of 104 elected members of the Assembly only 22 represent urban interests as against 82 representing rural classes, though the main taxes of the Central Government, customs and income taxes affect the former more than the latter. The Hindus of Sind, urban as well as rural, have been given only one seat on the Central Legislature. Conditions are no better in the local councils. Far from getting any special consideration because of their urban character, the Hindus of Sind get, as has already been pointed out, much less than their ordinary fair share of the non-Muslim seats in the Presidency as a whole, although they pay nearly 40 per cent. of the land revenues as owners and lessees of land, and the bulk of the Excise and Stamps in Sind.

* See Bombay Council Proceedings, 11th Oct. 1927.

Even the special interests of Sind in commerce, trade and agriculture have not been accorded recognition so far. The Indian Merchants' Chamber of Karachi, which is a growing city of considerable commercial importance, has no seat either on the Bombay Council or the Central Legislature. The Sind Work Merchants of Hyderabad, who are vitally affected by all that pertains to trade and commerce both outside and inside India, have not been accorded representation on any of the councils. The Hindu Zamindars in Sind, who pay nearly 40 per cent. of the land revenue and represent a progressive force in Agriculture, have been ignored altogether.

The Association hopes that the Commission will look into these long-standing grievances of the non-Muslims in Sind and redress the inequality that exists at present.

II. REDISTRIBUTION OF PROVINCES.

This Association is quite aware of the fact that the existing boundaries of different provinces have been determined by accidents; but they desire to emphasise the fact that we are not writing on a clean slate and cannot ignore historical accidents that have built up various ties and associations between the people of the existing provinces during the last 80 to 100 years. An historical accident that has acted as a centripetal force for several generations overcoming separatist tendencies that existed in the past is not to be despised merely because it was a fortuitous accident originally. Any scheme of redistribution that stimulates centrifugal tendencies in India is to be deprecated strongly. There are no smothered nationalities, longing for self-expression in any part of India; and the problem before India at the present moment is not to create new nationalities or to wake up the dying memories of old nationalities but to transfer political power from the British Government to the Indian Nation and to distribute authority from the common centre so as to carry on the administration more effectively and intelligently in the various parts of the country.

It is true that some of the existing provinces are too unwieldy to be ideal units for the successful working of self-governing representative institutions. But the proper time for subdividing such unwieldy provinces as Bengal, Bihar and U. P. does not appear to be near at hand. The need for additional funds for nation-building activities is at present so insistent as to make it very unwise to divert such funds as are available to the increase in the cost of administrative machinery, inevitable in the event of increase in the number of existing provinces. The level of taxation is already too high and any further expenditure on objects that do not tend to increase the taxable capacity of the people would wreck all prospects of trade recovery, economic development and expansion of nation-building departments. On these grounds this Association is opposed to any increase in the existing number of provinces. They would rather reduce the administrative cost by amalgamating some of the existing provinces, wherever possible.

Apart from Military considerations there are no valid reasons for maintaining as separate provinces small, barren and backward areas such as Baluchistan and N. W. F. Province. Nor is the continuance of Delhi, Ajmer-Merwara or even Assam as separate units of administration conducive to the political, economic and educational progress of the people of these areas.

In view of the Muslim demand for the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency and its constitution into a separate province, this Association would like to state briefly their grounds for strongly opposing this demand in particular.

The demand is in its inception frankly communal. Right up to 1920 the Hindus and Muslims of Sind were generally opposed to the separation of Sind and their united demand was for a more integral connection with the Bombay administration by the repeal of that archaic piece of legislation known as the Sind Commissioners Act. There the matter rested till suddenly it was put forward by the All-India Muslim politicians as a condition precedent to their acceptance of joint electorates. There was no logical connection between the two; and the census figures of minority population in different provinces showed clearly that acceptance of joint electorates involved a greater sacrifice on the part of Hindus as a community than what the Muslims would be called upon to make in areas in which they form a minority. Attempts to explain the inward meaning of the Muslims' block demands by some of the leading politicians by a theory of balance of power, of "external" checks, of "Political equipoise," revealed their communal mentality in all its nakedness and showed that the separation of Sind was being demanded with the object of increasing the number of provinces in which the Muslims shall rule as a majority community, thus securing a set off or additional hostages as against the advantage which the Hindus have over the Muslim minorities in other provinces. The dangerous implication of such a basis for national unity can easily be realised; and the Hindus of Sind cannot but oppose strongly a demand that will make them hostages for the good behaviour of Hindus elsewhere. In the opinion of this Association the creation of new provinces primarily or solely with a view to increase the number of provinces in which a particular community shall be in a majority is fraught with danger to the growth of sound nationalism in the country, and will increase the area of communal conflict and endanger the relations between the two communities not only in the area immediately affected but throughout India. The Indian Muslim League laid down in 1924 that no province should be so added to or reorganised as to reduce the Muslim majority into a minority therein; and yet they now propose to transfer the control of Hindus in Sind from the Hindu majority in Bombay to the Muslim majority in Sind by separating Sind from Bombay and constituting it into a separate province. The only wise course in the circumstances of India is that no redistribution of any province should be allowed without the consent of a substantial proportion of at least the two major communities. Unless this is done, communal considerations are bound to influence the demand for redistribution of provinces and seek to divide India into Hindu India and Muslim India.

Attempts have sometimes been made by opportunist politicians to support the Muslim demand on the theory of linguistic redistribution of provinces. Apart from the patent insincerity of this plea in this particular case, this Association considers such a basis for redistribution of provinces detrimental to the growth of nationality in India inasmuch as it will tend to make India a congeries of linguistic nationalities and so stimulate centrifugal forces, impracticable because of the multiplicity of provinces it will lead to and of the intervention of the native states between parts of British India speaking the same language, and highly undesirable from the financial and administrative point of view, for all linguistic areas, even when compact, have neither the financial resources to run modern and progressive administrations nor sufficient political and administrative ability and experience to conduct successfully experiments in responsible Government without the assistance of and association with more advanced communities in the neighbouring areas. Even if the linguistic principle be accepted as a sound principle for the redistribution of provinces, it is not correct to assume that it can legitimately be applied first to Sind. Among the thirteen principal languages arranged in order of importance in para. 195 of the last Census Report, Sindhi does not figure at all. Nor are the financial resources of Sind greater than those of other linguistic regions. Apart from a desire to placate the Muslims, there is no valid reason why even on the linguistic principle the case of Sind should be taken up first.

This Association does not deny that there is an element of truth in the linguistic theory. It may be desirable from an administrative point of view to bring together under one. administration people speaking the same languages but scattered about under two or three different administrations. But this has no bearing on the problem of Sind at all. The Sindhi speaking people are already under one administration.

A common language in a compact area is undoubtedly an administrative convenience. But the administrative Divisions of Bombay are even at present linguistic areas and as such already enjoy this convenience. Sindhi is, so far as possible, even now the medium of instruction in primary and secondary schools in Sind; it is the language of official business and of Law Courts quite to the same extent as it would be in a separate province of Sind; and so far as Sindhi language can correspond to a special variety of culture, traditions and of literature, the administrative connection of Sind with Bombay does not act in any way as an obstacle to its development. Bombay does not propose to interdict the use of Sindhi language or use its political power to force Gujrati or Marathi on the Sindhis. Nor will any reasonable Government in a separate province of Sind forbid the use of Gujrati in the business world of Karachi or as the medium of instruction in the city of Karachi or the District of Thar and Parkar. The transformation of a linguistic Division into a province will bring about no change whatsoever in these respects and therefore the philosophy of linguistic principle sometimes called to the aid of the Muslim demand for the separation of Sind is irrelevant to the main issue.

The primary consideration in questions of this sort should be the welfare of the people of Sind as a whole and their associations at present. A dispassionate examination of the history of Sind during the last 80 years will reveal even to the most superficial observer the immense progress Sind has made during the period of its administrative connection with Bombay. Various ties and associations, administrative, educational, political and social have been built up during this long period of 80 years. Under these circumstances the onus lies heavily on those who assert that in spite of this rapid and substantial progress, of common efforts towards the solution of common problems, of 80 years' historical associations and common sentiments, and notwithstanding the unity of administrative and educational systems, Sind should be separated from the other Divisions of the Bombay Presidency. That burden of proof has never been discharged.

Apart from this negative argument, which alone is quite sufficient to dispose of the Muslim demand for separation of Sind and its constitution into a separate province, many positive arguments point to the conclusion that from the point of view of the people's welfare, it will be very unwise to accede to this demand.

Politically, the step suggested will prove to be a retrograde step. The existing facts of economic and political life in Sind practically rule out the possibility of giving Sind the same form of Government as an advanced province like Bombay has at present or will have in the near future.

The case in support of this statement cannot be put more strongly than in the following paragraphs taken from the memorial which the Sind-Mahommedan Association submitted to the Right Honourable Baron Chelmsford and the Right Honourable Montagu in the year 1918 :—

"Your memorialists do not wish to refer to other parts of India but will confine their observations to Sind. This Province is not yet ripe or ready for democratic Government. Its history, tradition, the heredity and disposition of its peoples, its want of homogeneity or community of interests, social, religious or of any other kind, all point to the other way. Less than a century ago, it was from time immemorial under the rule of a monarchical government. The short time that since elapsed is not sufficient even under the beneficent influence of the benign British Government and the blessings of Western education, to evolve the spirit sentiment, and disposition essential to the success of democratic institutions (para. 4 of the memorial) . . . As regards the method of appointment of the so-called popular representatives on the council, namely by election directly by the people, your memorialists have no hesitation in saying that neither the community they represent nor other Indian communities in the provinces are sufficiently educated and independent to make a right and proper use of this purely exotic method (para. 5 of the memorial). Speaking of our province particularly, and of the relation between the two communities generally, it appears to us that apart from a common homeland and a common language, the two communities have so many conflicting interests that there cannot really be any satisfactory mutual agreement between them which is not safeguarded by legal and constitutional guarantees."

There is no evidence whatsoever that during the decade that has elapsed since this was written, a real revolution has taken place in the conditions of Sind so as to justify the Muslim Associations' demand for a more advanced form of responsible government than what they objected to ten years ago. In point of literacy, the Sind Muslims are not only behind the other people of the Bombay Presidency, but also behind those of even Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier Province. Apart from literacy, it is difficult to think of any effective means of political education in a sparsely populated area such as Sind, with its few cities and extremely inadequate means of communications. Nor is the character of the electorate any way encouraging. Statistics of serious crime in Sind, the testimony of such careful observers as Mr. P. R. Cadell, a retired Commissioner (vide his speech at the last Sind Dinner, London), and the report of the cattle lifting committee including the non-official minutes of dissent—all reveal the stuff of which the electorate in Sind is made. The results of the last three elections show clearly that the Zamindari and reactionary elements will largely dominate the Sind Council and that quite a large percentage of the members will be unfit for real council work. The absence of strong and organised public opinion and a vigilant, fearless, and well informed press in Sind will be another serious handicap in the working of self-governing representative institutions. The policy of differential treatment of various provinces recommended in paras. 142, 198 and 238 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and followed by Parliament in its varying schedules of reserved and transferred subjects indicates that, in the circumstances described above, no case can be made out for transferring to the ministers in Sind the same subjects as are under ministerial control in Bombay.

On the other hand, it is fairly certain that an advanced province like Bombay cannot long be denied full provincial autonomy with ministerial control over practically all departments. The result would be that under a separate Sind Government, the people of Sind will be denied not only the advantage of a further instalment of reforms but also a part of the popular control which they now enjoy in association with the other people of the Bombay Presidency. Moreover, a separate Sind Provincial Government can never have the same influence with the Government of India and the Secretary of State as one of the oldest Presidency Governments like that of Bombay. The conclusion seems irresistible that the constitution of a separate province in Sind will throw it into the category of backward provinces and place it under the control of a reactionary, unprogressive, obscure and petty administration.

The deterioration in the general standard of administration will be no less serious. A small province has necessarily a small cadre of service; it will necessarily offer a lower scale of salaries; at any rate, it will have fewer posts in the higher scale and so it cannot offer adequate scope to able and ambitious men in the services. Undeveloped Sind, which needs the supervision of experts more than any other province, will thus be deprived of the valuable advice and supervision that it now gets from the Bombay headquarters. This is bound to produce deterioration in the various departments of administration; and the loss will be specially serious in the case of education and irrigation.

The financial consequences of separating Sind from Bombay and constituting it into a separate Governor's province will be nothing short of a disaster. One of our members, a reputed economist, estimates the extra cost to Sind in case the proposal is carried into effect at over 1½ crores per year. According to the figures obtained by him from the Accountant-General's office, the total expenditure on Sind, excluding account heads 19—Interest, 21—Avoidance of Debt, and the expenditure in England under the control of the Secretary of State amounted in the year 1927–28 to 470.3 lakhs. Excluding the amounts under account heads 14—Interest on Works for which capital account accounts are kept, 55 minus 16—construction of irrigation work minus the amount paid towards the interest on Sukkur Barrage from the Famine Insurance Fund, and 60—Civil works not charged to revenue, the deficit from Sind amounted to 52 lakhs in 1927–28. Adding five lakhs for famine insurance for a separate province of Sind and another seven lakhs for expenditure in England, the deficit would amount to 64 lakhs, excluding debt charges. The debt charges for a separate province of Sind are estimated at 52 lakhs on the basis of calculation indicated below :—

	Lakhs.
(1) Interest on 3.3 crores, the total sum at charge on irrigation works up to the end of 1915–16 due to the Government of India, the total for the Presidency being 32.8 lakhs in 1927–28	12.15
(2) Interest on 304 lakhs, the irrigation capital expenditure on Sind from 1916 to the end of 1921 (vide figures given in the reply of the Governor of Bombay to a Sind Deputation on the 5th of August, 1922) at 5½ per cent.	16.50
(3) Interest on the funds borrowed for Sind irrigation between 1922–1925 (later figures not available) the increase in sum at charge being 97,28,194	5.00
(4) Interest on the probable share of Sind in the debt for other purposes estimated at one-quarter of the total 437 lakhs (vide the Finance Member's budget speech 1928), at 5½ per cent.	6.00
(5) Repayment and Sinking Fund, except for (1) on the basis of repayment of (2) and (3) in 60 years and repayment of (4) in 30 years ...	10.20
(6) Guarantee of loss given to the Government of India on one feeder railway (4 lakhs in the first 5 years, and 2 lakhs in the second 5 years)	3.00

Assuming the following to be the minimum additional amounts necessary under each of the following heads for a separate Governor's province in Sind, the additional cost on administrative machinery will run up to at least 55 lakhs :—

	Lakhs.
(1) General Administration	18.4
(2) Land Revenue (Survey and Settlement and land records)	3.3
(3) Excise and Stamps (Superintendence only)	.9
(4) Forest (General Direction only) ...	.4
(5) Justice	2.9
(6) Jails (Superintendence only) ...	.6
(7) Police (Superintendence, Special Training School Superintendence, C.I.D.)	1.4
(8) Education (Direction, Special Education and contribution to other Universities)	2.9
(9) Medical (Superintendence and contribution to the Medical College, Bombay)	1.1
(10) Public Health (Direction and Contribution to Vaccine and Pasteur Institutes)	4.5
(11) Agriculture (Superintendence, Research, Propaganda, Development, Veterinary Instruction and Co-operative Department)	3.6
(12) Industries (Direction Superintendence, education, development, etc., only)	.7
(13) Miscellaneous Departments ...	2.0
(14) Increase in Pension charges and Superannuation allowances and expenditure in England	6.0
(15) Interest on initial expenditure on buildings, equipment, etc., etc. ...	5.0
(16) Increase in expenditure due to the creation of more commissionerships and circles for various departments	3.0

The total under all these items comes to 171 lakhs. Allowing a reduction of 21 lakhs for any margin of error in these calculations and for possible retrenchment, the minimum amount that Sind will have to find in addition to its present income works out at Rs. 1½ crore. This means that Sind must double its taxation or rather more than double its income from land revenues and irrigation, there being practically no other source of revenue to tap in Sind.

But matters do not stop here. Sind is one of the least developed parts of India, and needs therefore large development expenditure. It needs, for instance, more irrigation works and better communications. Even if half a dozen railway lines projected at present are taken in hand, the railway authorities would insist on a guarantee of not less than 20 lakhs a year for a number of years, and because this alone will eat up quite an appreciable percentage of Sind's small revenues, railway development in the province will have to be put off indefinitely. It is, therefore, beyond the means of a small administration with slender resources and slender credit in the open market and with the Government of India to develop an area like Sind. A small province, and Sind is much smaller than even Assam, the smallest of the existing Governor's provinces, is from the economic point of view, a very serious handicap in the race for progress. The financial and economic considerations thus tell decisively against the separation of Sind from Bombay.

In addition to these general objections to separating Sind from Bombay, there are special reasons why the Hindus of Sind are stoutly opposed to the proposal. As has been already pointed out, the demand is inspired by a dangerously communal mentality; it has created for that very reason alarm in the Hindu mind; and in the present phase of communal tension in Sind, it is impossible to ignore this psychological factor. Democratic government implies power for the majority; but that majority should be political and not credal. Political power carries with it certain moral obligations; but the majority of the Muslims in Sind are not yet ready to accept the moral obligations of a majority community by giving up their demand for reservation of seats in the Legislature, in the local bodies, in educational institutions and in services. The wishes of a credal majority cannot be justly regarded as sufficient to settle the matter if power is given to it to impose the additional taxation necessitated by separation from the Bombay Presidency in such a manner as to make it fall mainly on the Hindu minority, which not only does not demand separation but is stoutly opposed to it. The Muslim community has as yet offered no guarantees against additional taxation of this sort or against unfair discriminations against the Hindus in the matter of beneficent expenditure on nation-building departments or against vexatious restrictions on their economic freedom. The policy of the local boards in Sind and the mentality of Muslim politicians as revealed by their public utterances clearly proves the dangerous implications of this demand for the separation of Sind, and amply justifies the solid opposition of the Hindus to this proposal.

On all these grounds this Association is strongly opposed to the separation of Sind from Bombay and they feel that they have in this matter practically the entire Hindu community in Sind behind them. For further information on this subject the Association wishes to invite the attention of the Commission to the pamphlets sent herewith.

III. THE SELF-GOVERNING BODIES (Municipalities and District Local Boards).

(a) The Association sees no justification for the introduction of communal representation on the local bodies and feel that it has accentuated communal differences in Sind. They desire its early abolition as an essential step in National evolution, and urge that a clause be introduced in the Government of India Act, preventing provincial legislatures from introducing communal representation and separate electorates in the local bodies. The interests of minorities can easily be safeguarded by the system of a single-transferable vote and by the creation of a special machinery to investigate complaints of unfair treatment of minorities or of charges of maladministration on the demand of a certain minimum number of members of the Legislative Council, with ample powers to enforce its decisions.

(b) This Association is of opinion that there is a grave danger of deterioration in primary education if the experiment of transferring practically the entire control of primary education to the District Local Boards is persisted in, and that the older system of control and administration by the Education Department, now under ministerial control, is likely to give better and quicker results with the same amount of funds as are intended to be released for primary education. For the same reason, they are not in favour of relaxing the control of the provincial medical department in matters relating to medical aid and administration specially in rural areas. They feel that it is very necessary to put a stop to the temptation to abuse the power of patronage in the matter of appointments carrying a salary of Rs: 100/- p. m. and over, and would suggest the creation of one cadre of service for all the local bodies to be recruited by a special Appointment Board, or failing that a system under which the choice of the appointing authority is restricted to a panel of candidates recommended by independent Selection Boards.

IV. THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

In the opinion of this Association, the system of divided responsibility, the existence of official block and communal representation have proved to be serious obstacles to the success of the experiment in responsible government in the provinces. Unless all these three hindrances are removed, no real advance in this direction is possible.

In the present circumstances, it is not possible to evolve political parties, to give real power to a Provincial Legislature to choose its executive and have full control over its Cabinet, and to create a sense of joint responsibility among the members of the Cabinet.

This Association is not a believer in unrestricted provincial autonomy. India is and must remain one; and the Central Government must be clothed with sufficient authority to prevent internal disruption, unhealthy provincialism and intolerant communalism. It must continue to be the supreme unifying authority in all matters in which unity is a help to national progress and should be free to step in, whenever and wherever Provincial Governments cannot effectively promote national welfare or are likely to dissipate their resources in unnecessary duplication. It must, in no case, be reduced to a mere military and revenue collecting agency or divested completely of its ultimate responsibility for the moral and the material progress of India. Local governments should have freedom, where freedom is a help and not a hindrance to the progress of India as a whole. Such an arrangement is not capable of being defined rigidly; it can only grow by understandings and traditions in accordance with the varying needs of a growing nation. Legally, the Central Government in India should have full power to make laws for peace, order and good government of the whole country as is provided for in section 59 of the South African Constitution. Legally, it should not be prevented from doing what the Federal Government in Germany can do, viz., "to establish uniform rules for the promotion of social welfare and for the protection of public order and safety" (Article 9), "to prescribe by law fundamental principles concerning the rights and duties of religious associations, education including higher education, libraries for scientific use," "the land law, the distribution of land, settlements, and homesteads, restriction on landed property housing and distribution of population," (vide Article 10) "to prevent imposition of excessive burdens in restraint of trade, tax discrimination against the products of the other provinces" (vide Article 11), and to insist on every Indian having "the same rights and duties" in every province as the residents of that province (vide Article 110) and on "all citizens without distinction being eligible for public services in accordance with the laws and according to their ability and services" (vide Article 128). How much of all this will in practice fall into disuse depends as much on the use which different provinces make of their opportunities to promote the welfare of their people as on the dynamic force of the Central Government. But on no account should the Central Government allow a backward province to live a life of isolation from the general march of progress or bring the country to the verge of a civil war by communal tyranny or discriminations against other provinces.

V. THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

But if the Central Government is to discharge these beneficent functions efficiently it cannot remain irresponsible to the Central Legislature for any length of time. A representative legislature and an irresponsible executive cannot work together in harmony. A reversion to the past is out of the question; the only alternative is to concede an advance in the direction of responsibility of the executive to the legislature. Few politicians claim the transfer of the military and the political departments at the present moment. An impartial Tariff Board can easily ensure the same treatment to British trade and industry as is accorded to them by Dominion Governments. The interests of British capitalists already in India can be easily protected by constitutional guarantees and the institution of a special tribunal to investigate complaints of unfair discrimination against them and to advise the Viceroy to exercise his veto in any particular case. With a second Chamber, properly constituted, it should not be difficult to protect minority interests and prevent the passing of any measure in haste. If India is to be conciliated, a substantial measure of responsibility in the Central Government must be conceded; otherwise the country will drift on to a state of affairs that will be a serious menace not only to the British Government but also to those elements of India's population that are anxious for its peaceful evolution towards a great democracy.

X. THE SERVICES.

A country so vast, so undeveloped and so backward as India is, needs for its public services men who are not only very able but also progressive and patriotic. It is impossible to get such men except by open competitive examinations without any reservation in favour of any particular caste, colour or creed. The Civil Service in India must be loyal to no smaller unit than the nation; it must not therefore be recruited on any principles that encourage its members to think of themselves primarily as members of a particular race, creed or caste. For a long time to come, India would need Englishmen of first rate ability, not so much for the purposes of ordinary administration but for development departments. But they must come through an open door and not by a reserved gate, on terms of equality with other competitors and not on specially privileged terms. They must be inspired by a passion to serve India and help her to become a worthy partner in the British Commonwealth. With British Universities so well staffed and equipped, there is no danger whatsoever of Englishmen failing to get through an open door quite a substantial share of the highly-paid posts in India. And times are gone when first rate Indians were available on much smaller pay than Englishmen. The present system of fixing percentage in services for Englishmen only makes them special targets for attack, and creates a sense of righteous indignation against their privileged position among the ablest and the most sensitive Indians. If all the highly-paid posts go to the best men, all talk of Indianization or Europeanization will automatically cease. The vicious communal basis for recruitment of services, of which so much has been said already, will likewise disappear.

The principle of recruiting services on the basis of merit and merit alone implies that the Ministers must have no patronage in their hands and that a Public Services Commission, properly constituted should be the only recruiting authority in the case of all important posts.

KARACHI.

Dated 13th November, 1928.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND) AND OF THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the ALL-SIND HINDU ASSOCIATION.

The deputation consisted of—

1. Professor H. L. Chablani, M.A., Head of Economics Department and Dean of the Faculty of Arts, Delhi University.

2. Rao Bahadur Hiranani Khemsingh, B.A., LL.B., Zamindar and Ex-President Hyderabad (Sind) Municipality.

3. Mr. Dialmal Doulatram, B.A., LL.B., Ex-Sessions Judge.

4. Mr. M. L. Chablani, M.A., Principal, Model High School, Karachi.

5. Seth Swoukatrai Vehromal, Merchant.

6. Mr. Harchandrai Tahilram, President District Local Board, Tatta Division and Ex-President of Tatta Municipality.

7. Mr. Mulchani Kauromal, President Sahti Community.

8. Seth Chellaram of Shikarpuri Community.

9. Mr. Bhagvandas Ahuja, Merchant.

10. Mr. P. T. Advani, Zamindar and Miller.

11. Dr. D. G. Advani, D.P.H., L.M., L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S., Secretary, All-Sind Hindu Association.

1. Chairman : I understand, gentlemen, that the principal spokesman of the deputation is Professor Chablani ?—Yes.

2. We know that you are a Professor of the Delhi University. I understand, sir, that you come from Hyderabad ?—I am a resident of Hyderabad and I have also a house at Karachi.

3. Among others there are also here Dr. Advani, who is the Secretary of the All-Sind Hindu Association, Mr. R. B. Hiranani, ex-President of the Hyderabad Municipality, a lawyer of Hyderabad, Mr. Dialmal Daulatram, retired Sessions Judge, and other gentlemen whose names we have before us. There seem to us, Professor Chablani, to be two main compartments in your memorandum, and I had better consult the Conference as to whether they had better be dealt with in turn. One has to do with the position of the Hindu community, its representation and so on in Sind, and the other has to do with the very difficult question of the possible separation of Sind. Is that not so ?—Yes, sir. There are some other general points also relating to the whole of India.

4. Yes, but we are rather anxious sitting here in Karachi to consider in the first instance at any rate these two matters, and I will include what you refer to as the general constitutional position under the first head. To begin with, would you like, Professor Chablani, to deal with the general constitutional considerations leaving over the question of separation of Sind, or would you like to deal with the separation of Sind first ?—I would like to deal with the general questions first.

5. Chairman : Would you like to address us shortly first ?—Yes, sir. At the very outset I would like to remove a possible misconception as to the object of the contents of the first five pages of the memorandum. We have mentioned various particulars showing the position of the Hindu minority in Sind not with a view to recall the unhappy past, but with a view to indicate how the public administration of this country has been affected by the vicious principle of communalism and how necessary it is to provide safeguards against the recurrence and the repetition of the events that have happened in Sind during recent years. That is the object of the first part of the memorandum. So far as our Association is concerned, our general position is exactly the same which, sir, you yourself mentioned to be the object of this parliamentary enquiry, namely, to render justice between man and man. These various incidents have been referred to only to emphasise that justice between man and man has not been the ideal of the present administration in recent years, and that that excellent maxim has been departed from with disastrous consequences. We ask for no special privileges for the Hindu minority in Sind. We only ask for equality between all the citizens of the State. In the matter of franchise, we wish some glaring anomalies to be removed. We wish that the income qualification laid down for the non-agriculturist population should be made equivalent to the land-revenue qualification laid down for the agriculturists. We wish that the Hindu agriculturists of Thar and Parkar districts should be placed on a footing of equality with the Muslim agricultural element in the Upper Sind Frontier.

6. Chairman : May I just ask you to explain one phrase you used to save time ? You said that you wished that the income-tax qualification should be made equivalent to the land-revenue qualification. I imagine that that can be done in more ways than one. What is the practical step which you would recommend ?—We can come to an agreement as to the possible and probable income of agriculturists paying a certain amount of land-revenue, and we know the income of people who pay taxes based on income. The same possession of property or income ought to entitle the people to the same privilege. That is our point.

7. Professor, I want you to give us a practical application ?—For example, the payment of Rs. 32 of land revenue is a qualification in the rural areas for agriculturists. Generally twice the land revenue is supposed to be the profit of the agriculturist. But in some of the areas probably it goes up to four times. Taking the maximum four times 32 makes 128. A man with an income of Rs. 128 whether an agriculturist or a non-agriculturist, should therefore be entitled to vote.

Similarly, sir, we want that the land revenue qualification in Thar and Parkar should be reduced to Rs. 16 as is done in the Upper Sind Frontier, for precisely the same reasons for lowering the franchise exist in both the cases.

Then, sir, we wish that education by itself should be given some importance and weight in accordance with the maxim laid down in paragraph 225 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, a reference to which we have made on page 230 of our memorandum.

So far as the electorate is concerned, our position is that only joint electorates are compatible with responsible government. We wish the voter to think in terms of the common weal. We wish the representative of voters to be judged by his service to the common weal. We wish that members of advanced communities should have the privilege and the opportunity to educate backward communities in the exercise of their political power. We wish that the ministry should have a joint responsibility. And we think that these things are not possible so long as we have separate electorates.

So far as reservation of seats is concerned we feel that reservation in favour of a majority is inconsistent with responsible government. Responsible government implies a replaceable majority and a removable executive. If you fix by statute the proportion of a majority community, that majority can never be turned into a minority nor the executive turned out of office. The opportunity to the minority to convert itself into a majority by political propaganda is an essential process in responsible government—a process which is lacking in the present system, and hence we propose that under no circumstances should there be reservation for the majority community.

We oppose excessive representation for any minority community, but if the principle of excessive representation be adopted for any particular minority, it should be extended to all. We wish that equal weight be given to a Hindu voter or a Mahomedan voter. At present, our special grievance is that we are treated on a different footing from the presidency Hindus as well. We want no special privileges for ourselves; we want equality before the law and the public administration of the country. That, sir, is the general position of the Hindu community in Sind.

So far as Provincial Governments are concerned, our association is against diarchy and in favour of provincial autonomy in the subjects classed as provincial, but we are not believers in the millennium of unrestricted provincial autonomy. We believe that the Central Government should have some reserve powers. We have mentioned in our memorandum what we consider as irreducible legal power which the Central Government should possess.

Regarding the division of functions between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments, we are very anxious that the line of approach adopted should not be influenced by communal considerations. We think that the line of approach, so far as the division of functions is concerned, ought to be the supreme test of public welfare, and not the consideration that the Central Legislature will have a Hindu majority. So far as the Central Government is concerned, our position is that some element of responsibility—and that a considerable one—ought to be conceded. All legitimate objections can be met if only the objections are clearly stated. If the fears of certain communities are reduced to a definite shape or form, it is not difficult to devise adequate safeguards.

So far as the services are concerned, our position is that the services must be national in outlook. Its members must not think that they are in office because they belong to a particular community or that they are expected to serve the interests of a particular community. We wish therefore that the appointments should be in the hands of the Public Service Commission and that no distinction of race, colour or creed should be made.

That, sir, is briefly the position so far as the general case is concerned.

8. Chairman: Thank you for the summary Turning to page 229 of your document, I see there are a number of suggestions made, and I should like to ask you one or two questions on these. "(a) Communal representation and separate electorates for the Legislative Council be abolished at least in all districts and divisions in which the Muslims form a majority of the population or of the voters." Is your proposal that this should be the rule if the Mussulmans form either the majority of the population or the majority of the voters, or are these two different schemes?—We have simply mentioned two possible alternatives; we are only indicating what is the possible line of approach.

9. It is not sufficient to find out the possible lines of approach, but we would like to know how far you will be able to guide us down on the right line. Which of the two alternatives you would advocate?—So far as we are concerned, we would favour the test of voters.

10. I will just ask you a question to ascertain the fact. Do you know, on the present voting list of Sind, whether Hindus or Mahomedans are a larger total?—The Hindus are slightly in excess of the Mahomedans, the former having 67,000 voters and the latter 60,800. I think in the Press report of yesterday's proceedings, the figure for Mahomedan voters given was 59,000, which is a mistake.

11. We got the figures from official sources.—Mine too are from official sources. Government in reply to an interpellation in the Bombay council supplied the figures I rely on.

Chairman: If you think that there is some mistake, we will be grateful if you will send us a little memorandum showing what the mistake is.*

12. You say that "No minority be given representation on the legislature in excess of its equitable share on the basis of a uniform principle applicable to all communities." Do I understand rightly that this means that representation in the legislature must in every case be strictly in proportion either to the voting strength or the population strength of each community?—Yes, sir. What I submit is that if a particular minority fears that it has no chance of being represented through the general open seats, all that it has got a right to ask for is representation in proportion to its voters and nothing more.

13. Supposing there are two communities and votes are divided between them. If the minority community is to get a figure which is exactly in proportion to its strength, it would follow that the majority community would also get a figure which is exactly in proportion to its strength. Is not that so?—Yes. But the minority has to thank itself for the consequences resulting from a permanent communal majority.

14. You will then leave it to the choice of the minority?—Yes.

15. Would you mind referring to clause (f) on page 230 of your memorandum? You say that "adequate constitutional safeguards be provided for preventing discriminations against any individual" in various matters that you mention therein. When you say "adequate constitutional safeguards" do you mean a section in the Imperial Act of Parliament?—Yes.

16. I can imagine what is in your mind. There should be a section in the Imperial Act of Parliament saying that notwithstanding the powers conferred upon legislatures or elective bodies, any law or regulation which discriminates in the way described is beyond their powers?—Yes.

17. That being in the constitutional instrument, recourse would have to be had to law courts by anybody who, right or wrong, wants to challenge any law as ultra vires ?—Yes, sir.

* Vide Appendix, pp. 246–7.

18. I can see the importance and value of this suggestion, but I should fear that such an arrangement would lead to a good deal of litigation ?—It is not an easy job to go to law courts; the question of expense always comes in.

19. I am not in the least condemning the scheme. We are considering it very very carefully. I only wanted to know whether you do not think that there is the possibility of this leading to a very great deal of litigation ?—Possibly, but we can trust to the force of public opinion as a corrective.

20. Lord Strathcona : On page 228 of your memorandum, towards the bottom of the second paragraph, you say " the officials in Sind have been pursuing a determined policy of discrimination against the Hindus and of favouritism to the other communities." Is that an accusation against British officials or against British and Indian officials ?—Both.

21. Do you make that accusation against the present day officials ?—The position in the last two or three years has slightly changed for the better so far as certain departments are concerned.

22. Still you make the accusation against the present-day officials ?—Yes, taking everything into consideration.

23. Lord Burnham : I want you to clear up one point that has been made. In reference to the validity of the statute law when it is passed and the prohibitions such as I understand you wish to put into the constitutional arrangements that are made, are you in favour of an appeal from the legislature to the law courts for enforcing the safeguards for minorities which you want to be inserted ?—I submit that my suggestions have to be taken together. Ordinarily, people would not like to go to the law courts. Probably they would like to have the protection afforded by a commission of enquiry and that would suffice ordinarily.

24. Why should it suffice when many countries that have popular institutions, for example, the United States, have as a matter of common concern appeals against the validity of law, for instance, both against the Congress and the State legislatures ? Would you make the protection of minorities dependent on the supremacy of the law court over the legislature ?—Yes.

25. Colonel Lane-Fox : Do you suggest that any appointment to any post should be the subject of litigation ?—It would not be if the Public Service Commission makes the recruitment. But if the local legislature constitutes a Public Service Commission with certain conditions, for instance, suppose it lays down that seats should be reserved for particular communities irrespective of the superior qualifications of the other persons, surely that ought to be contested in law courts; but, ordinarily, if recruitment is by the open door of competitive examination conducted by the Public Service Commission, then there will be no need for any litigation.

26. Do you suggest that the recommendations of the Public Service Commission should be subject to appeal in the law courts ?—No; what I have in mind is that sometimes the discretion of the Public Service Commission is fettered by the legislature. Whenever the legislature tries to fetter the discretion of the Public Service Commission then the validity of that should be contested in the law courts; not otherwise.

27. Major Attlee : On page 230 of your memorandum you say : " Any great extension of franchise would only increase the power of the Zamindar and the rich capitalist to buy votes." That implies, does it not, that votes are being bought at present ?—To a certain extent it is so.

28. To what extent ?—At present it is not a great scandal, but there is some truth in the reports one hears occasionally.

29. If we increase the electorate, will votes not be more difficult to buy ?—It is more paying to buy, especially if you have got large numbers of men who have the vote and are at the mercy of the Zamindar.

30. It has been stated to us that the poorer classes of the rural population are at present in the hands of the moneylenders; is that true ?—I think both the moneylenders and the poorer classes are at the mercy of the Zamindar in Sind.

31. How is the moneylender in the hands of the zamindar ?—The moneylender lives in isolated villages and he wants the protection of the Zamindar. He cannot carry on his business without the protection of the Zamindar.

32. Then the Zamindar and the moneylender are in alliance ?—Yes. It is an alliance of a slave to his master.

33. But the poor agriculturist is at the mercy of both ?—Certainly.

34. And you would not give him a vote ?—Not that I would not give him a vote. I want that certain rights should be conferred on him first so that he can use his vote well.

35. What safeguards do you suggest ?—Let the council consist of men who will sympathise with the poor agriculturist. Limit the size of the holding of the Zamindar and confer tenancy rights on the poor agriculturist in Sind.

36. How will that help against the moneylender ?—Of course, you have to provide safe investments for his money. In fact, the moneylender is not anxious to lend money to the Hari in Sind for he has no stake in the land. He is anxious to invest it better if he can. It is the want of suitable investments that makes him resort to human exploitation.

37. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : I understand that most members of the deputation belong to the Hyderabad Amil class ?—No; only five of them.

38. You say in your memorandum that the bania in the village is not safe. Have you got instances where the bania in a village has ever complained against the zamindar ? Who guaranteed him protection in that case ?—Whole villages are being evacuated by the banias owing to a feeling of insecurity created by zabardast zamindars.

39. Have you got any instances of that ?—Of course.

40. Will you kindly quote them ?—For instance, the village of Serani in Badui where a representation was sent to the Collector.

41. Kindly give us two or three instances.

Chairman : Do you want individual names to be mentioned ?

42. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : I want one or two instances of places where this thing has occurred ? —The Mangwani village, Nawabshah.

43. You say that the moneylender is not willing to lend money but is forced by circumstances to lend money. Do you know that most of the moneylenders within the last ten or fifteen years made fortunes by earning lakhs and lakhs ? They are worth half a crore now while they started with an income of only Rs. 10 per month ?—I am not aware of any such instances. Even if there be one, he may owe his property not to moneylending but to his trade.

44. Whereas they started only with an income of Rs. 10 a month they are now worth lakhs and lakhs ?—I am not aware of the history of any man who started with an income of Rs. 10 a month and earned a fortune by moneylending in Sind.

* * * * * * * * * * *

46. You have mentioned in your memorandum about the Larkana riot. We are not going to dispute about that. But you will admit that whether it was right or wrong, the riot lasted only for twenty minutes ?—We are not aware that it lasted only for twenty minutes.

47. Are you aware that almost all the officials who investigated the case were Hindu gentlemen and most competent officials too ? For instance, Mr. Ramnath was the sub-inspector, Pratabh Chand, inspector; the prosecuting inspector was a Hindu ?—Who was the committing magistrate ? A Muslim. —Who was the district magistrate ?

48. Please reply to my question. The investigating officers were all Hindu gentlemen?—Mr. Barker was not a Hindu.

49. The sub-inspector was a Hindu. The public prosecutor was a Hindu?—There was a Muslim superior officer. My contention is that there is a suspicion of political pressure behind.

50. Have you got any proof to support your allegation?—The very resolution of the Muslim Association quoted in the Appendix to our memorandum proves it.

51. They passed a resolution?—Yes.

52. And this was a result of that resolution?—Yes.

53. Nothing beyond that?—My whole point is that the public confidence in the judiciary has been weakened by this incident. I do not like to mention names. But the fact remains that a big riot took place in broad daylight in a district headquarter town and no one has been convicted.

54. Chairman: Surely the point for us is that you are speaking on behalf of your deputation desiring to represent the feelings of your community; that is a fact?—Yes.

55. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: You know that three or four Muslims died in jails and it cost Rs. 80,000 and the accused were honourably acquitted?—I am not here to answer questions relating to such facts.

56. You have made certain allegations in your memorandum?—All I have stated is that in broad daylight one man was killed and about one hundred people looted and there was not one man who was punished and that this reflects great discredit on the police and the judiciary.

57. Since the British raj came I think about 22 lakhs of acres of land have passed to the Hindus, that is, during the last 80 years, while they had only a few thousands of acres before?—I have not come here to answer questions relating to the transfer of land.

58. You will not say you have not been prosperous?—That has been in spite of the circumstances, not because of them.

59. You do possess now land to the extent of 22 lakhs of acres?—We possess about 28 per cent. of the land which is not more than the population ratio.

60. You monopolise the services? About 75 per cent. in all the services are Hindus?—We do not monopolise the services. The police is not monopolised by us; the education department is not monopolised by us.

61. Does not the very fact that your voting strength is greater than the Muslims show that during the last 80 years your community has prospered more than the Muslims?—Is it our fault that we have prospered and the Muslims have not?

62. Your voting strength is greater than that of the Muslims?—We are more enterprising. We are educated far more than the Muslims and our complaint is that the backward community tries to arrest our progress in every way and to bring us under their control.

63. Would you please tell us what is the percentage of the Hindus in services such as the Public Works Departments and Forests?—I am not acquainted with the percentages in each department. I have not investigated into it.

64. I wanted to get at this point. You have mentioned about the United Provinces. I have got the figures for the United Provinces and they show that the minority community there enjoy about 16 per cent. of the posts in the subordinate services and 40 per cent. in the executive, while the figures in Sind show that you enjoy 75 per cent. Do any other minority in India enjoy as much percentage as they do here?—My contention is that whereas in the United Provinces there is no decree of Government restricting the right of Muslims to enter the services, here in Sind we have a decree passed by the executive preventing the recruitment of the Hindus into the services above a particular ratio. While there is no ratio fixed for the Muslim minority in the United Provinces, we have here certain measures restricting admission of Hindus into the services.

65. Chairman: I wish you just to give me an instance of that. You speak of the authorities laying down a ratio? Is that for Sind?—Yes.

66. What is it?—Government have ordered that the Muslims should be represented in a particular ratio in certain departments.

67. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: May I know where it has started, in which department?—In almost every department. The directions are there, they are to the effect that 50 per cent. of the men should be recruited from the Muslim community.

68. But you will admit that that only remains on paper and if you compare the figures of 20 years back with the present figures you will find that there is no difference in the matter of recruitment of the two communities?—That is because few Mahomedans, even with minimum qualifications, are available.

69. And yet you cry?—I protest against this policy of discrimination against capable Hindus.

70. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto: You have mentioned some quotations from some unknown persons regarding Mr. Brown and Mr. Rieu?—I did not know that Messrs. Abdur Rahman and Abdul Majid were unknown persons in Sind.

71. Are there not such irresponsible people in your community, and do not they belong to the extremist class of people?—At any rate I do not protect them.

72. You say in your statement that Muslim members in the Bombay legislative council have been taking advantage of their position in bargaining with Government in their own individual and communal interests. What is your authority for that statement? Can you give me any instances where they have bargained with the Government?—It is a matter of common knowledge. There can be no legal proof in matters of this sort.

73. But you can give no instance?—I can give several.

74. Give me one please?—The modules scheme was abandoned because of the political pressure of the big Muslim zamindars in the council.

75. Was the modules scheme given up in the interests of Muslims or in the interest of zamindars?—It was given up in the interest of big zamindars at the upper end of the canal, mostly Muslims, and at the cost of the poor agriculturist at the tail.

76. There are big Hindu zamindars as well?—A few. But that does not prove that political pressure was not used to have it cancelled.

77. Supposing for argument's sake that it is so, are not the Hindu community 40 per cent. strong in Sind?—I repeat that it was all due to communal and individual pressure. If the Commission sends for the records of the case, I believe there will be startling revelations.

78. But this does not amount to communal or individual pressure?—Certainly. Besides it is notorious that certain appointments were made under pressure of certain individual members of the council.

79. So far as the reforms go, will you admit that the reforms have proved successful due to the co-operation of Mussalmans and because of their not creating obstacles in the way of Government? So you call that fact, namely, their not creating any obstacles in the way of Governement, a bargain?—Well, there may be two opinions about that. Government fell into the hands of Muslims because the Swarajists refused to take office.

80. You say that there is rather a disproportionate representation of Mahomedans in service here, but the figures I have got here rather go to disprove that statement. Do you know how many deputy superintendents you have got in the police department? I cannot say.

81. But you have got there your proper share, more than the Mussalmans?—We have not got our proper share in the police department.

82. But the Civil List shows that you have got more number?—But the Civil List will also show you several capable Hindus have been superseded by inferior Muslims, and not one Hindu from Sind has been appointed by direct recruitment as deputy collector during the last thirty years or so. That is enough to prove my point.

83. Do you know that only two days back for the sub-inspectors' posts out of fifteen, ten Hindus have been selected ?—I am not aware of that. I have not been taken into confidence by the police department.

84. You complained of district local boards. Will you kindly tell me how many Muslim chief officers there are in municipalities in Sind ?—I do not care twopence whether a Mussalman or a Hindu is the chief officer. I want to know if Hindus highly qualified have been rejected or not by the district local boards only because they were Hindus. Can you give a single instance of a capable Muslim having been passed over by a municipality in order to provide a berth for an inferior Hindu ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : There is not a single Mahomedan, sir, as chief officer in any municipality in Sind.

85. Chairman : The chief officer is what we call in England Town Clerk ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : He is the chief executive officer.

86. Chairman : Does he hold office more or less permanently ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : Yes, sir.

87. Chairman : How many municipalities are there in Sind ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : There are about five major municipalities.

88. Chairman : And in charge of each of which there is a chief officer ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : Yes.

89. Chairman : And you make the observation that out of these chief officers, none of them are Mussalmans ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : Yes, sir. At the same time, there is this complaint about the district local boards.

90. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : May I know, sir, what is the duty of the chief officer ? Is it laid down in the Municipal Act ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : The municipality appoints the chief officer.

91. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : The appointment is made by Government in the municipality of Bombay ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : Yes.

92. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : What are his duties ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : He is the chief executive officer in the municipality.

93. Chairman : I gather that Khan Bahadur's point is this. What he says is there are five major municipalities in Sind, and, notwithstanding the fact of the Muhammadan predominance when it comes to selecting a chief officer, they have in each case got a chief officer, who is not a Mussalman, but probably a Hindu. Is that your point ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : Yes.

Witness : Muslims do not predominate in the municipalities. The municipalities have got a majority of Hindu and a minority of Mussalman population.

94. Chairman : Your real point then, Professor, is this, that however that may be you would contend that the best and the most qualified man has a right to be appointed—Precisely so, sir.

95. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : How many Hindu chief officers are there in district local boards ? —Some of them have been practically thrust on the local boards by Government ?

Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : Certainly not. Jacobabad has selected its own; Larkana has elected its own. What I wanted to bring out, sir, by my question was this, that the Mussalmans having a majority in district local boards have appointed five Hindu chief officers out of seven districts, whereas there is not a single Mussalman as chief officer in municipalities where the majority is Hindu. So I say we have been treating them very fairly.

Chairman : Do you mind my saying that really I think we fully appreciate both points of view ?

96. Khan Bahadur S. N. Bhutto : If you want me to, sir, I shall drop these points. I find various allegations made in the memorandum unsupported by facts. (To the witness) : The Hindu officers that you complain of were already in Government service and they had been lent to district local boards by Government ?—As a matter of fact, the local boards refused to accept them as administrative officers of school boards, even though Government offered to pay their salaries for some years, only because they were Hindus.

97. But the Muslims taken up were already in service, and they were lent by Government ?—They were made to supersede the Hindus above them in the cadre of service.

98. As regards your inadequate representation from Sind in the council, is it not a fact that the Mussalmans of Sind have consented to give certain concessions to the Mussalmans in the presidency ? On the same principle the Hindus in the presidency are not giving similar concessions to the Sind Hindus ?—No; I am not aware of any concession by the Mussalmans of Sind. I thought the Presidency Muslims got more from the Southborough Committee.

99. The Mussalman population in Sind is over 24 lakhs and in the presidency is 13 lakhs. So to help their own Mussalman brethren in the presidency they decided on having half and half. Would the Hindus do that ?—I do not know if there was any negotiation between the two sections of the Mussalmans.

100. They were recommendations made by Government ?—They were not recommendations made by the two sections of the Mussalmans.

101. Sardar Mujumdar : Professor, what should in your opinion be the basis of franchise ?—I have already mentioned it; some kind of property or income qualification, and education by itself.

102. If literacy were the basis of franchise, as you say ?—Not the only basis, I have mentioned both income and education.

103. But would that help to advance education ?—Certainly, it will be an incentive to people to educate themselves, if education by itself is recognised as a sufficient qualification.

104. What is the relation between land revenue and the zamindari income in Sind ?—It is in the ratio of 2 to 1, generally, and 4 to 1 in some parts.

105. Is it a fact that the Hindus are taxed more by some of the district and taluka boards in Sind ?—Yes. The presidency local boards have doubled their local cess for the purpose of finding additional funds for education, but in Sind they raised it by only 25 per cent. The rest of the burden they attempted to throw on non-agricultural incomes and they devised the professional tax in such a way as to make the incidence fall on Hindus and not on the Mussalmans.

106. Dr. Suhrawardy : Am I right in saying that the Hindus predominate in most of the services in Sind ?—In some departments, but not in all the branches.

107. In some departments the Mahomadans are predominating in the services ?—Yes; for example, the police.

108. If I am not mistaken, you said that your complaint is that the backward community is a drag on the whole of the province ?—Yes.

109. If you were at the head of the administration, and if you have absolute authority over appointments, what would you do to remove this drag of the backward community on your province ?—I would give education. I would certainly go in for rapid economic development and for better means of communication in Sind.

110. In other words, you would give special facilities for education to the backward communities. You will also give them some facilities for getting a share in the services ?—No; I will give every facility to everybody who is too poor to educate himself.

111. You will give them special educational facilities?—I will give that to all poor men, no matter to what community they belonged.

112. But you have a Muslim population here which is in a majority and they are backward, and you have also said that the backward communities are a drag on the whole of your province. As the head of the administration how are you going to get over it?—A. When I remove the economic disabilities, I do it for all.

113. I am speaking of the backward community? —Surely the backward community would profit most by such an arrangement because it has a much larger number of poor individuals. But, it is the poor man as such and not as a Hindu or a Muslim who will be the object of my care.

114. You will give to the Mussalman community the most?—I would not exclude any poor man.

115. But you said they are a drag on your province? —They are.

116. In reply to a question by Major Attlee you admitted that votes are sold in municipal elections?—I never said that everywhere they are sold.

117. I did not say everywhere, but somewhere?—There are occasionaly cases of that sort.

118. Can you tell me when such buying and selling takes place? Is it just on the eve of the election, or a few months before the election? Have you any experience of that?—I have not been an electioneering agent myself. I cannot say.

119. I am not asking you whether you are an electioneering agent or not. I only want your view on the question. Is it a fact that the market value of the votes increases as the election draws near and that sometimes for buying votes money is advanced by moneylenders?—I am not aware of that.

120. You are for the abolition of separate electorates and you want joint electorates in Sind. Is it out of pure love for an ideal or because you think that the abolition of separate electorates will result in the return of Hindus to the legislature in larger numbers than the Mahomedans?—I do not care whether a Hindu or a Mahomedan gets into the legislature, so long as vigorous and capable men with a non-communal outlook get elected.

121. You are for vigorous men. But I want to know whether as a result of the abolition of communal electorate, Hindus will be worse than they are to-day? —So far as the mofussil in Sind is concerned I feel they would probably be worse off because the mofussil people are illiterate and rural Sind is dominated by Muslim zamindars. The Mahomedan zamindars will seldom allow votes to be given to a Hindu candidate.

122. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Professor, I understand you to mean that so far as your community is concerned you are anxious to preserve a high standard of efficiency in the public services?—Certainly.

123. And you wish to ensure an equal chance to all communities commensurate with their ability, efficiency and experience?—Certainly.

124. You wish to give the backward communities no privilege merely because they are a backward community?—No.

125. The result of it would be that the backward community will rule over the advanced community and with their lower standard degrade public life and public institutions. Is that what you mean?—Yes.

126. As regards the backward community you [illegible] to give them special facilities, otherwise they have[illegible]main always backward?—I would give facilities will re[illegible] backward individual no matter to what to every [illegible]he belongs. I will not, for instance, community [illegible] Hindu who is handicapped by poverty exclude a poo[illegible] himself merely because he belongs to from educating [illegible]munity.
an advanced com[illegible]ust recognise that there is such a

127. But you m[illegible] aptitude—certain communities thing as congenital have aptitude for certain work which other communities do not possess?—But nurture can do even more than nature. If education was open to all poor people and provided by the State, it will at the most take only a few years for the backward communities to come up to the level of advanced communities.

* * * * * * * * * * *

128. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Professor, will you look at page 228 of your Memorandum? You say in paragraph 3, "In the opinion of this Association, the principle of communal representation and separate electorates is incompatible with the conceptions of nationality * * *" India has got a peculiar position you must admit, and the question of nationality in India is one of paramount importance because round it revolves the whole problem. Could you please tell me what is your idea of the community of interests which form a nationality?—I do not exactly follow you. I feel that there is no conflict of interests between Hindus and Muslims so far as political ideals are concerned.

129. What I want to know is whether India is inhabited by people who profess one religion, who have one common tradition, one history and also common social institutions?—I do not believe that a common religion is a necessary element in every nationality. The United States has not got one religion, Canada has not got one religion and England has not got one religion.

* * * * * * * * * * *

131. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: With regard to the services will you please look at page 228 of your Memorandum. You say therein that "While the Muslims in Sind do not desire to allow the minority an open door to the public services, the Muslims of the United Provinces, Bihar and the Central Provinces are actualling enjoying as a minority a share of the posts in the public services, much in excess of their population ratio." May I ask you whether the Hindus in Sind do not form 27 per cent. of the population and the Mahomedans form the rest of the percentage?—Yes.

132. Do you not believe that though the Mahomedans in the United Provinces have an excess share of posts there, yet they do not enjoy the same privilege here?—My contention is that I am being prevented by administrative rules from entering through an open door.

133. Chairman: Professor, let me now put two or three questions on the separation of Sind. Taking all the considerations together, do you advise the Conference or do you not to adopt the proposal for the separation of Sind and making it a separate province? —I oppose it strongly.

134. I suppose you recognise that Sind has an area which is to some degree more separated from the rest of the Presidency of Bombay than, say, Deccan? —Certainly.

135. You admit that there are administrative and other considerations which do make Sind stand out from the rest of the Presidency to a degree which is exceptional?—No. I do not think that the differences between the Deccan and Gujrat are less than those between Sind and Gujrat.

136. What is your principal reason for advising that Sind should not be separated?—From the point of view of peoples' welfare, it is not desirable that a backward tract like Sind should be separated from the Bombay presidency.

137. Sind being in your view more backward than many parts of the Presidency do you consider it is better for it to be yoked with the rest of the Presidency?—Yes.

138. Do you think the area and population of Sind in the circumstances are such as would justify creating a separate province?—No; it is too small.

139. I am not expressing any view but am merely putting a question. You have, I know, gone closely into the financial question in your pamphlet which I have read. Let me say that we cannot enter into the financial question in great detail now. But tell me this: According to your estimates and calculations, if we could separate Sind out, do you think, in recent past, that it has been an area which has been paying for itself, or an area which has been, if treated by itself, incurring deficits?—Incurring deficits and those, too, increasing deficits.

140. Many of these things are controversial. Is the view which you have formed at all affected by the fact that very important capital works have been undertaken recently in the Sind area?—Certainly.

141. You might explain in a sentence or two why you regard that as having a bearing on your conclusions?—The very success of a big scheme like this requires an experienced administration. I feel that even the financial estimates made of the barrage may prove to be wrong and the period of redemption postponed still further unless economic principles are adopted not merely on the technical side of the management but also on the commercial side of the land sales. Judging from the proceedings of the Bombay council, the Sind zamindari element is likely to predominate in the Sind Council and will not allow sale of land on commercial principles which will be, really speaking, very necessary for the success of the project. Not merely that. Scientific irrigation means control of supply of water for every individual; it therefore requires that the administration must be free from popular pressure. The zamindari element and the cultivator will have to change by force of economic necessity their methods of cultivation; a more economical use of water will have to be resorted to, otherwise the barrage will not pay. Then, the entire labour problem requires careful handling. Sind being an undeveloped tract, hardly one irrigation project is finished before another will have to be taken up. Railway communications and feeder railways are absolutely necessary to take off the new supply of produce that will come from the increased acreage of land; that means more money required for giving the Government of India guarantee against loss in the early stages of feeder railways in Sind. A small province with slender resources cannot afford all this.

142. Major Attlee: Sind, I take it, is poorer than any other part of the presidency?—I do not think it is poorer than the Deccan; the Deccan is a greater drain on Bombay than Sind.

143. I thought it had one-sixth of the population of the presidency?—Yes.

144. I want to know why you have taken one-fourth when suggesting that so much should be paid by Sind and so much by the rest of the presidency and not one-sixth? Is it artificial? It is not based on population?—No, not on the basis of population, but on the basis of divisions. A division is one unit of administration and needs therefore the same amount of expenditure on administrative machinery, whether it contains a large population or a small one. As a matter of fact, the scale of salaries in Sind is higher than in the other divisions of the presidency owing to higher cost of living and defective communications; and so even one-fourth share is an underestimate.

145. Lord Burnham: In regard to the Sukkur Barrage, do I understand that it is bound to benefit Sind?—It is bound to benefit Sind, but whether from the point of view of finance it would benefit Government is very difficult to say at present. Increased acreage of cultivable land certainly means more prosperity to Sind even though financially it may not pay Government even the interest on its cost.

146. Chairman: Is it not that much of the success of the Sukkur Barrage depends on the efficiency with which water is administered and the charge made for lands?—That is so.

147. Lord Strathcona: If or when in future a financial case and an administrative case can be made out for the separation of Sind, would you still be opposed to it on other grounds?—What is meant by an administrative case? Supposing communications improve and on that account it becomes possible to educate the people by compulsory education, which is not now possible, due to lack of communications, and supposing there is greater prosperity and education as in Australia or in Canada, and within thirty years the whole aspect of Sind life becomes different, and people take to agriculture as a scientific pursuit, it will then, of course, be a different matter altogether.

148. Apart from all other considerations, is it your opinion that on economical and financial grounds alone Sind cannot be separated?—Yes. Not at present.

149. You mean you will be faced presumably with two alternatives, either to cut down the cost of administration to such a point that the efficiency in services will suffer or you will have to increase your taxation out of all proportion, is it not?—That is one thing. But much more than that I feel that with regard to the Sukkur Barrage, which has just now been taken in hand, the economic development is bound to prove in the initial stages very costly, though, in the long run, it may more than pay its cost. And not only schemes in connection with the Sukkur Barrage but a number of other schemes need to be taken in hand in the near future. Even if you increase taxation to meet the existing deficit, you will have to provide funds for interest and sinking fund charges for development loans; and then there will be no room for the ever-increasing expenditure on the nation-building departments like education and sanitation and industries.

150. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: If the Hindus in Sind are given privileges and facilities similar to those which are now enjoyed by the Muhammadan minorities elsewhere, would you then be in favour of the separation of Sind?—No, for the general objections still remain.

151. Why?—Taking the financial grounds alone. Surely, the fact that there will be a high rate of taxation on land does not mean that I do not pay the taxation. I have to share the consequences.

152. Is it not a fact that in 1917 the Provincial Conference in Sind appointed a committee to enquire into this question and it recommended that Sind should be constituted as a separate autonomous province?—Certainly not. The last paragraph of their report cancels all the previous ones. They made it clear that they agreed on only one point, viz., that the powers of the Commissioner of Sind should be curtailed and the conference, as a whole, rejected without a single dissentient the proposal for the separation of Sind. The same decision was reached at the subsequent Political conferences till 1920. These are the real facts and I am prepared to hand over the relevent papers to the Commission for their perusal.

153. I want that the Report of the Committee should be handed over to the Chairman?—I shall made an attempt to secure it. I know that Mr. Ghulam Ali Chagla, the Muslim president of the Provincial Conference in 1919 definitely rejected the proposal.

154. I think your object to the separation is on financial grounds?—No, but the economic argument is certainly a very important one since it has a bearing on the political development as well.

155. Supposing an independent committee is constituted to enquire into this question and it finds that the province can support itself financially, then will you be in favour of its separation?—No. What is the standard of administration you wish to maintain in Sind? There are many examples of areas which with a revenue of one lakh of rupees support a separate administration. I am not prepared to lower the present level of administration. You have to raise and not lower the existing scale of expenditure on beneficent services, on police, education and so on. If anybody can show me that in the next twenty years a separate Sind will be economically more prosperous and that educational progress in it will be accelerated, then I am prepared to consider the question.

156. Supposing it is shown to you?—But even then the political argument does not vanish.

157. Supposing the financial objection is removed, then also you object to the separation?—Yes. Education for instance will deteriorate apart from the financial burden.

158. I do not want to discuss educational matters with you. You referred to the Sukkur Barrage and stated that the revenue will not be able to meet the cost in the initial stages. I think the Government of Bombay is not providing from its revenues the expenditure on the Sukkur Barrage or any other project on which a capital expenditure is incurred. The debt is incurred by the Government of India?—No province can incur debt except on the security of its revenues; otherwise nobody will lend. The Bombay Government is giving you that guarantee and meeting a portion of the interest charges from its revenues.

159. It was the Government of India that borrowed the money?—On whose security?

160. Chairman: I think that Mr. Muhammad Shah is right in saying that the Government of India has borrowed the money for the Sukkur Barrage and it has borrowed the money on the securities and resources of the Government of India, which has lent the money to the Government of Bombay. But in the last resort what you say is correct?—I submit that there is another aspect of the thing to consider. The Government of India is not going to raise crores of money on behalf of a provincial Government whose revenue is only Rs. 1,64,00,000.

161. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: Do you think that the Government is not morally bound to constitute the backward areas into a province?—It has also to consider the risks.

162. Supposing the Sukkur Barrage pays for itself and it will bring prosperity to the people and every pie that you spend is got back?—Every project is subject to some risk of failure.

163. Risks have to be faced?—Yes, but there is a difference between the smaller provinces and bigger provinces in respect of the risks they can incur.

164. It is the duty of the Mother Government of India, the Central Government, to see that the backward area is developed?—I do not believe any Central Government is prepared to borrow money on behalf of a Provincial Government irrespective of the revenues of the province. At least there must be some proportion between its revenue and its borrowings.

165. Rao Sahib Patil: Supposing as a matter of argument Sind is constituted into a separate province, do you think there would be sufficient work for a legislative council in that province?—I think you as a member of the Bombay Council know better than myself what contribution the Sind Muslim block makes to the Bombay Council.

166. I want to know whether you think there will be sufficient work for the legislative council of the province?—It depends on the men who enter the council and I think there will not be sufficient men who have either the will or the ability to do the work.

167. You are opposed to the separation because Sind people are not competent to do the business?—Because Sind is likely to return people who know nothing and who are too mediæval in outlook to run a modern administration.

168. You know that even before the Reforms Sind was a deficit province?—Right up from 1843.

169. You think that in view of the present financial position Sind, if constituted into a separate province, will not stand on its own legs financially at least for a generation or more?—Yes.

170. Supposing Sind is made a separate province, do the Hindus feel that their interests will not be safe in the hands of the Muslims?—It is not a case of Hindus feeling safe under Muslims as Muslims. Our interests were quite safe in the hands of the late Mr. G. M. Bhurgri. It will be a case of the advanced community falling under the control of people who are backward and who are still living in mediæval times.

171. As the Muslims are in a majority and as they are incompetent you fear that the interests of the Hindus will not be safe in the hands of the Muslims?—I cannot make such a statement about Muslims in general. All that I can say is that the class of Muslim zamindars who are likely to form the majority in a Sind council cannot safely be entrusted with the control over the destinies of an enterprising, progressive and advanced community like the Hindu minority in Sind.

172. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: In reply to the Chairman you have stated that you oppose the creation of Sind as a separate province from the point of view of the welfare of the people in Sind?—Yes.

173. I want to know who is the best judge of the welfare of the people, you or the people themselves?—The people must have a self before they know what their real interests are.

174. You mean that they do not understand what they demand?—There are human beings in that category.

175. But is it not a fact that the Muslims in Sind demand separation?—What do you mean by that? Have they gone to the voters and asked them as to their willingness to pay for the additional expenditure?

176. The great majority of the people are in favour?—We deny it.

177. You do not agree with that?—I do not agree that they have understood anything of the business. If we were to tell the people that they will have to tax themselves further, I am sure they will oppose the proposal.

178. That question was put yesterday to the Muslim deputation and they said that they were prepared to be taxed?—We do not know what their authority is for saying that. Let them take a referendum and ask the voters as to their willingness to bear more taxation on land.

179. If it is found that the great majority of the people are prepared to agree to the separation, then will you have any objection?—I shall still oppose it because I feel that it will not conduce to the welfare of Sind as a whole. I am not prepared to admit that the common people know what the consequences of the separation will be. If somebody is going to appeal to the communal sentiment of the Muslim saying that they will get Muslim Raj and so on, they may be prepared to agree. But if the real facts are put before them, if they are explained what the consequences of the separation will be and if the whole scheme of separation in all its financial and administrative aspects is placed before them then they will oppose the separation. The Muslims of Sind are not yet in a position to understand all that.

180. You say on page 232 that "no redistribution of any province should be allowed without the consent of a substantial proportion of at least the two major communities." What do you mean by "the two major communities"?—The Hindus and the Muslims here.

181. You are only 26 per cent. and you want to hold up the 74 per cent. of the population from carrying out what they want?—We are not holding up the progress of anyone. I might as well take the population of the Bombay Presidency as a whole and say that 24 lakhs of Sind Muslims are holding up the whole of the Presidency. The Hindus are in the majority in the Bombay Presidency and this majority is certainly entitled to say "we won't allow a portion of a majority to be converted into a minority without their free consent."

182. Dr. Suhrawardy: One of your objections to the separation of Sind from Bombay proper is the smallness of the size of Sind. May I know if Sind is smaller than the province of Delhi?—Delhi is a province only in name; it is not a reformed province; it is only an administration directly under the Government of India.

183. Supposing Sind is separated and created an administration like Delhi with a university of its own just as Delhi has a university of its own of which you are the professor, would you still have any objection?—Yes; as I stated before the Hartog Committee education in Delhi is suffering because of the smallness of the Delhi province. That is my complaint against the present arrangement.

184. As regards the financial difficulty, supposing the Central Government provides funds which are now being provided by the Government of Bombay for Sind, would you still have any objection?—I consider, constitutionally speaking, that it is a fantastic proposition, because no Government is going to provide funds without having the power to control expenditure.

185. But supposing they provide funds, however fantastic the proposition might be, just as the system of communal electorate is also considered to be fantastic, then what is your view?—I am also a taxpayer of the Government of India and as such I must object to it. Though I belong to Sind I pay income tax and customs duty and as a taxpayer of the Government of India I have also a voice there. Why should they take a course that is bound to lead to irresponsibility and extravagance?

186. Why are they pouring money into Sind? What advantage do they derive? You yourself stated that there has been a deficit. Are you so fond of Bombay that you will not on any account like the idea of separation from Bombay or have you got any other reason?—It is not a question of fondness, it is a question of public welfare.

187. Supposing the Government of India were to find funds?—Even then there are other objections, e.g., political; and moreover I object to it as a taxpayer of the Government of India.

188. One of the grounds for your opposition to the separation of Sind, if I understand you aright, is that it will result in the domination of people living in mediæval times over advanced people. Do I understand you to say that the Muslims are people who live in mediæval times?—Most of them do so in Sind.

189. Dr. Suhrawardy: Have you such a thing as the caste system among the Hindus?—Practically none in Sind.

Dr. Suhrawardy: I am very glad to hear that you have got over this mediæval institution.

190. Sir Hari Singh Gour: May I ask you one question? Have you any objection to amalgamation with your neighbouring province of Punjab?—That is entirely a different proposition. It is certainly not open to the same objections as an autonomous province of Sind.

191. You have not considered that?—It was considered some time ago, and both Hindus and Mahomedans were opposed to it mainly on two grounds. Firstly, the general feeling was that the Punjabi would oust out the Sindhi from the economic life of the province. And the second reason was that the Punjabi would always have more influence with the Punjab Government, and since irrigation would have to depend on the control of a Government situated at Lahore, the administration would not be fair to Sind so far as the distribution of water from the Indus was concerned. It was far better to continue to be attached to the Bombay Government, which is strong enough to fight for our interests against the Punjab, in the matter of any big irrigation project, dependent on the river Indus.

192. Chairman: The impression that we received recently from a Mahomedan deputation was that though they expressed a strong wish that Sind should be separated from Bombay, still they did not at all wish to be joined with Punjab?—That is exactly what I say.

193. I gather that you would agree that association with Punjab would not suit Sind?—We agree that association with the Punjab is not desirable. But at the same time we consider it less objectionable than the separation of Sind.

194. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: One of the grounds mentioned by your Association is about the backwardness of the Mussalman community in the matter of education compared with Baluchistan and other places. Would you give us some figures illustrating that point?—I have given it in one of my pamphlets at page 36—Sind Mussalmans only 37 per mille; Baluchistan 47; North-West Frontier Province 50; Bombay Presidency, including Sind, 95; India as a whole 82; Hindus of Sind 266.

195. How does it compare between the two communities—Mahomedans and Hindus?—There is a great difference in education between the two, the literacy figure being 37 in the one case and 266 in the other.

196. Have you formed any opinion about the political effect of the separation of Sind?—Yes. The first thing I feel is that separation would mean that the entire power would be in the hands of a small oligarchy of big Muslim zamindars. As I have already pointed out, most of the people are landless labourers. They cannot have any influence and the entire council would be dominated by the big zamindari element, which would take care of its own interests only and nothing else. That is one. The second of course is a more general consideration. We are so near the border, and even now there is so much of migration into the Upper Sind Frontier district. In fact Sind has taken upon itself the function of civilising the border tribes of India. We are having, as it were, a constant stream of people from across the border and the consequence of separation would be, I fear, that on some side, especially the frontier side, more of those border influences than Indian influences would prevail, and I do not look upon it, from a national point of view, as at all desirable.

197. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Would you tell me please whether you demanded the separation of Sind on the occasion of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms?—No. Not only we did not do it, but the Mahomedan leader, Mr. Bhurgri, did not do it.

198. But what about yourself?—We have never demanded separation of Sind.

199. Professor, with regard to the problem of separation you know that the most paramount consideration is one of finance. You know also that in the Punjab one district, that is the Rajpuri district, alone brings in a crore of rupees. Do you not think that the new scheme, viz., the Sukkur Barrage, by which it is intended to irrigate such a vast area will bring in an enormous amount of money sufficient enough to carry on the administration?—I cannot prophesy what will happen thirty years hence. It all depends on the energy and the enterprise of the people and the quality of administration during the interval.

200. Do you not think it is likely?—Not as the Sindhi hari is at present. He will have to change his ways.

201. You fear he will not?—My hopes in him may not be realised rather.

202. You know, professor, that Travancore, a native State, with an expenditure of 205 lakhs carries on a very efficient administration?—I have not been to Travancore. I doubt if it is better than British administration.

203. You also do not know perhaps that Gwalior with 140 lakhs carries on an efficient administration?—I do not think that Gwalior depends entirely on irrigation.

204. You are sure of it?—Facts speak for themselves.

* * * * * * * * * * *

205. Syed Miran Muhammad Shah: At page 228 of the first part of your Memorandum you say that the Mussalmans in certain places are "enjoying as a minority a share of the posts in the public services, much in excess of their population ratio." I only want to have just a rough idea as to whether your community in Sind has not an excess of the population ratio in services?—But it has more than a population ratio of graduates. I have not got the figures here, but if you want I shall get them for you.

206. I want to know if you believe in an efficient and strong administration, or a just and sympathetic administration?—I do not believe there is necesarily a choice between two evils. You can have a strong, efficient and at the same time, sympathetic administration.

207. Chairman: I want to ask you, professor, as an authority on public economics, one or two questions which have to do with the economic aspect of the separation of Sind. Do you recognise in dealing with the subject of public debt that there is a distinction between the debt that a State may incur which has no present assets to represent it, for example, the debt due to a great war, and the sort of debt that may have to be incurred for the purpose of providing itself with an asset?—Yes; that is, of course, very important.

208. So that before we can consider the possibility of separation and the question of what we have to do with the debt which is partly associated with that idea, it is, is it not, important to ask the question, "Is not the debt represented by assets which will be held by the new Government which takes over the debt?" You agree, I am sure, that in the science of public economics it is an important distinction?—Yes.

209. If you have to take over the burden of the national debt due to past wars, you have nothing in the form of visible assets to represent it. But, if you take over the debt due to existing public works, you may have an asset which has been bought by expending the money. You agree so far?—Yes.

210. I take it that on the subject of taking over the sort of debt which is associated with the Sukkur Barrage it would be fair to say that it rather is of the class of a debt incurred for the purpose of providing a great asset?—Quite, but an asset which has not necessarily to be valued at the estimated cost.

211. I quite agree with you. So far so good. Now comes the question as to whether or not if you take over the debt and take over the asset, the asset will really be in the hands of the new Government adequate to meet the debt. It does not follow, of course, that it will be adequate merely because an immense sum of money has been spent with a determination to repay the money that has been borrowed. Is that not so?—Yes.

212. You can tell me from a study of the various projects in different parts of the world whether there are any big irrigation schemes which in fact have not paid their way?—As a matter of fact, I think the Sukkur Barrage is easily the biggest scheme.

213. Are there cases in other parts of the world which, as a matter of fact, have not produced a sufficient return?—Within what period of time?

214. Would you draw a distinction between contemplating taking over this asset just when the construction work is finished and the possibility of taking it over after it has been proved to be a real revenue bearing asset?—Yes.

215. I am merely trying to get your help as an authority on public economics. It seems to me that it is one thing to contemplate taking over such a thing just when it is being built, and quite another thing to contemplate the possibility of taking it over in thorough working order when it has been proved to be a revenue-bearing source?—Yes, sir; this is quite true.

216. Do you believe that if a thing like the Sukkur Barrage is going to be a big source of revenue, it will be necessary not only for the engineers to construct it well, but also for the administration to administer the water and to sell the land at a proper value?—Quite right; that is what I myself emphasised.

217. Do you think that the Government of India, if it were going to contemplate this separation, would be likely to consider whether such subjects as Land Revenue and Irrigation in Sind could be made purely transferred subjects?—I do not think so far as irrigation is concerned it would agree to make it a transferred subject.

218. After all it is the Government of India that is answerable for repaying the money?—Quite.

219. People who lend the money are entitled to look to the borrower, and the borrower cannot merely say that he has handed over the assets to somebody else. So that the Government of India will remain answerable for the money?—Quite.

220. I have no information at all on the subject, but it occurs to me that it is a very serious thing in Sind to consider whether it is likely that this immense asset could be handed over which has been built out of money borrowed by the Government of India unless the Government of India retained control over the revenue from irrigation?—That is so.

221. We do not have the advantage of any analogous case for guidance. You will tell me if you know of any, but I should think that from the point of view of public economics that is the sort of analysis that perhaps we ought to bear in mind?—Certainly.

222. Chairman: We are much obliged to you, professor, and you, gentlemen of the Association, for your evidence. You have touched on most controversial topics on which there is the sharpest difference of opinion, or rather I would say the sharpest difference of inclination. No doubt there is a very large body of opinion here which, right or wrong, declares itself in favour of the change. We are much obliged to you, sir, and we quite realise that these are some of the difficulties which you, whatever community you may belong to, have to got face.

Appendix (vide Q. 11, p. 238).

Copy of letter dated, Hyderabad, Sind, the 18th November, 1928, from Prof. H. L. CHABLANI, M.A. (Spokesman), Sind Hindu Association Deputation, Karachi, to the Chairman, Indian Statutory Commission.

As desired by you, I beg to send herewith a copy of the statement showing the number of the Muslim and non-Muslim voters for the Bombay Legislative Council election in the municipal and district local board areas in Sind, supplied by the Honourable Mr. J. E. B. Hotson to the Bombay Legislative Council on the 11th October, 1927 (vide pp. 631–632 Bombay Legislative Council Debates, Vol. XXI).

It will be seen that the total number of Muslim voters is 60,838 and not 59,000 as you have been led to believe.

A detailed examination of these figures shows clearly how erroneous is the impression sought to be produced on your mind that Muslims are likely to lose heavily in elections under a system of joint electorates. If the City of Karachi is excluded, the total number of Muslim voters in the rest of Sind is 52,508 against 49,030 non-Muslim voters, giving the Muslims a clear majority. The Sind Hindu Association has claimed a seat each for the City of Hyderabad and Shikarpur, and Karachi is already a separate constituency both for Muslims and non-Muslims. At any rate, this is bound to be the case under joint electorates in view of the total number of voters in these cities. If the City of Karachi be given three seats, the number of Muslim voters is sufficiently large to return one member under the system of a single transferable vote. Excluding the City of Hyderabad, the total number of Muslim voters in the district of Hyderabad is 7,919 against 3,059 non-Muslim voters. Excluding the City of Karachi, the district of Karachi will have 4,030 Muslim voters against 1,814 non-Muslim voters. Excluding the City of Shikarpur, there are in the district of Sukkur 6,897 Muslim voters and 6,919 non-Muslim voters, giving the Muslims practically an equal chance of success in a contested election. The district of Nawabshah has 6,517 Muslim voters and 5,442 non-Muslim voters, giving an appreciable advantage to Muslims. In the district of Larkana, there are only 6,329 non-Muslim voters against 10,601 Muslim voters—a preponderating majority for Muslims. In the Thar and Parkar district, there are 4,475 Muslim voters against only 2,834 non-Muslim voters; while the Upper Sind Frontier district has 3,988 Muslim voters against 1,717 non-Muslim voters. It is clear that these detailed figures for each constituency effectively dispose of the superficial view based on the totals for the whole of Sind without reference to each constituency separately.

Memorandum submitted by the Khans of the NORTH-WEST FRONTIER PROVINCE.

We, the representatives of the aristocracy, and of the rural population of the North-West Frontier Province, respectfully submit the following proposals for the extension of constitutional reforms into our Province, and hope that our views will meet with your approbation.

1. We earnestly request you to help us in obtaining full reforms that may be sanctioned, as a result of your deliberations, for India, and in this respect we feel confident that our request will receive your support.

2. We beg to lay stress on the fact that the reforms which may be conceded to our Province, will contain all the progressive elements similar to those that are conferred on the other Provinces of India, viz. :—

> A full Provincial Council in accordance with the approved scheme of reforms should be established, endowed with full power to pass laws and regulations for the benefit of the Province, and to exercise all other powers and functions with which the Council can be invested, according to law.

3. We, however, realise that the condition of our Province is not, in all respects, similar to the conditions of the other Provinces of India, and on that account the constitution and expense of the Council, as well as the creation of new appointments that are a necessary concomitant of the reforms, will require modification, so that they may fully conform with the local circumstances.

4. In this connection we will, with your permission, briefly describe some of the factors which in our opinion afford cogent reasons in favour of the proposal in para. No. 3.

This Province consists of only five settled districts, is small and though the population is homogeneous, its financial resources are very limited. The contiguity of the Province with Independent Territory and Afghanistan, the free intercourse between the people on both sides of the Border line, the similarity of their ideals, customs, and mode of life, and specially their descent from the common stock, strongly distinguish the people of our Province from those of the rest of India. We, therefore, feel that sudden and violent changes in the administrative machinery of the Province will be productive of serious harm. We are, however, sanguine that the proposals, which we are submitting below for your consideration, if accepted, will be consistent with the introduction of reforms, and will also contribute to their successful working.

5. We beg to propose that the Council should compose of two-thirds nominated members and one-third elected members.

6. The Khans of the Province have throughout the British Rule been associated with Government officers in the work of administration. They are the natural leaders of the people by whom they are recognized as such; they settle their private disputes out of court; ameliorate their troubles and difficulties and they treat them like their children. The sudden introduction into the Province of an elective system for filling the seats in the Council will, in our opinion, disorganize relations of trust and confidence between the Khans, and the people, and will also lead to discord. We have, therefore, proposed the constitution of the Council in the above-mentioned manner so as to preserve the influence of the Khans who, according to their merit, will be largely nominated by the Head of the administration, and their majority will be thus assured. The elective system will also be cautiously introduced into the Council, and in that way the demand of the middle classes for reforms will also be met.

7. We beg to append a separate note to this representation about the services of the Khans, and we feel sure that the cause of good administration will not suffer by their being nominated to the majority seats in the Council.

8. We hope that four seats will be reserved for our Province in the Legislative Assembly and three in the Council of State, when the new scheme of reforms is inaugurated.

9. We are prepared to concede special concessions to our Hindu brethren in proportion of those conceded to Mussalmans by Hindus in Provinces in which the Mussalmans in the minority.

10. It will not be out of place to direct your attention to the important position which this Province holds on the North-West border of India. From times immemorial India has been invaded from this corner, but that danger has been eliminated by the sturdy martial races who stand as vigilant sentinels for the safety of this sub-continent. They supplement by their willing services the British Military power and we feel sure that the peace of India has been fully assured. We hope that India will recognize our willing services in the same manner as the British Government have always been doing.

11. In the end, we hope that as the notables of the Province on account of their lavish hospitality towards the trans-border tribes incur large expenses, they will not be deprived permanently of the grants of Government land which they have been previously receiving.

Memorandum of the Services of the CHIEFS OF FRONTIER.

It will be fully established that according to the old system in this province, the Afghan tribes look upon their Chiefs with the same amount of respect and confidence which is prevalent among the nationals of the Independent adjacent territory. The Khans of this Province are ever ready to serve the Government to the best of their ability on each and every occasion of emergency. The people also follow their national leaders without any objection or demur and willingly join Military Operations for the service of the Government, when occasion arises. For instance, in the year 1848 the Sikhs surrounded and besieged Sir John Lawrence in Rang Mahalat, Peshawar. The Khans came with an army of their followers to his help and extricated him from that difficult position. This fact can be elicited from Government Records. In that occasion the Sikhs suffered severe losses. In those days the Chiefs of the Province were ever ready to serve the officers of the British Government, even in opposition to the Durani Chiefs of the time. Those were delicate times for the Government of India, but the Khans of the Province by their loyal services saved the situation. It may be said with justice that it was as a result of the services of the Frontier Chiefs that the dignity and might of the British Government remained inviolable during these troublous times in the Punjab and other parts of India. In the first Afghan War of 1841, in the second war of 1878, and also in the third Afghan War in 1919 the Chiefs served the Government zealously and loyally. The services of the Khans of the Frontier in the Mutiny of 1857 were a determining factor in the destruction of the rebel army. The Khans of the Frontier have always been prominent in preserving peace on the Border and saving the countryside from the raiders of the trans-border tribes. In the Great War the services of the Frontier Chiefs were unrivalled in India. All the Chiefs vied with each other to serve Government to the best of their ability, even at the sacrifice of their family members, their property and their own safety.

PESHAWAR.

Dated 19th November, 1928.

MORNING.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND), MAJOR NAWAB AHMED NAWAZ KHAN, THE HON. MAJOR NAWAB MAHOMAD AKBAR KHAN, NAWAB SIR SAHIBZADA ABDUL QAIYUM, RAI BAHADUR KARAM CHAND.

KHANS' DEPUTATION.

The Deputation consisted of :—

1. Khan Bahadur Abdul Ghafur Khan, Khan of Zaida (Spokesman).
2. Nawab Dost Muhammad Khan, O.B.E., of Taikal.
3. Nawab Habibullah Khan of Dera Ismail Khan.
4. Nawab Allahadad Khan of Dera Ismail Khan.
5. Khan Baz Muhammad Khan of Teri.
6. Nawab Muhammad Zaffar Khan of Walai.
7. Raja Haidar Zaman Khan of Khanpur.
8. Khan Bahadur Khair Muhammad Khan, Bannu.
9. Khan Bahadur Sher Ali Khan of Takhtikel.
10. Khan Sahib Muhammad Khan of Ghoriwala.
11. Khan Bahadur Arbab Mir Ahmad Khan, M.B.E., of Landi.
12. Khan Bahadur Arbab Muhammad Akram Khan of Landi.
13. Captain Hisamuddin Khan, C.I.E.
14. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Khan of Chamkani.
15. Khan Bahadur Muhammad Zaman Khan of Akora.
16. Khan Bahadur Mian Musharraf Shah, Nowshera.
17. Khan Sahib Sarfaraz Khan of Mardan.
18. Arbab Tehmas Khan of Taikal.
19. Nawab Habibullah Khan of Toru.

1. Chairman : Khan Bahadur, you are going to be good enough to act as spokesman ?—Khan Bahadur Abdul Ghafur Khan : Yes.

2. Would you like in the first instance to address us ?—Yes.

The witness thereupon read the Memorandum submitted by the Khan's Deputation, with the Memorandum of the Services of the Chiefs of the Frontier attached thereto (see page 248).

3. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : May we hear the signatures read out ?

Chairman : Yes. (To the witness) : Will you be good enough to read out the names ?

The Witness read out the signatures.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : It is from all the other Khans also.

4. Chairman : You read out the signatures ?—Yes.

5. Is it within your knowledge that the contents of this document—the substance of it—are approved by other Khans besides ?—This representation was prepared in consultation with the majority of Khans here, after a long deliberation lasting for two days and portions of two nights. After that we came to certain conclusions which are contained in this document. Then I drafted it in English. After that I explained it word for word and translated it into Urdu. Every gentleman here knows exactly every word of the contents of this document, and they approve of it.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I should like to know if the signatories are the same as those who are here before us in this deputation and whose names are given in the list, or if there are any absent, and if so, why they are absent, and if there are any new names among the signatories who are not down on the list.

Chairman : What I suggest we might do is this. Mr. Gidney would perhaps be kind enough to have a list made of the gentlemen who are here, and another list prepared of those who have signed this document.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Yes, showing which names are missing and which have been added.

Chairman : I follow that. Those two lists will help us to see.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : This is given as their unanimous opinion. Only a few have come and attended here, but the rest hold the same opinion.

6. Chairman : I am not disputing it at all; I am merely asking for those two lists to be made, and then they will be available later on. I understand the Khan Bahadur says that the document was drawn up as the result of a consultation with a large body of Khans, that you spent two days on it and, I think, part of two nights, that it was translated into Urdu and that the recommendations are therefore recommendations coming from a very representative body.

Later on, if anyone wants to ask a question they can do so, but I should like first of all to put a question or two myself. I should like to ask you this first of all. Your proposal is to have a council one-third of which would be elected. Have you formed any view (either as a deputation, or personally) as to what the franchise should be ?—The question of the franchise has not been discussed, because according to the previous procedure a separate committee was appointed to settle the question of franchise in India, and I thought it quite possible that a similar committee would be appointed on this occasion and, taking into consideration the condition of our own province, that committee would settle the question of franchise.

7. Very well. It is enough for the purpose of the moment to know that the question of what the franchise should be is not a question that the Khans for whom you are speaking have specially considered at this stage?—Quite so.

8. At present in the North-West Frontier Province are there any examples of bodies which are elected by ballot?—I belong to a rural area. I am not aware of it.

9. For instance, am I right in thinking that the municipality of Peshawar is a nominated and not an elected body at present?—I know the district board is nominated.

Rai Bahadur Karam Chand: The members of the municipalities and district boards throughout this province are nominated.

10. Chairman: I thought so. The introduction of the method of election would therefore bring in a change in this province?—Yes, exactly.

11. Another thing I should like to know is this. You suggest two-thirds of this council should be nominated. Who would nominate them?—The head of the province.

12. The Chief Commissioner?—The Chief Commissioner, though by that time he might be designated the Governor.

13. At any rate, the head of the province?—Yes.

14. Is it your idea that he would nominate afresh for each council, or would he nominate so that once he had chosen a man that man would continue to be a member?—As a rule, nomination to these seats continues for the lifetime of the council, and these nominations should, I think, continue to that extent.

15. Sir Abdul Qaiyum: Would they be hereditary?—No. I said for the lifetime of the council.

16. Chairman: I think the Khan Bahadur means there would be fresh nominations whenever there was an election?—Yes.

A member of the Deputation spoke in Urdu.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum: He says that after three years they should be changed.

17. Chairman: I should like to ask a question about elections. You know that in some parts of India there are separate constituencies for separate communities?—Yes.

18. In other places the plan of a joint electorate, where Hindus and Mahomedans vote together, may be found. Have the Khans come to a clear view as to whether the elections should be with separate electorates or with joint electorates?—The Hindu population in this province is so infinitesimally small that even if the system of joint electorates were to be the system applied throughout the province, it would not affect the Mahomedan population. In my view it would be better if the Hindus were given separate electorates for themselves.

19. Chairman: The Hindus and the Sikhs together form, I think, 7 per cent. of the population?—Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan?—Yes.

Witness: The majority of the Hindu gentlemen who would be eligible for election to the councils or who would be qualified to sit in the legislative council live in the cities, and in some places there they may even be in a majority, so they would not be affected by the large population of Mahomedans in this province.

20. Chairman: It comes to this, that you think on your scheme the Hindus should have a separate electorate?—Quite so.

21. Sir Arthur Froom: In connection with this very interesting document which you have just read, may I ask whether it is the general opinion of the Khans that it would be better for matters to remain as they are? Has this proposal been put before us as what you wish for in the event of some reforms being given? Do I make myself clear?—Yes, I understand.

22. I suggest there are two sides to the picture. One is that things should remain as they are. Do you think that would be a satisfactory arrangement, or is this put forward to us as your considered opinion if there are reforms given?—You are asking me my opinion, are you not?

23. Might we have your personal opinion, and also the opinion of the other members of the deputation?—I will give you my personal opinion. The world is moving ahead, our own world of India is also moving quite progressively. The Reforms are a step in the direction of enabling the people of the country to have a fairly large share in the administration of their own affairs. Therefore, on that account, irrespective of the fact that we have great confidence in our European officers and in the Government, we still think that we should have a share of all those Reforms which had been introduced before, but from which, somehow or other, we have not yet been benefited, and therefore we want the Reforms. I am not implying any reflection on the administration in any shape or form, but I simply mention that there is a larger consensus of opinion in asking for the introduction of these Reforms, and that is also my personal view as well of the Khans.

24. Supposing it were possible that no further Reforms were given anywhere in India, would you be satisfied with things as they are in this province?—Change is in the nature of the world, and in the nature of human beings. We shall still persist in the improvement of our administration whether it is in the hands of the Central Government who directly manage it, or whether some element of making it more popular is introduced by the inauguration of a Council of persons fit to be entrusted with the management of their own affairs. We therefore urge that this province also, should have a share of the reforms.

25. I am asking this question because I have read some other memorandum which has been put before us from some of the Khan Sahibs in which it is suggested that the province is not in a position to welcome new Reforms. This document which you have read to us would perhaps rescind the previous memoranda. It is a further considered opinion, is it?—Our humble representation to the Joint Conference contains all the elements which, in our humble opinion, will to a certain extent reconcile all views that are held here, and it is with some difficulty that we have managed to bring forward a certain formula before this honourable Commission so that they may consider our peculiar condition, and then also consider the feasibility of introducing suitable reforms into our province. The proportion of the nominated members which we have suggested is really due to the fact that we, by that method, meet all objections. We also see the financial difficulty, and it is on that account that we have also considered that aspect of the case. We know that our memorandum is not a very long one; and it is not a very argumentative one, but I think in a concise manner we have put forward our case to the best of our ability.

26. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: Hindus and Sikhs are very few in this province?—4 per cent. only.

27. Therefore you advise separate electorates for them, because you want to be fair to them?—Exactly, in fact, we have indicated that we are quite willing to extend the hand of friendship to the Hindu element.

28. But if they want joint electorates you will not have any objection?—No.

29. You propose that the council should be composed of two-thirds nominated members and one-third elected members; is not that so?—Yes.

30. And you say later on that you propose the constitution of this council in the above-mentioned manner so as to preserve the influence of the Khans:—Yes.

31. You do not specify anything here in your paragraph 5. You say "members." They need not necessarily be Khans?—In this province it is the aristocracy, i.e., the heads of the nobility, who mostly help the administration under the orders of the local authorities. Other people also to a certain extent are employed.

32. You believe that the great majority of the nominated members will be Khans?—Yes. One word more. We have absolutely no objection to the nomination of any capable gentleman who may not be actually a chief or a Khan, provided our majority is assured. So far, the two-thirds and one-third proportion need not be considered as an absolutely inviolable one. We do not stand upon that. We simply want to preserve in the proposed council the majority of the Khans, and the reason of course, is that we want to see that our province may not suffer from the sudden introduction of those changes that are bound to create discord.

33. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You have said that the Hindus in your province are 7 per cent.?—With the Sikhs combined.

34. Would they pay a large percentage of the tax, 80 per cent. of the income tax?—It may be; I do not know.

35. They are educationally far in advance of the other communities?—I do not think so, not in the towns. In the rural areas, perhaps. It is only in the towns where they have the facilities for obtaining education, but even now the Khans and the well-to-do families of the province are taking advantage of education, even at a great sacrifice. You are asking only about the income tax, but the bulk of the revenue is land revenue. The revenue of this province is fifty-eight lakhs. Out of that I am sure that much more than seven-eighths is contributed by the Mussalmans.

36. Chairman : It comes to this. The fact is quite indisputable, from the figures I have looked at, that the small minority of Hindus of this province pay far the larger proportion of income tax. In the other hand, it is equally clear that the Mahomedans of the countryside pay by far the largest proportion of land revenue.

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : That is right.

38. Sir Hari Singh Gour : The next point is this. You have said very rightly that with the spirit of reform abroad your province wants a proper share of the reforms for the democratisation, the liberalisation of your institutions?—Yes.

39. You say that the Khans of the province have treated their people as their children. Now, of what educative value would this reform be to your children?—By degrees they will be associated with us in the council, and by their progressive knowledge of the world and their patriotism and their friendly spirit of co-operation, which will develop even among the backward classes, they will be fit to be included in larger numbers in the council when the changes take place.

40. Will you give them a helping hand now?—We are giving them a helping hand.

41. In this way, I mean, that a proportion of the elected persons or the nominated persons should be drawn from the people, apart from the Khans—from the peasants, from the tillers of the soil?—Pardon me, I do not understand you.

42. You said that you wished to treat the tenantry, the ryots, the tillers of the soil properly, and my point was that in this liberalising measure of reforms would you not give the tillers of the soil some share in the local councils for the better administration of the province?—When they are fit we will give them their share, of course.

43. But do you think they are fit or they are not fit at present?—They are not fit now.

44. How would you make them fit?—They are receiving education. Their resources are always limited. Their mode of life is different, their profession is different; they are tillers of the soil; they are working in the fields, and have no property. All these things combined keep them more or less in a low social standard. By degrees we are trying our best to evolve the schemes for their education and for their intellectual knowledge, and I think by degrees they will also enable themselves to enter into more or less responsible positions, which the Khans now, mainly hold.

45. How will you form the electorates—of Khans only?—No, but that is a question which I have not considered. The question of franchise we have not discussed.

Chairman : I think on this point it stands like this. This deputation is proposing that two-thirds of the council should be nominated, and it leaves in the hands of the head of the Government the nomination. It is a question for the head of the Government from time to time to exercise his judgment on. These gentlemen are not dictators, and they tell Sir Hari Singh Gour quite frankly that their own view is that the Khans are the natural leaders of the people. That is that. The other point, I think, is this, on the subject of who should have the vote for the other third. I understand that the Khan Bahadur says, on behalf of his deputation, " We have not gone into that, because just as Lord Southborough had a committee, so probably there would be a committee here too." That is really his answer.

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : Quite right.

46. Sir Hari Singh Gour : A general question in the matter of elections. Would you allow your tenants to have a vote?—Certainly, why not? It will be a question of holding so much property, a question of education, a question of services, a question of positions in the army. All those things will be considered.

47. This is a deficit province? There is a deficit here in this province which is made good by the Central Government?—Yes.

48. Do you think the Khans would be prepared to pay the additional taxes necessary to pay the expenditure of the province?—We want to ask for your co-operation in our petition. If you see the last paragraph of our Note you will find that we have put forward certain suggestions for your consideration. The people of the province are not rich, and the province is poor, we are already paying very heavy taxes, we cannot bear further financial burdens. We expect financial help from the rest of India.

49. Chairman : It seems to me the position is this, according to you. There is no doubt, as Sir Hari Singh Gour has pointed out, there is in this province an actual deficit. Many authorities think there would be a deficit even if you confined yourselves to the administered areas, and therefore the balance of money has to come from the Government of India?—Quite so.

50. Well, no doubt it is a difficulty, it is a complication—everyone will admit it—to set up an authority over finance if its own constituents do not provide the money. There is no doubt that it a difficulty, but you think it is a difficulty which, on the whole, has to be got over?—We have made it very easy for this Commission to consider the question of finance. You will see we have been most willing to forego large expense—even the question of the expense of council has not been urged to a large extent in our memorandum and that expense we want to reduce, but one thing is very necessary, and it is this, that this province is so constituted that we naturally expect and hope that greater financial assistance will be given to us that we may be able to develop ourselves with the help of the Government of India. The province has been reduced to its present size not on account of our own representation or on account of anything that we wanted, but by a certain policy which the Government of India thought fit to adopt. We have not included in this memorandum any remarks as to how to remedy the question of the finances of the province, though we can easily suggest to you so many remedies——

Chairman : I think we had better not go into the details now, because my learned friend has brought out the point which you admit, that as things are there is a deficit.

51. Sir Abdul Quaiyum: May I say one word. I understand that as long as we pay our taxes, income tax or land revenue, at the same rate as the rest of India, it does not matter to us where the rest of the money comes from as long as we are part and parcel of India. If we pay these taxes at lower rates than the rest of India, then our taxes may be raised to that standard. Otherwise it is no concern of ours whether we are a self supporting or a deficit province. That is what I think the Khan says.

Witness: Only with a little difference. This province is, as I say, a sort of midway house between independent frontier territory and India. We are strenuously serving India in every possible manner. We are poor, our natural indigenous resources are not very flourishing, the province is small. With all those things, we naturally expect, and strongly hope, that the local income may be further supplemented, and more largely supplemented by the Government of India, than now.

52. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Will you please inform the Conference whether you have been agitating for these Reforms for a long time?—I think we have been agitating for a considerable time.

53. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: Three or four years, or five years?—Yes.

54. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: You started agitating in 1927?—There was a deputation to the Chief Commissioner, Colonel Keene, on the subject of Reforms, and we strongly put forward the plea that full Reforms be granted to us. Subsequently, I think, some other gentlemen also presented applications for the extension of the Reforms. Verbal communications also went on between the Chief Commissioner and some other gentlemen here.

55. Chairman: I think we can save time. It comes to this, does it not? There is no doubt that the view you are presenting on behalf of the Khans to-day represents the result of a gradual advance of opinion. That is fair, is it not?—Yes.

Chairman: That is really all one needs to say.

56. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Do you think that the people of this province expected the Bray Committee to give you some measure of reforms?—Yes, I was myself examined as a witness by that Committee, and I strongly put forward the plea for reforms, and I believe other gentlemen who were examined also did so. The majority did so. I do not know about everyone, but I think most of them were asking for reforms.

57. In what year did that Committee function?—1922.

58. Do you think that your people feel disappointed on account of no satisfactory result having accrued from the investigations of the Bray Committee?—Yes. We have been always clamouring for reforms all along.

59. You feel disappointed?—Yes.

60. Could you please let me know whether the present agitation, and some kind of boycott, is due to disappointment?—I do not know.

61. With regard to the nomination question, you want two-thirds to be nominated by the head of the administration?—Yes.

62. Could you give me the approximate number of Khans of this province?—There are different degrees of Khans. You may take us to be over 200. I want to give the definition of Khan. Khan means independent chief.

63. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: No. I mean what you would consider as belonging to your class?—We must have about two hundred families or more.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Let us say approximately two hundred.

Several Members of the Deputation: Much more.

The Witness: Perhaps many more.

64. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Well, can you give me a rough idea. I do not want the exact number.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan: The best thing would be to ask the Chief Commissioner.

Chairman: I have already asked for that information to be obtained.

Witness: I may be wrong. At any rate, it is quite a large number. My friends behind say there are many more than two hundred.

65. It really comes to this, I think. I have no doubt it will turn out that there are recognised and important khans running up, it may be, to the number of two hundred?—About that number, from whom capable men can be chosen.

66. Chairman: And probably there are others who are entitled to the designation who are not quite so important as the leaders. Is not that so?

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan: Yes.

67. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan. (To the witness): In your opinion, could a constituency of these two hundred be formed for the election of members of your class to the council?—That is not our idea. We want to liberalise the council; we want to include other gentlemen, on the basis of services rendered, qualifications, public-spiritedness and so on.

68. What I mean is this. You want two-thirds of the council for your class?—Yes.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan: Not for our own class; for everybody.

69. Chairman: I think there is a little misunderstanding, Sir Zulfiqar. I understand this gentleman and the Khans to say they want two-thirds of the council to be nominated by the head of the Government. They are not insisting that every one of those shall be a Khan; they would leave it to the head of the Government to make what he thought to be a proper choice.

Witness: We simply want and hope to be assured of our majority.

70. I quite follow that?—There may be other people who may be nominated.

71. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: If you want a majority in the council, and that is your sole idea, you do not care whether it comes by nomination or election?—I may again explain our position. The temperament and peculiarities of the people in this part of the country are such that if elections are suddenly introduced there is a chance of bloodshed, and so on, at the time of elections. We have tried by the method we now propose to ensure peace, for if discord or trouble results from a large number of elections, the council will suffer. We want to ensure its stability by having the larger number of seats reserved for the element which will be recognised as the leaders, by the common population, and thus the council will work satisfactorily.

72. Perhaps I have not been able to make myself clear. I want a very precise answer to this. Supposing the 30 or 40 gentlemen sitting here now were formed into a constituency, and you were required to elect four or five of this number, do you think if this method of election is introduced and you start electing your members from among the candidates there will be bloodshed among you?—There will be less chance.

Several Members of the Deputation: There will be no bloodshed.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan: There will be no bloodshed, but there will be a tremendous lot of bad blood and bad feeling.

Chairman: I think the position has been made perfectly plain. It stands like this, I think. These gentlemen, Sir Zulfiqar, have put up a scheme. I do not think it is very much use arguing with them at length that we have a better scheme. I want to hear in terms the schemes of a series of delegations, and leave time for each. These gentlemen evidently take the view that it would be better to have the two-thirds nominated, and I am prepared to leave it at that, and accept that as their view.

A Member of the Deputation: There would be no bloodshed at all; I can answer for that.

73. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: In the new scheme which you outline, do you think you would have Ministers?—You must have someone in a responsible position. The Bray Committee has made suggestions about that.

74. What is your idea about the Minister? Would you have him chosen out of your own body?—Certainly, we would like to have a Minister from among the Khans.

75. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Would you object if anybody from outside came in as Minister?

Chairman: I understand he would be selected by the head of the Government?—He would be selected by the head of the Government, but anybody else would not be a popular appointment, according to us.

76. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: You have suggested a council two-thirds of the members of which should be nominated and one-third elected, but you have not said anything about the constitution of the local bodies, which are now entirely nominated bodies?—We have not considered the municipalities, but the district boards should be in the same proportion.

77. You want reformed representative government for this province?—Yes.

78. The foundation of reformed government is the management of the local bodies, and in provinces where reformed government has been introduced the local bodies were managed by members who were for the most part elected. Do not you consider it advisable that that experiment should be introduced first in this province, the local bodies being entirely elected, so that there may be some training in representative government first, after which you can go forward to the local council? In that way you will be able to train your people to manage their own affairs?—We have already had sufficient training in administrative matters. There is a large body of men who have been doing useful work, and there is no reason why those people and all the Khans who have been dealing with administration in different ways should not be entrusted with council work immediately, and so we demand the reforms immediately.

79. In paragraph 9 of your Memorandum you say: "We are prepared to concede special concessions to our Hindu brethren in proportion to those conceded to Mussalmans in provinces in which they are in a minority"?—Yes, the same extent of seats.

80. May I know whether there are not Sikhs also holding very important positions?—We include the Sikhs among the Hindus. Here the Sikhs also belong to the trading classes. Five per cent. is the figure for both.

81. Is it 5 per cent. or 7 per cent.?—Five per cent.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan: Seven per cent.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum: It is 7 per cent. for all non-Mahomedans, not necessarily Sikhs and Hindus alone.

Witness: My information is that it is 5 per cent.

82. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: In the Punjab the Sikhs are given separate representation in the council. Will not you extend that privilege to the Sikhs here? They are separate from the Hindus?—There are very few of them.

83. But they have separate interests, separate shrines, separate business, separate educational institutions; do not you think it would be unfair for a separate entity of the population like that not to be given separate representation?—I do not think so.

Chairman: We shall hear what the Sikh deputation thinks this afternoon.

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi: I want their opinion, because they are the majority community in this province.

84. Chairman (To the Witness): What do you think about that? The Sardar Sahib asks you for your personal view, or the view of your deputation, as to whether you think the Sikh community here, which is a small one, should have the privilege of separate representation?—I have replied that I think there is no necessity for it, on account of their small numbers; not for any other reason.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan: It is for you (the Sikhs) and the Hindus to decide.

A Member of the Deputation: Yes; that is exactly our point.

85. Dr. Suhrawardy: You have just said you have no objection to the non-Mahomedan minority combined getting the same protection here as is accorded to Mahomedans elsewhere?—Yes.

86. Are you prepared to give the Hindus, Sikhs and other non-Muslim minorities combined the same protection which the Mahomedans in the Presidency of Madras, for example, are enjoying at present under the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, or which they may enjoy?—I do not know what they are, but we are prepared to concede to them rights in the same proportion as Mahomedans receive in other provinces.

87. I may tell you that in Madras the Mahomedans form 6 per cent.?—What seats are they allowed?

88. More than their population basis?—Yes, we accept that basis.

89. Am I right in saying your deputation represents the conservative element in the country?—We are not divided politically according to English standards.

A Member of the Deputation: Yes, yes; we do.

90. Dr. Suhrawardy: Sir Arthur Froom has pointed out to you that in some of the memoranda some Khans express themselves as entirely against the introduction of reforms. Am I right in saying that not long ago some Khans, whose imagination was fired by the recent reforms in Afghanistan, demanded full-fledged reforms, or reforms on the lines of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, with an elected majority?—I do not know personally.

91. Dr. Suhrawardy: May I show you this letter to refresh your memory? (Document handed to Witness.)

Chairman: What is this letter?

Dr. Suhrawardy: It is a circular letter, dated 25th February, 1926, referring to a resolution passed at a meeting of the Khans at which the Khan Bahadur himself moved a resolution asking for full-fledged reforms.

Witness: You are speaking of the meeting of the 25th September?

92. No, the 25th February?—I was not there.

93. Sir Abdul Qaiyum: I think he refers to a meeting of all the Khans from which a deputation was sent to the Chief Commissioner, a deputation of which you (the witness) were the spokesman and which demanded certain reforms. Most of the gentlemen sitting behind you were signatories to that, and it asked for full-fledged reforms, with an elected majority?—I do not remember anything about a resolution in which the Khans conceded the desirability of introducing reforms into this province with an elected majority in the council. I do not remember any such resolution myself.

94. Dr. Suhrawardy: You yourself have said that the representation you have placed before us this morning was the result of two days' deliberation, and represents not so much the gradual advance of political opinion as a compromise between those who do not want the reforms and those who want full-fledged reforms. The result of that compromise is this document in which you demand certain reforms?—Yes, but I do not remember that we presented any memorandum, memorial or representation to the Chief Commissioner.

Dr. Suhrawardy: I am not now referring to that.

95. Chairman: I thought we had cleared this up before. You told me, I think an hour ago, that there was no doubt that the view you now put forward was not exactly the view that everybody would have held some time ago?—Yes.

A Member of the Deputation: That is right.

96. I understood you to tell us it was in a certain way a compromise?—Yes, after full deliberation and consultation.

97. I rather understood, too, that probably some at your meeting were rather doubtful about going so far, and that others would have liked to go further, but that you held a meeting and discussed it and came to the conclusion to recommend what is in this document?—I do not know what was the result of any previous consultations or deliberations, but when I came here we naturally discussed various aspects and eventually we came to this conclusion. I was not here before; I came here only on the evening of the 14th.

98. Dr. Suhrawardy : Did you consider the question of a second chamber in connection with this, a second chamber consisting of Khans, to be nominated?—No, we have not considered any such thing, because, you see, our province is so small that it would have been a preposterous proposal.

Chairman : I think we must take the spokesman. I was going to ask Nawab Nawaz Khan first of all if he wished to put any questions.

99. Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : Only one, sir. I am not talking about the past; the past is past. If I understand rightly, you wish that the reforms should be in such a modified form as may suit both politically and financially the Khans as well as the local government. That is your chief desire?—No—also to satisfy the demands of the middle classes to a certain extent.

100. As the spokesman of the Khan class would you say it is the function of the Government to see that all other classes should be taken in, but you want reforms in a modified form suitable politically to the Government, and financially, too, and to your own class also?—Yes, and also to the people.

101. That is your chief desire?—Yes. We are the representatives of the people also.

102. Quite right; but you do not want the full-fledged reforms?—I do not understand full-fledged reforms. I think the Government of India Act covers our suggestions. They are absolutely according to law.

103. Chairman : I think it is clear, Nawab Sahib, that this particular document, which has been very carefully drawn up, is proposing a modified application.

Witness : We want to reconcile all sides.

104. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : I should like to ask one or two short questions. Do you think that the younger generation of the aristocracy have received or are receiving liberal education?—Yes.

105. Also are facilities available for the education of children of the Khans in this province?—There are many educational institutions, but I personally would like a separate institution on the lines of a public school, for the education of the younger generation of the aristocracy.

106. You have had a long experience both of the Punjab and of the North-West Frontier Province. What is your experience of the work of the younger generation of the aristocracy, both in the Punjab and in this province, and how does it compare with the work of members of the middle classes?—I myself have had a number of young gentlemen from the upper classes, from the nobility, serving in the Punjab in the provincial services in various capacities, and so far as I could see, their work was quite good. Of course, there may be brilliant men among the other classes, but the former fairly compared with all. They were not inferior, so far as one could see. If anything, in certain administrative matters, they were usually more useful.

107. What I mean is this. When compared to the members of the middle classes, what were the feelings of the people over whom they were exercising their powers?—People having some hereditary claim to their position naturally are looked upon, irrespective of the democratic spirit, with greater respect than persons who may not have that claim.

108. And what is your experience, particularly in the North-West Frontier Province, about this question?—I think here we have got quite a good number of officers from the Khans' families, and they are doing fairly well, and in the King's Commission rank mostly. Of course, in the army, the members of the aristocracy have been taken in this province and have given satisfaction.

109. Those who are serving in the superior civil service, their reputation is good?—I have no doubt they would not be there unless they were men of character, integrity and ability.

110. What proportion of the superior services in this province would you like to be reserved for the members of the aristocracy of this province?—I would like half the posts in this province, in the superior services.

111. Whatever is thrown open for the Indians, you would like half of it for the aristocracy?—Yes.

112. Whatever is thrown open to Indians, you would like half of that to be reserved for the aristocracy?—Yes. In the Punjab the rule was that some posts were thrown open to competition, which meant that anybody could come and compete for those appointments. Here, if we have reserved two appointments for the upper classes and two for competition in that way, I think our purpose will be served fairly.

113. But you would like half, at any rate, of the posts thrown open to Indians reserved for the aristocracy?—Yes.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : This matter is so important that it is practically a life and death question for the province. I will begin with a little explanation. The witness happens to be my class-fellow and my countryman, and so I have the privilege of putting a few simple questions to him, and I trust that he will not mind if I put them.

Chairman : Few and simple are most admirable words.

114. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I see that you do not like to use the words "full-fledged," but in your Memorandum you speak of reforms to which other people are aspiring?—It means full-fledged. I quite accept the word full-fledged to be applied to our representations.

115. I am rather glad that we are on the same platform as far as the introduction of reforms in the North-West Frontier Province is concerned. We want these reforms?—Yes.

116. The second question, on which there is a difference of opinion, is as to how the council is to be constituted. You suggest two-thirds nominated and one-third elected, is that so?—Yes. It is not my personal opinion entirely. It is the opinion of all the gentlemen who are sitting behind me.

117. I am just coming to that point. You know that ever since the Bray Committee Report there is this agitation and demand for reforms in this province?—Yes.

118. May I know whether you presided over a meeting held as late as the 25th September last, in which a resolution was passed asking for the so-called "full-fledged" reforms?—Yes.

119. Do I understand rightly that in that resolution no suggestion was made of two-thirds nomination?—Quite.

120. Do I understand rightly that as late as the 12th November, at a meeting of all parties of Muslims, the same demand was reiterated?—I do not know. I was not there.

121. I will read out the passage: "We repeat our emphatic request for all the reforms that are prevailing in other parts of India, and if by any reason we cannot get all those reforms as a separate unit, then we request that the five districts may be re-amalgamated with the Punjab, so that we may not be losing our rights in future and we shall give the Hindu and other non-Muslims minorities the same protection as is given elsewhere." Members of this deputation sitting behind you were there. What I should like to explain is that even up to the 13th there was no mention of nomination. The idea of nomination came between the 13th November and the 15th November, when the Khan Bahadur Sahib, the spokesman, gave the lead, and the idea sprang from some eight or ten persons and that their Memorandum had not seen the light of day up to the moment we came into this hall?—I protest against the last word.

Chairman : Would you forgive me for one moment, because we want to keep order here. Everything that has passed this morning has been very helpful to us, and I am obliged to you, Nawab Akbar Khan, for mentioning what you have mentioned; but, after all, the important thing for all of us in a Conference of this sort is to try by co-operation and listening to what others say to arrive at the best course. I do not blame anybody because he changes somewhat his view. I shall change my own view a good many times before I come to the end of this Statutory Commission.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Quite.

122. Chairman : I think it is quite right to have the fact brought out, and it seems to be the fact that some of these distinguished gentlemen were not quite so clear as to their present view as no doubt they are to-day. It happens in all countries. People pass resolutions, you know, and then afterwards they consult together and they come to the conclusion that it would be better to express their view in a rather modified way; and so it is not a fair way to put it to say that the Khans, or many of them, have at one time made a very advanced demand, and they have passed resolutions even in this very month expressing it, but we should remember that what they are now suggesting through the mouth of this gentleman is a revised view. We have been told it is the result of a discussion, and we must not treat it as though it had been the fixed opinion of everybody for a very long time past. Does not that put it fairly ?

(Several members of the deputation rose and expressed approval.)

Witness : Quite right, sir.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I could only expect this reply, i.e., that a man is changeable in his views and his ideas, even at the eleventh hour. I am quite satisfied, sir. I have no objection to that.

Witness : If you will ask your question I will answer it.

123. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : What is the underlying motive in suggesting this two-third nomination ?—It is to ensure the majority of the Khans.

124. You have stated in your Memorandum that the Khans exercise almost life and death influence ?—No; these are not my words.

125. If the Khans exercise considerable influence with their people, as stated in your Memorandum, why should you fear that the Khans will not be elected in a system of election or is your suggestion meant to strengthen the hands of the local administration ?—I have not stated a word about influence in my Memorandum. I simply stated that they are the leaders of the people. You have got the Memorandum with you and you can see it.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : It says that the Khans exercise great influence.

Chairman : Let me try and help you both. I think the position stands like this. The Memorandum speaks about the Khans, how the people follow their national leaders and so on. That means really that the Khans exercise leadership and I am sure they do. Then you put the question, Sir Abdul Qaiyum, very naturally. You ask if the Khans exercise such leadership on their followers is it really necessary to secure the Khans' position by nomination and whether they would not get their position secure even by election. People will have different opinions; but the opinion of this deputation is that that may be the system, but they still would prefer two-thirds nomination.

Witness : I also want to say one thing with your permission, sir. It has been stated that our Memorandum was finally settled this morning. I protest against it.

126. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I said that it saw the light of day this morning, though it was settled on the 16th ?—It was printed, published and shown to every one.

127. If the world had seen it the co-opted members would also have seen it ?—I do not know if I have to advertise by beat of drums that such and such a thing has been done. Everybody has signed it and everybody has seen it.

128. Chairman : I quite agree that it is not necessary that it should see the light of day at a particular moment but as a matter of fact this document has been prepared only quite recently ?—It has been prepared after consultation with everybody concerned, and I simply drafted it.

129. As a matter of fact I never saw the document myself until I sat in the Chair this morning. So it is quite right to say that the actual document is only quite recently prepared ?—It was written long before.

130. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Then you propose a council of your own with powers of legislation for the North-West Frontier Province with a majority of two-thirds nominated members ?—Yes.

131. May I know what is the underlying object of having this nomination instead of election ?—I have given my reasons in the Memorandum. I may say that our object is to reconcile every interest in the province, and at the same time to preserve the influence of the Khans for which we want to be assured of a majority and we think we have a claim to it.

132. You think that if an elective system is introduced the Khans may lose their influence ?—Yes, to a certain extent.

133. If they are the natural leaders and they possess great influence, may I know why they should lose influence when they are elected by their own constituency ?—We do not want to introduce a system to which our people are not accustomed. We do not want that any uncertainty may happen.

134. You know we all have those Khanships. Were they elected or were they nominated by somebody ?—I personally think that it is the prerogative of the Crown to select or nominate people to high positions. Our kings had always exercised autocratic powers in old times. I do not know the history of each and every family. But each of the members of the deputation here claims a descent from remote times.

135. So also the King or his representative has the power to create Khan Sahibs, Khan Bahadurs and Nawabs ?—I have not said a word about that. I am talking only about the men for whom I am speaking here.

136. If people are made Nawabs, Khan Sahibs and Khan Bahadurs, do they come on the same level with the rest ?—Yes, naturally.

137. Then you mean the list of Khan Sahibs and Khan Bahadurs, etc., is unlimited ?—I do not know about that. All I say is that our position is hereditary and Government has recognised us so. As for the distinction you make, it may be of recent growth or otherwise. We do not in any way object to the position held by any gentleman or to the appointment of anybody to a high position by the Government. We are speaking here about our own selves.

138. I do not mean to criticise you. But what I was saying was that if these Khan Sahibs, Khan Bahadurs and others were included in the list of Khans, there would be no limit to it ?—I do not know about that.

139. I have not got the answer to my question regarding nomination. Is your object not to impair the authority of the administration or not to impair the position of the Khans ?—The object is what I have already stated.

140. Is your Memorandum the result of consultation among you at a meeting ?—Yes.

141. Chairman : He said that they had a meeting for two days and they discussed it at that time.

Do you not think that it is on the whole fair that we must take it that this document does represent at present the views to which these gentlemen are committed; but it is open to the criticism—to which I am fully alive—that it has not been a long standing view and it has been the result of some change of opinion ? Is not that fair ?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : It is quite fair. But the point I was trying to bring out was that this represents the view of not more than eight or ten persons, that they were trying to get many signatures to the document, that they have failed to do so and that they have failed to get the signatures of even those whose names are given in the Memorandum.

Witness : I do not know anything about that. That is not correct.

Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : I may state that on the 19th of May there was a meeting held and it was then distinctly mentioned that two-thirds should be by nomination and one-third by election.

Chairman : I think we do not want to hear more about that. If there is anybody who wishes to let us have any further memorandum on the subject either explaining how the document came into existence or adding further signatures or contrasting different resolutions, you may be quite certain that the Statutory Commission and our colleagues will be very glad to listen; but we will not spend any more time on this subject this morning. There is a Hindu deputation—which is a very important one—waiting and we must not keep them waiting too long.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I now simply want to say that all these posters, etc., which the Commission see are for the introduction of reforms in the province and I want to impress that there is no real boycott.

142. Rai Bahadur Karam Chand : How many Mahomedans belonging to the city signed this Memorandum?—Only Captain Hisamuddin Khan who belongs to our party and is the only representative of the Khans in Peshawar city.

143. Is he a Government official?—Yes, but as a Rais of Peshawar he signed the document.

Memorandum submitted by the HINDU PARTY, North-West Frontier Province.

The case of the Hindus in the North-West Frontier Province is summarised below :—

RESOLUTION OF THE PROVINCIAL HINDU CONFERENCE.

1. The Resolution of the Provincial Hindu Conference, which was laid before the Sub-Committee of the Royal Commission, represents the view of the vast majority of the Hindu Community accurately. It ran as follows :—

"(a) The Reforms Scheme, in its entirety or otherwise, will neither be workable nor beneficial in the North-West Frontier Province, owing to the peculiar conditions, geographical, financial and political, obtaining in this Province, and that it is sure to be detrimental to good government and highly prejudicial to All-India interests;

"(b) The introduction of Election in the Local Bodies is not desirable in the interests of public tranquillity and communal harmony."

The question of Provincial autonomy, with a grant of full-fledged reforms on population basis, and Special Electorates for different communities, is not acceptable to the Hindus. The Hindus in this Province are not wanting in a desire for political advancement along with the rest of India, but situated as they are, are opposed to reforms on communal basis or population strength. The former is the negation of nationalism for which they stand here as elsewhere, and the latter gives no real indication of the All-India or Provincial importance of the minorities.

THE MEMORANDUM.

2. Weighty reasons in support of the Hindu opposition to the introduction of constitutional changes would be found in the Memorandum submitted by Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta, Retired District Judge, the spokesman of the Hindu Deputation now before the Commission.

3. These may briefly be categorised as follows :—

(i) The reasons, which led Lord Curzon to separate the North-West Frontier Province from the Punjab, were purely strategic and political. His Lordship was of opinion that the Gateway of India should be controlled by the Central Government, and it has since been so controlled. These reasons, which led to the formation of a new Province, still hold good, and indeed, with greater force in view of the momentous changes taking place in its immediate vicinity.

(ii) The inseparability of the settled Districts from the unadministered Tracts, which are inhabited by wild, fanatic and warlike tribes with whom the Pathan population here have close ties of kinship and sympathy.

(iii) This province is a heavy deficit province, its revenues are supplemented by large contributions from the Indian exchequer. There is no possibility that this province will ever be self-supporting. It is inconceivable that the Central Government, or the Central Legislature will forego its control over a province which is maintained mainly from the resources of the Central revenues. The Hindu Conference thinks that this ground alone should suffice to dismiss the question of any cataclysmic changes as beyond the range of practical politics.

(iv) The people living in the North-West Frontier Province are only geographically separated from the Kingdom of Afghanistan. Any constitutional changes, which weaken the executive authority in the settled districts, must be impolitic and dangerous to the peace of the Empire, and shake the confidence of the non-Pathan population in the competency of Government to defend them against internal commotion, and the ever-increasing external pressure which in a very short time may alter the History of India.

(v) The importance and complexity of the problems of defence require the matter always to be left in the hands of Central Government. A large majority of the inhabitants belong to turbulent, excitable Pathans and quasi-Pathans with their feuds and factions.

(vi) The Hindus want to be on terms of peace and amity with their Mahomedan neighbours, and do not like to make any reflections on Pathan mentality, or their possible dreams of the reconquest of India some day when the Central Authority weakens. Even if this were impossible, it must shake the foundation of security of the people not only of the inhabitants of the North-West Frontier Province but of the Punjab too. Hindus have unfortunately been made too weak in this Province. by separation from the Punjab, to be of any real help.

(vii) The trans-frontier tribes are a standing menace to the peace and good administration of the settled districts. It is well-known that their raids and dacoities, kidnappings and murders, are mainly directed against the Hindu population who offer suitable targets, being inoffensive by nature but wealthy as a class. Moreover, belonging as they do to a different religion, for which the fanatical element on the border has a deep-rooted aversion, and engaged in money-lending business, are looked down upon with contempt and hatred as karars and kafirs. The Forward Policy is the only sound measure to secure peace and order on the Frontier, but this can never commend itself to the Pathans. Though they occasionally suffer with us from depredations of the border tribes, yet they sympathise with their love of independence and bravery, having ties of blood and religion with them: and consequently disliking this Policy would always thwart and weaken the same by their opposition.

(viii) It is a notorious fact that one-third of the Indian Army costing about 20-25 Crores of Rupees is maintained for the defence of the Frontier, and that another one-third is maintained for what is technically known as covering troops. The result being that about 40–50 Crores of Rupees from the revenues of India are annually spent for defending the frontier. With the rapid development of the air force, by independent kingdoms, aided possibly by certain hostile European powers, there will be a growing pressure upon its resources to keep pace with the armaments strengthened to destroy British Imperialism in India. Nothing should be done which may, for keeping internal peace, make larger demands on our military resources.

(ix) The Khans have been and are the natural leaders of men on the Border, but their power and influence, which has been the bulwark and an important safeguard against the unruly elements in the Province, are likely to suffer.

4. The policy of separating the five settled districts from the Punjab, and placing them under a Chief Commissioner concerned with the administration of comparatively uncivilized tribes, has resulted, as a pure accident of that policy, in reducing the Hindu minority from about 40 per cent. in the Punjab, to 7 per cent. in the N.-W. F. P. We believe that it could never have been intended to benefit the Mahomedans here at the expense of Hindus, with a view to weaken the latter's importance or influence.

5. The religion of the Hindus does not influence their political action, but unfortunately the action of the Mahomedans is largely a matter of their religion. The Hindus of the N.-W. F. P. feel that the outlook of their Mahomadan brethren in asking for full-fledged Reforms in a deficit miniature Province, close to Afghanistan and to the unruly wild tribes, on the basis of their numerical strength, is not purely political but Islamic; not merely on unselfish patriotic grounds, but in a vague ambition to attain uncontrolled domination for ever over the helpless minorities, including a major community in the rest of India, practically as a sort of hostage to secure their peculiar demands under influence of Pan-Islamism.

6. As long as the dominant community in this Province has not reached that stage of political education and advancement, where politics is dissociated from religion, and religion from the affairs of public life, any Government savouring of democracy could not safely be entrusted to it, and provincial autonomy on communal lines would not be at all acceptable to the Hindus.

7. As at present situated, we are extremely alive to the sense of a great real danger to All-India interests, and to the British Administration, or the authority of the Central Government itself, by a sudden transfer of power from British Officers to a Muslim majority, determined to work the Reforms on purely communal lines.

8. Our Conference thinks that the immediate problems calling for action can best be dealt with by a neutral government, such as we have at the present moment, but in order to assist that government in getting acquainted with the needs of the people, as also to give them training in the working of political institutions, we shall have no objection to the formation of an Advisory Council, the constitution of which should not proceed upon any artificial consideration of racial ratio, but upon the broad grounds that those who make the largest contribution to the revenues of the province, and have imbibed the spirit of modern progress and democratic principles, should be associated in the work of preliminary political education. It may be pointed out that according to the Census of 1921, out of 12,22,379 Muslim males, only 32,326 or less than 3 per cent. were literates, and of these only 3,979 knew English; whereas out of 1,37,283 Hindu males, 47,608 or nearly 35 per cent. were literates, and 6,041 English educated.

9. In order to assure both communities of the solicitude of Government, that a further political advancement would be given to the province as soon as it is suitably equipped, we would suggest that the Central Government be empowered by statute to hold periodical enquiries into the desirability of further extending self-governing institutions into the province, as time and occasion may demand and justify.

10. Our Conference further desires that since the Central Government is responsible for the good government of the Frontier Province, it should be adequately represented in the Central Legislature, and for such representation we would suggest that two Hindus and two Mahomedans be returned to the Legislative Assembly, while from a joint electorate three members be returned to the Council of State.

11. The Hindus of this province pay as much as about 80 per cent. of the income tax, and their share of the land revenue is also considerable as they still possess some lands. They, therefore, claim that their representation in the Local and Imperial Councils should be commensurate with their contributions to the Provincial and Indian exchequers.

12. Side by side with the political development of the inhabitants on sound non-communal lines, the educational and industrial development of the Province should be vigorously pushed forward, so that in due course of time the Province may become financially self-supporting, and be no longer a burden, as at present, on the general revenues of India.

13. We are opposed to the policy of favouring any one community at the expense of the other, and strongly object to the Mahomedanisation of the services which has been going on for years in this Province. We advocate the recruitment of the public services, in practice as in theory, without any regard to caste, colour, or creed, on personal merit and qualifications alone, and not on grounds of religion or family influence, and as far as practicable by free and open competitive examinations conducted by the Civil Service Commissioners.

14. We are strongly in favour of the judicial amalgamation of this Province with the Punjab, under the Lahore High Court, with a Bench of two judges stationed at Peshawar, and regard it as a measure calculated to secure full public confidence in British administration of law and order, so vital to the good interests of India as a whole. The resolution to this effect was passed in the Legislative Assembly on 21st September, 1921, but we have not been able to understand on what grounds the Government has not carried out its recommendations. A small province like ours with only five districts cannot possibly ensure that degree of judicial efficiency which is a bulwark of peace and contentment for the people of British India.

15. We would respectfully but strongly urge that the Land Alienation Act, which accentuates the existing divisions and creates statutory castes, should be repealed without delay. Expropriation of small holders, for whose protection the act was professedly passed, is going on, though they do not get the full market price for their land. In this the Hindus have, moreover, a real grievance; their lands may be sold to others, but they are debarred from acquiring proprietary rights in land, and are thus precluded from taking up agriculture as a profession. The economic and real interests of the province suffer because they can not invest their capital for its improvement by scientific methods.

Deputation of the PROVINCIAL HINDU CONFERENCE.

The Deputation consisted of :—

PESHAWAR.

1. Rai Bahadur Beli Ram, M.A., LL.B., Advocate.

23. Seth Gulab Chand, Muncipal Commissioner.

24. Lala Neb Raj, Honorary Magistrate.

25. Lala Tikkal Lal, Contractor.

144. Chairman : Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta, you are going to act as the spokesman for the deputation? —Yes; but with your permission I would ask my friend Rai Bahadur Diwan Chand to read out the case for the Hindus.

(Memorandum read out, see p. 256.)

* * * * * * * * * *

145. Chairman : You wanted to address us, Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta?—Not particularly, sir. I am here to give the Conference any information they may require. The only point that I wanted to make clear was that the Hindus here do want protection. They want their rights and privileges to be safeguarded, because in the matter of education, political advancement, and commercial interests the Hindus in this province are in exactly the same position as the Europeans are in the whole of India. In the whole of India they are given greater representation and also certain privileges simply because they are politically advanced as also in the matter of education, and also because their commercial interests are superior to those of all the others. On these grounds we submit that we have to ask you to give us our rights. The other ground that we have urged in our Memorandum is that we were separated from the Punjab for no fault of ours. There we had been 40 per cent. of the population and whatever might have been the outcome of these constitutional changes, we would have got 40 per cent. voting strength.

146. Chairman : I am impressed with that point, and I may say everybody would be. You do not mind if I just correct the figure which you gave just now, because we have been studying it in the Punjab. The fact briefly is that in the Punjab the Hindus are just over 30 per cent. of the population. Even if you were to include everybody except Mahomedans and Sikhs, they would only be 32 per cent., but in fact the Hindus are just over 30 per cent. of the population. I quite appreciate your point. Your point is that had it not been for the separation of the North-West Frontier which is very largely due to considerations which were not domestic considerations, but were due to special difficulties connected with the Frontier policy, had it not been for that, you gentlemen who live in this neighbourhood would have found yourselves joined up with a very large number of your own community. As it is, you are in numbers a very small body, but of course in commercial importance and intellectual standing you are a very important minority?—That is exactly our submission, sir. One thing I may say is this, that the sentiments of the Sikhs when we were separated from the Punjab in 1901 were with us. There has been some cleavage since, but we always think that the sympathies of the Sikhs, if any question of communal importance comes up, will mostly be with us, and so we include Sikhs also with us.

147. Even if you include Sikhs with the Hindus you may only get about 7 per cent.?—You have got the latest figures, but I speak of 1920–21. Then the Mussalmans were 54 per cent. and the others were 46.

148. You are talking about the Punjab?—Yes, sir.

149. You need not trouble yourself about that Here the Hindus and Sikhs added together will be about 7 per cent.?—Yes.

150. I think you will agree with me that in order to save time and get at any rate some of the questions done, we need not go over this Memorandum again, because, if I may say so, I regard this document, which has been read to us and your own document, as extremely clear and full, and they provide me at any rate with a great deal of the arguments from the Hindu point of view which I wanted to know. Therefore we need not spend time in repeating by word of mouth what has been clearly laid down in the Memorandum.

You have referred at the beginning of your memorandum to the Resolution of the Provincial Hindu Conference, which was laid before the sub-committee of the Royal Commission. That was a document which was presented to two or three of us who visited the Frontier on behalf of the Commission in February. That document I see is signed by Mr. Mehr Chand Khanna as the Secretary of the North-West Frontier Provincial Hindu Conference, and it reads: "The representative Hindus of Peshawar, Dera Ismail Khan, Bannu, Kohat, and Hazara, assembled in a Provincial Conference held at Peshawar on 27th March, 1928, place on record their considered opinion that"—and then follows what is given in this Memorandum?—If you will allow me, sir, I will only say that resolutions to this effect were also passed in 1926 by the various Hindu Sabhas of this Province, and copies of these resolutions have also been given as an appendix at the end of my Memorandum.

151. Major Attlee: In your paragraph on constitutional advance you suggest the formation of an advisory council. Would that in your opinion be a nominated or elected body?—I have given some details there, but what I want to make clear is, it is not as if we suggest an advisory council. I say that if Government decides upon giving that on the lines suggested, we shall have no objection. As regards how they should be nominated, I have said that we have got a very good electorate now in the municipalities and district boards. The district boards and the municipalities are nominated bodies, but they represent fully the different classes of the population, as also their various interests. The district boards and the municipalities can be given a right to elect among themselves by what you might call an indirect method of election. That I believe was the case before the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms began.

152. Mr. Cadogan: In paragraph 14 you suggest judicial amalgamation of this province with the Punjab. We have received a certain amount of criticism of that suggestion on the score that it will involve a very intolerable delay?—We have provided that a Bench of two judges should sit at Peshawar with the same powers that the judicial commissioners exercise now. What we submit is that as regards judicial commissioners we have not got the proper persons to enlist from, and when even temporary vacancies occur one has to come from the Punjab and the other comes from Bombay. This province has not got the material to provide for the higher posts. And another thing I want to suggest is that the judicial commissioners here do not have the same respect for their decisions as the High Court judges have. The High Court judges will have higher status when hearing cases. And there is a third reason, and that is that when the two judges disagree sometimes there will be available a third judge in the Lahore High Court to decide whose decision should hold good. Therefore, if you have a High Court to draw upon, then the status of the judges will increase and you will have a safer remedy in the case of differences of opinion.

153. Lord Strathcona: . . . Have you considered what form of franchise you would suggest?—The members of the district boards and the members of the municipal committees. Those are the members who will be electors.

154. Do you mean that there should be a franchise for appointment to the district boards and municipalities, etc.?—No.

155. Chairman: You mean the district boards will be the electors?—Exactly, and the municipal committees.

156. Lord Strathcona: At page 111* on the question of services you say that the number of British civilians should be increased, and so on. Do you mean that to be only a special recommendation as applied to the North-West Frontier Province?—Yes, exactly. Because here the communal question owing to the Pathan mentality is very acute, and also we have had some experience. We are not saying that merely on theoretical grounds, but we have experience that if we get city magistrates, or subdivisional magistrates from one community or another, there are always grievances, and there are always complaints, and the only way in which to neutralise all this is by having civilians for the three posts, viz., deputy commissioners, city magistrates, and sub-divisional officers.

157. Will it be fair to say that in your opinion there are not sufficient British officers?—Yes. I will say that not only it is not sufficient, but that there ought to be more civilians in the province.

158. Dr. Suhrawardy: You claim adequate representation for the Hindus in your memorandum. Am I right in inferring that you claim separate electorates for the Hindu minority?—As regards separate electorates, it should be decided as an All-India question; we are opposed to election for this province.

159. You say that you claim adequate representation. It involves the question of separate electorates?—No.

160. Will you kindly explain what you mean by saying that the representation of the Hindus in the local and imperial councils should be commensurate with their contributions to the provincial and Indian exchequers?—I have explained in my memorandum that the advisory council should elect members to the Legislative Assembly, and the Chief Commissioner will nominate members to the Council of State. My idea is that the advisory council will elect the members if Government decided to constitute it.

161. And there the Hindu representation should be commensurate with their contribution to the provincial and Indian exchequers?—Yes.

* Memo. by Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta Dhawan not printed.

162. Can you give me an idea of what you mean by saying "adequate representation?" You claim that on the ground of your wealth, education, and other considerations you should have adequate representation?—What we mean is that the representation should be equitable. We have stated that two Hindus and two Muhammadans should be returned to the Legislative Assembly, and three members from a joint electorate to the Council of State.

163. And what about the local council which you mention in paragraph 11?—It means an advisory council.

164. You have given reasons in the memorandum for opposing the introduction of constitutional changes. Were these reasons advanced before the Bray Enquiry Committee?—That committee had nothing to do with the constitutional changes. The question then mainly was whether we should be amalgamated with the Punjab or not.

165. But the amalgamation with the Punjab involved the introduction of reforms. Were these reasons for your opposition to the introduction of the reforms placed before that committee?—That could not be done then. Had the Government sanctioned the amalgamation, the Hindus would have been 40 per cent. of the population on the whole.

166. But you are now giving strategic and political reasons?—Those are admitted by all including the Bray Committee, so far as the Frontier Province is concerned.

167. May I take it that these reasons are advanced now for the first time?

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan: May I say that at that time when the enquiry was made these gentlemen were for amalgamation with the Punjab and they wanted full-fledged reforms for these five districts? Now they are opposing the reforms for these districts on different grounds. These reasons were not advanced then because they wanted amalgamation with the Punjab.

168. Chairman: I think it must be so, because I have read the Bray report. I rather gather from what I have just heard that this is the position: that at the time of the enquiry presided over by Sir Denys Bray in 1922 the body of opinion—a very important body of opinion—which is now before us, was disposed to urge the amalgamation with the Punjab of at any rate a portion of the North-West Frontier Province, feeling that if they were thus amalgamated the Hindu community living here would find itself associated with the Hindus of the Punjab. If there was an amalgamation of that sort of the five administered districts with the Punjab, naturally the constitution of the Punjab would apply to these districts. Now then the position is that very formidable arguments—right or wrong—have been put forward which in the view of some people show that there is some difficulty in amalgamating the five districts with the Punjab. That being so, the Hindu deputation has, of course, to reconsider its position, and I gather that in that new situation the view they are disposed to take is this: "If there was not going to be the rejoining of the Hindus here with the Hindus of the Punjab, and if we have to depend entirely upon local rearrangement, then in that event we take the view which is set out in this memorandum." That is a fair account, I suppose?—Exactly. I may also state that if these districts had been amalgamated with the Punjab the Pathan members who would thus have gone to the Punjab council would have been only five or six per cent. and would have been Indianised. Taking the Pathan mentality here into consideration we cannot accept their domineering over us. There is another point. The agitation with regard to the Bray Committee was due to the fact that there was raiding and kidnapping going on at that time, and we could not bear it. Hence the forward policy of the Government which subsequently followed, as a result of which raids and kidnapping have almost ceased now and the case then put forward for amalgamation with the Punjab almost disappears.

169. Dr. Suhrawardy: You have just stated that you are not in favour of the amalgamation of your province with the Punjab?—That is my personal view. We have said nothing about it in the memorandum.

170. You are entirely opposed to the introduction of reforms in this province?—Yes.

171. It is not only your personal view, but that of the whole community?—Yes.

172. What do you mean by saying representation on communal lines? Do you mean that there should be separate electorates for Hindus and Muhammadans?—We do not want election.

173. If you do not want election, then the objection to communal lines disappears?—What we say is that if these reforms are thrust on us as a result of their introduction all over India they should not be on communal lines.

174. Are you prepared to withdraw your opposition to the reforms if there is a joint electorate in the North-West Frontier Province?—No. If it is a settled fact that there should be reforms all over India and if you are going to thrust them on us too, then we say whatever form you are giving to India, you will give us also.

175. Then how do your other reasons disappear? What has the joint electorate in the rest of India got to do with the reasons which you have advanced here? Will the Pathan mentality change? Will the dreams of Mussalmans change? Or do you think that the abolition of communal electorates in other parts of India will make the position of the Hindus in the Frontier Province so strong that you will not then object to the introduction of reforms?—If the whole of India gets another instalment of the reforms and there is a Legislative Assembly the Hindus will have a majority in the Assembly and we may be able to seek protection at their hands and let us hope that the Pathans here will not be able to persecute us. But we run the risk.

176. In other words you object to the introduction of the reforms because it will result in the domination of the Mussalmans in the legislature here?—Of the Pathans.

177. If your argument were to prevail, then the Mussalmans of the Madras presidency may advance the same arguments and say as they are in a minority there and the Hindus are in an overwhelming majority, no reforms should be introduced there?—The conditions here are quite different from those of Madras.

(Rai Sahib Mehr Chand): I beg to submit that in the first place the same peculiar conditions which prevail here do not prevail in Madras. As the leader of the deputation Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta has mentioned, there is the question of the Pathan mentality. In the next place, unlike the Muhammadans in Madras, we Hindus here have great stake in the shape of commercial interests, in the shape of political advance, in the shape of education and so on.

178. That may be a claim for your getting separate representation in the event of the introduction of the reforms in proportion to your numerical strength as well as on the ground of your education?—(Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta): We only wanted to meet your argument.

179. You say you do not want the introduction of the reforms here because it will result in the domination of the Muslims over the Hindus?

Chairman: What the witness says is that it is not a complete parallel. It may be quite true that the Muhammadans of Madras are a very small minority just as the Hindus in the North-West Frontier Province; but he says there are two differences. In the first place—rightly or wrongly—the Hindu minority here are deeply concerned with what he calls the Pathan mentality and there is nothing corresponding to that in Madras. Secondly, he says, it is true that we are a small minority but intellectually and commercially we are very important and that it is not the same in Madras. I do not say that I quite agree with him but that is his position.

180. Dr. Suhrawardy : I want to know whether you are in any way connected with the Hindu Mahasabha and whether your Deputation share the views of the great Hindu leader of the Nationalist Party whose premature death the whole of India laments, I mean Lala Lajpat Rai?—No; we never went to them nor were we ever invited.

181. I am referring to the resolution passed by that Sabha in March, 1928?—They never invited us, nor did they visualise our peculiar position.

AFTERNOON.

1. Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : Rai Bahadur Sahib . . . I think that you are opposed to the introduction of full-fledged Reforms (not partial, as you have recommended that) on three main grounds, communal, political and financial. Is that so?—You have not said geographical.

2. I take it in a sense political includes geographical also. Your first ground is communal, that is the Hindu point of view, and in regard to that, I quite agree with you that you are entitled to have that. The other two are political and financial. You have seen my memorandum and I have also not agreed for full-fledged Reforms for this province on those two grounds, viz., political and financial. Therefore I do not want to discuss those two points. But as regards the communal grounds on which you have based your opposition it leads me to think that there are still two points to be considered. One is whether a Hindu or a Mussalman opposes the Reforms on account of his bigotedness. That is out of the question. The other point is this that you are afraid of the interests of your own community and that you want to safeguard them. Therefore, supposing such a form of Reforms were granted to the province which would not interfere with the present or the future rights of your community, would you welcome those Reforms?—Our objection to the Reforms is not on communal grounds, but it is based on the mentality of the Pathan community. They will be fighting among themselves and crime will increase involving everyone. And I believe that all this will occur whether there are Hindus here or not, and our Hindu point of view is that these Reforms will prove a great disaster.

3. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : If such Reforms are given in which your rights are well protected and safeguarded, then you will not object to that?—In the present circumstances that is impossible.

4. If it is impossible it is another matter. But if it is possible?—That is a hypothetical question. I know that it is impossible anyway.

Chairman : His view is that taking a practical view of the situation it does not seem to him that it will work.

Witness : Yes, sir.

5. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Rai Bahadur I have only one question to ask and it is this, that as a minority do you think that you have a right to prevent the advance of a whole people?—In their own interest, yes.

6. In whose interest?—In the interest of the majority—the Pathans.

7. But they want it. Are you their guardian?—I am not their guardian, but I know what will happen. The agitation is recent since the Bray Committee of 1922 by a few persons; prior to that, no one heard of reforms for this province.

8. And they do not know it?—They may or may not know it. They will fight between themselves. Also I submit that what I say is in the interest of the whole of India. If there were trouble here, then the whole of India will have to suffer. Besides, one crore and thirteen lakhs of rupees a year (Budget 1928-29) are contributed by the Indian Government for the civil administration of the settled districts and they must have a voice in it. Another one crore and twenty-five lakhs is given for the frontier tribes in the Agency Tracts. It is really an Imperial question.

9. * * * It is my general impression that your fear is that in the present condition of affairs beyond the frontier, if a measure of Reforms is given to this province, the Hindus will suffer?—The Hindus will suffer, and also all the Indians for the matter of that. The Hindus are after all only a part and parcel of the whole of India. The separation of the two parties is impracticable.

10. Do you think that an awakening of the Muhammadans is taking place and that the Hindus will take part in it?—There is no such awakening in the masses. If there is any awakening, we will not object to it. As at present, it will only excite passion which will injure people for nothing.

11. But do you not think that there is perfect peace in Afghanistan and other countries bordering on India?—That is a new thing you are saying. You speak of Amir Amanullah. He has got his own peculiar way, and we have yet to see what it is, and he may ultimately find that things are not happening according to his own views. Anyhow, that, I believe, is outside our sphere.

12. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : Rai Bhadur, supposing a council is granted to this province, have you any objection to its composition in the way put forward by the Khans, that is, two-thirds nomination and one-third election?—Any legislative council here will be a great disaster to the country, but if the Government is going to give it, I would rather have two-thirds nominated. I am not for it, but out of the two evils I will select the lesser one.

13. Do you think that one-third election in the council will have some effect on the influence and power of the Khans of this province?—Oh! Yes. As one-third goes there by election, you will find that the power of the Khans will diminish, because the others will probably be intellectually abler than the Khans. If the intellectually abler lawyers will go there, the Khans will get lesser influence.

14. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : Do you think that the officers recruited from the aristocracy of this province compare better with those of the middle classes? You have long experience of the North-West Frontier Province. What do you say?—I would not give an answer, if you do not press it.

15. All right. May I ask you how a reduction in the number of British officers in the civil administration will affect the administration in this province?—Most injuriously.

16. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You have been put questions as if there was a competition between the minority and the majority community. I understood that your view-point is entirely different. Your view-point appears to be this, that you class yourself as a politically advanced community and you base your claim upon the fact of your political advancement, and it does not matter whether you are in a majority or minority, you want special rights because of your advancement?—Yes, and also because of our commercial interest.

17. And you have large commercial interests?—Yes.

18. Now, as regards the questions put to you on the subject of the creation of an advisory council, supposing an advisory council were instituted for this province, and the rest of India were to get a larger measure of Reforms—we will assume that—would you not think that that would be a ground for the Frontier Province to cry for more, or will they possibly accept that position which is assigned to them of having only an advisory council?—Hence we are opposed to it.

19. Do you not think that because the Central Government keeps you up by making a large annual subsidy, if you have a larger representation from the five districts and also a Frontier provincial committee to co-operate with the Foreign secretary, that would sufficiently meet the case?—Yes, that will do.

Chairman: You have described it as a Frontier provincial committee. Would you mind developing it a bit? Is that committee to be nominated or elected?

20. Sir Hari Singh Gour: (To the witness) You find that the facts are these, and you have to face the facts. The Central Government for a long time to come has to maintain the balance between the revenue and expenditure in the frontier districts. Consequently it is outside the pale of practical politics, so far as you can see, that the Central Government should finance you and have no say in the matter at all. Therefore, you must give some voice to the Central Government. Now at the same time you have an aspiration that you must advance along with the rest of India. Supposing you have a larger representation from the five frontier districts of, say, five or seven members—I shall come to the question of how that representation should be later; that is a different question—and you have also the Foreign Secretary in the Government of India, who generally supervises the work of the local Government, and this committee along with the Foreign Secretary becomes a sort of quasi-council to deal with the Frontier Province, now you will have the control of the Central Government, you will have the control of the Viceroy and the Legislative Assembly generally, and you will have your special interests represented in the special committee dealing with the special questions. Would that not satisfy your legitimate aspirations?—Would we be allowed to go to the Legislative Assembly?

21. Of course it will be a part of the Legislative Assembly comprised of the members of the province?—We are for it.

22. Chairman: It is only a sketch and I understand the idea to be that the representatives in the Central Legislature of the five districts in the North-West Frontier Province will be increased, so that they will have in the Central Legislature more voice. But in addition to being members of the Central Legislature they will be members for the North-West Frontier Province of some sort of council or something of the kind which would have (I do not know whether it will have advisory or other powers) at any rate, advisory powers with the Foreign Secretary in reforms to local affairs. That is the kind of scheme?

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Yes.

Witness (Rai Bahadur Diwan Chand): Such a thing will give us an opportunity to place our views* before the authority and on the information we place before them they will be able to take any action they think fit.

Witness: (Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta) On the supposition that we shall have sufficient representation there.

23. Chairman: That is another point. If we are simply to say that the voters in each of the five districts should elect a representative each, it does not seem very probable that the representatives would be representatives of the Hindu feeling. I think then you would not have a very good chance. But perhaps you would be prepared to consider as part of the scheme the idea that some places should be reserved for Hindus?—To my mind it may weaken the Hindu voice in the Assembly.

24. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Consult the members of your deputation and let us have your considered views. At any rate I suppose you are disposed to consider the details?—We do not know the details now.

25. You will work out the details and you will be quite prepared to submit a memorandum?—Yes.

26. Lord Burnham: Would that be leaving the members of the Assembly as they are at present?

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I suppose the number of the members of the Assembly will have to be increased.

Lord Burnham: To how much?

Sir Hari Singh Gour: To 250.

27. I just wish to read to you a passage from the Memorandum of the Advanced Hindu Party. It is stated therein: "The root cause is that the Indian officer is a servant of the foreign masters, and does not care what his Indian fellow subjects think about him. The European officer who controls his destiny has no contact with the mass of Indian population." You have stated that you would like to increase the strength of the European officials in this province. Do you agree with the statement I have just now read?—No.

28. Have you any suggestions to make in view of the fact that Parliament has declared the policy to be the larger association of Indians in the administration of their country? Do you think that if Indians with unbiassed minds were appointed to the Frontier Province, the difficulty would be solved?—Yes, I think so.

29. What you really want is unbiassed and efficient men and not exactly Europeans?—Yes, and at present we see these qualifications only in the British officers.

30. You have stated in your Memorandum that you claim adequate representation. What would be a fair proportion of Hindu representation for these five districts as compared with the representation of the Mussalmans, say in a Legislative Assembly or any council that may be constituted for the Frontier Province?—Forty per cent.

31. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: You say: "To avoid intrigue and faction none but British officers should be appointed deputy commissioners, sub-divisional officers and city magistrates." This applies only to the North-West Frontier Province?—Yes.

32. Not to the rest of India?—No.

33. Why?—Because in the rest of India the people who get into the service are not of the same mentality as the Pathans here.

34. There is no intrigue and faction there?—There may be, but the conditions are quite different.

35. Sir Abdul Qaiyum: Is it on account of the incapacity of the Muslims of this province you are afraid of the introduction of the reforms or is it on account of the insecurity of your rights and privilleges?—On both the accounts

36. Can you tell me in what way the reforms are going to affect you. Are you afraid of the mentality of the Mussalmans after the introduction of the reforms more than what you do now?—Yes; because the Pathans will get more power then.

37. How do you think they get more power?—Taking the present reforms in the Punjab into consideration, do you know what are the transferred subjects administered by the Ministers?—Yes.

38. Do you think that improving a few roads here and there or the opening of a few schools here and there or some other similar things will put you in a more dangerous position?—That is only a part. If there are reforms, there will be a legislative council with great powers. They will have votes and they will be able to pass laws which may affect us adversely' and they will also have a voice in the apportionment of finance. All these things will follow the reforms. Then again the Ministers will have a voice in the general administration of the province because they will be associated with the Government. They will be part and parcel of the Government, having authority to enact laws.

39. There will be the right of veto?—That right of veto cannot be exercised on many occasions. That is a very inconvenient thing and it might be exercised once in a way, but it cannot be exercised forty or fifty times. It can be exercised only in emergent cases, and it will not be exercised in the case of every measure that the Pathans will enact. If the Governor begins to exercise his power in every case he will be called autocratic and so on.

40. You do not remember any cases in which you have raised your voice saying that the authorities were autocratic without any control from the people and that the country was lawless and so on and wanted reforms?—I do not follow the question.

41. Do you not think that even now there is a hue and cry occasionally from both the Muslims and the non-Muslims that the present rule is autocratic, that the people want more control, some sort of control over their affairs or more association with the Government and so on?—As practical men we have to see which is the greater of the evils. The greater evil is the Pathans getting power. As regards autocracy my own view is that the British officer cannot be autocratic, because he is bound by certain codes, rules and regulations while I cannot reconcile myself to the view that if we had a Pathan deputy commissioner, he will ever care for the rules and regulations.

42. You are afraid of the Pathan deputy commissioner?—I say it only as an example.

43. You object to the laws being elaborate or the public being consulted in the framing of laws and you would rather leave it to the Central Government to enact the laws for you?—If it is the Central Legislative Assembly, we have got both the Hindus and Mahomedans there and we need not fear anything. (Rai Bahadur Diwan Chand): I would like to add one thing. This province can only be gradually fitted for the reforms. At present in view of the Pathan mentality, democratic institutions cannot be safely entrusted to them. If better times come we shall have no objection to the introduction of the reforms.

44. Sir Abdul Qaiyum: When this question of Muslim mentality comes in I can hardly control my feelings; but I shall try to be quite mild and will put you the question. Considering the happenings in other parts of India do you think that our mentality is worse than that of other Indians elsewhere?—(Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta): I do not say worse. I say you are excitable, you are passionate, you go to factions and in no other part of India do these conditions exist.

45. If we fight we fight amongst ourselves; how does that harm you? If we get reforms you will also have the advantage?—When the fire begins to burn it does not make a distinction. When you fight among yourselves the Hindus will be trembling, being afraid that it may be their turn next. They too suffer on account of your fights. We do not want you to fight. We want that you should change that mentality.—(Rai Sahib Mehr Chand): May I give one example? You had your Shia and Sunni fight at Kohat some time ago and on account of that the Hindus who happened to be in the Shia territory numbering about 400, had to leave the territory and suffered great hardships.

46. In the tribal area the Hindus are in a small minority. How do you find the Muslim mentality there? Are the Hindus ever being touched by the Mussalmans?—(Rai Bahadur Thakur Datta): My information is that the Hindus in the tribal area are not considered to be equal to the Mussalmans. They are considered to be dependents or serfs. They have no freedom to do anything. We do not want to be reduced to that condition. If we Hindus here are to be treated in the same way as the Hindus in the tribal area are treated, then we would rather leave your province and go elsewhere. This is the reason why we object to your getting the dominance in this province.

47. I quite see that your fear is that you being in a minority, if the Mussalmans who are in a majority are given more powers, you will suffer at their hands. So it is more a question of safety for your own community than the mentality of the Mussalmans. Because I may say, whatever the Pathan crimes and offences are, they are for personal gain; that is, whenever we have anything to gain, then possibly we may go in for committing a crime. But do you agree that we have not in the last decade or even the last thirty years committed any crime, like the murder of Mr. Day in Calcutta or similar crimes in other parts of India?—Such crimes elsewhere are only sporadic. You have it in your memory that six hundred Hindus and Sikhs were expelled from the frontier simply on account of their religion. The Kohat tragedy was based on religion. The Pathan mentality here is quite different from any conditions elsewhere in India.

48. What do you think of the Kartarpur mentality where people were burnt alive?—I say these are only sporadic cases due to fanaticism on the part of some people. They are only rare occurrences. But here it is an everyday occurrence. That is due to the mentality here. In the cases you quote, the moment the Government controls the thing it disappears and you hear no more about the incident. But here it is a permanent recurring thing notwithstanding the best efforts of Government and of its officers.

49. Can you give me any instance where a riot of the magnitude of the Kohat riot has been compromised in any other part of India, while we on the frontier have compromised our differences?—Has a riot of that magnitude occurred anywhere else?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum: I remind you of the incident at Nagpur where your community has an overwhelming majority.

Chairman: I think, Sir Adbul Qaiyum, the difference between you and the witness is quite clear. You recognise that he has expressed his view—right or wrong—and you have indicated quite clearly the grounds on which you criticise it. May I suggest with great respect that we shall not get much further on that question. We are only ascertaining the view of this deputation and you do not expect to bring them to a different view.

50. Sir Abdul Qaiyum: You have also mentioned some financial difficulties which may follow the introduction of reforms. May I know whether in the formation of provinces in India the important question is the financial question or the linguistic question to be considered or the tribal question?

Chairman: I do not think I shall attach very great importance to individuals answering to the question. We shall all agree, I am sure, that of course financial considerations are important. I perfectly understand that the North-West Frontier Province should be regarded as performing a function in the matter of defence for India as a whole, and in so far as it is performing a function for India as a whole it is quite reasonable that India as a whole has to help to bear the burden. That is quite fair and I do not think it is a matter for the witness to say.

Witness: I may say that the revenues of India are contributing one crore and twenty-five lakhs a year for the tribal territory. That is one thing. The settled districts which get another one crore and thirteen lakhs a year are doing nothing for the defence of India.

51. Dr. Suhrawardy: Do I understand you aright to say that in the event of communal electorate being abolished in the rest of India, you will have no objection to the introduction of reforms in this province?—No, I have never said so.

52. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Is this the opinion of the whole Hindu community or is there a class of Hindus who want the introduction of reforms ?—This is the opinion of the vast majority of the Hindus and if some Hindus have been put up by intrigue or otherwise to say something contradicting us, they should show whom they represent.

53. Recently it was published in papers that there was a meeting of 5,000 people in your town where a resolution was passed urging the introduction of the reforms ?—I was then present at Dera Ismail Khan. Out of that number you may take away 4,500. Out of the remaining only a few were Hindus and out of these Hindus one who presided is a Hindu who has got no business at all; and the other is a motor driver.

54. Is not the person who contributed so many articles to the Press not a respectable person ?—I have not seen those articles.

Appendix (vide Q. 22, p. 262).

Letter from The Honorary Secretary, Provincial Hindu Conference, North-West Frontier Province, Peshawar, to The Chairman, Joint Free Conference, Peshawar.

Sir,

With reference to the suggestion made in the afternoon of 19th instant that the Frontier question might be solved by securing the election of five or seven members from the five settled districts of the N.W.F.P. to the Legislative Assembly and that these members with one or two others, if necessary, might constitute the North-West Frontier Committee with the Foreign Secretary as their Chairman, to advise upon all matters within the purview of the Punjab legislative council specially the framing of regulations which have the force of law in this province. We are directed to say, after careful discussion with the members of the Conference that they are unanimously of opinion that the suggestion is an ideal one to cope with the peculiar situation in this province.

2. The advantages of such an arrangement will be as follows:—

Firstly, It retains a sufficient measure of control in the Central Government who have to make good the annually recurring deficit.

Secondly. The Government of India will as at present retain a hold upon the Frontier Province which has a strategic value.

Thirdly. It satisfies the legitimate ambition of the people of this province to a greater participation in its administration and the fact that the deliberations of the committee will ordinarily be held away from the atmosphere charged with communalism, would be conducive to a better understanding between the two great communities resident therein.

Fourthly. It will give the representatives of this province an advantage of acquiring a wider experience in the art of government, which they could not possibly hope to do even if a full-fledged legislative council were installed here.

Fifthly. It will be the most economic arrangement, as it will entail no extra cost.

The members of our Association, therefore, feel after mature consideration that it should accord to the suggestion their fullest support and they do so accordingly.

3. We may add in this connection that if the number of Frontier members in the Assembly is raised to five, two seats should be allotted to Hindus, and if the number is fixed at seven, then three seats.

4. We further think that the election should be an indirect one for the present, till the general constituencies are educated up to understanding the meaning of a vote, which we hope they will soon be able to do. We would leave the question of election procedure and whether it should be separate or joint electorate for future consideration, in case the Commission be pleased to refer this question to us. We shall then convene another meeting of our Conference to decide the question.

5. Our Association need scarcely add that this province be also sufficiently represented in the Council of State.

Memorandum submitted by the SIKHS of the North-West Frontier Province.

The Sikhs in the N.W.F. Province are in a minority. There are two sister communities, who are in majority, so far as Sikh minority community is concerned. They have to have their rights and interests safeguarded in these peculiar circumstances. The Sikhs though a minority are all the same an important minority, and have got interests in the Province at stake, which require special attention. Though a very small minority they pay a very substantial portion of the Indian tax and being a commercial community contribute very largely to the Octroi duties. They have got three High Schools in their own buildings, one at Peshawar, the other at Bannu, and the third at Haripur. Besides these they have got many girls, and middle schools too. There are many historical and other Gurdawaras of theirs; e.g., Gurdawara Bhai Joga Singh Ji, Gurdawara Bhai Biba Singh Ji, Shahid Bunga, Gurdawara Guru Nanak Sahib, Guru Nanak Sahib's Chashma, and others. They have always been in front of every other community in sacrificing their all in protecting the honour of their Country and the King, whenever the occasion arose; the last Great War is an instance in point. They were the last rulers of the Punjab, from which this Province was carved out in 1901.

The position of the Sikhs with regard to the introduction of the reforms may be briefly summarised thus :—

1. As everywhere the enlightened public opinion desires to have a greater share of the responsibilities in the administration of the affairs of the country, if the authorities or the Statutory Commission would recommend their introduction, the Sikh community would not stand in its way.

2. That the election to the Council may be by a joint electorate.

3. That 25 per cent. of the seats in Council, a representative in Cabinet and the same percentage in all the departments of administration is secured to them.

4. That 50 per cent. of the high posts may be filled by competition.

5. That the Gurdawara Act may be introduced; and

6. The Land Alienation Act may be repealed.

The SIKH Deputation.

The Deputation consisted of :—

1. Sardar Raja Singh, Advocate, Peshawar (Spokesman).

2. Sardar Jagat Singh, Banker and Municipal Commissioner, Peshawar.

3. Sardar Kirpal Singh, Peshawar.

4. Sardar Sant Singh.

5. Rai Sahib Harnam Singh, Bannu.

* * * * * * * * * *

56. Chairman : May I ask you this question? What according to your estimate is the population which is Sikh? What percentage is it about?—I think it is one per cent.

57. And the Hindus we are told are about five to six per cent.?—Yes, about that.

58. So that the two together make six or seven per cent. of the population and practically the whole of the rest is Mahomedan?—Yes.

59. With regard to No. 3 of your Memorandum, you are urging that 25 per cent. of the seats in council should be secured to the Sikh community. Have you formed the view as to whether the Hindu community in the province should have a percentage of the seats secured to them?—So far as I am concerned, my community regards both Hindus and Mahomedans as quite distinct from them.

60. I am sure it does?—Their interest is to have their views heard effectively, and unless and until there is some substantial representation, such as 25 per cent., there will be no effective representation of a community which is financially and industrially important, though in a very great minority.

61. What you are putting forward is, quite properly, primarily for the Sikh community; you are not discussing other things in detail. I wondered, however, whether in thinking it over your deputation had considered whether, if the Sikh community got 25 per cent., the Hindu community would not have to have at least the same?—Yes.

62. Then, if you have 25 per cent. Sikh and 25 per cent. or more Hindu, it follows that the remaining community, which comprises something like 93 per cent. of the population, will not be in a majority?—We are used to that here. In the municipal committees there are 16 members at present, of whom eight are Mahomedans and the other eight Hindus and Sikhs.

63. That is very interesting. That is all by nomination, of course?—Yes, by nomination.

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : That is according to the Punjab law.

Chairman : You mean that according to that the majority community got one-half and not more? That is what I understand, and I am obliged to the Nawab of Dera for telling us. I understand that as regards municipal self-government here the thing really depends on the old Punjab law. When the North-West Frontier Province was cut off, there was a provision made that the previous law that applied here, such for instance as the Punjab Municipal Act, would continue to apply, and the result is that although to-day it is a separate province from the Punjab the constitution of municipalities is by nomination but in the same proportions as it would be or might be if it was in the Punjab; and they have not, in the municipalities or district boards, introduced elections at all.

Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : The system of election was introduced in the Punjab many years before 1900, and it is surprising this principle was not extended to these districts.

Chairman : Is not the answer (you know, probably, very much better than I do) this, that the Punjab Municipal Act did not in itself decide whether a particular local body should be elected or nominated, but it authorised the local body to be constituted by Government either by election or nomination according to what the Government thought best; and here before the two were separated in fact they were constituted by nomination. The Sardar Sahib is right when he says that before 1901 some municipalities in the Punjab had elected members.

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : They were not introduced here because it is a frontier district.

64. Chairman : The real truth is that in the old days when the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab was responsible for Peshawar, the Peshawar Municipality was regarded as one of these frontier municipalities and a system of nomination was adopted for it. Is not that right?

Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : Yes.

Witness : With your permission, I should like to say a word. The old Act, in force when this province was carved out, has long been repealed, and a new Municipal Act was passed in 1911. That Act was passed after the separation of this province, and though it was laid down that all Acts applicable at the time of separation to the Punjab would be applicable to this province, this 1911 Act has been introduced into this province, although it is a Punjab Act. It is not because we were separated at that time that we are governed by it; it is that another Act passed by the Punjab legislature has been extended to this province, and the Government in its wisdom has though it fit to keep the number again eight and eight.

65. Chairman : There was an Amending Act in 1911 which the Punjab legislative council passed for the Punjab, and the Government here, as they are entitled to do, applied that Act to this province? —Exactly so.

66. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : Out of the eight non-Muslims in the local municipal committee, how many are Sikhs?—Two.

67. That is a quarter?—Yes.

68. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : You want 25 per cent., that is 25 in 100, or one quarter?—That is so.

69. If a reformed constitution is granted to this province, out of 100 members of the council you would have 25, and the Hindus, who form 5 per cent. of the population, should have five times your number?—Not necessarily.

70. That would leave nothing for the Mahomedans?—In polities we must not always be too logical!

71. Sir Hari Singh Gour : In your point 2 you say "the election to the council may be by a joint electorate"?—Yes.

72. Do you think your community would be sufficiently safeguarded in a joint electorate in this province?—My idea is not only this province; I had in view when I wrote this that if the system of joint electorates is adopted all over India I shall be in favour of it.

73. I am asking you a question about your own province, apart from the rest of India?—Can it be considered apart?

74. I wish to ask you this with reference to your own province. In your province do you think your community would be sufficiently safeguarded if the electorate is a joint electorate?—You must take into consideration our clause 3 also.

75. You mean, with reservation of seats?—Yes. I would like the Hindus, Mahomedans and Sikhs to come on to a joint electorate without distinction but with reservation of seats.

76. Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : You are in favour of the introduction of reforms if there are five safeguards for your community, as you have said?—Have we said that?

77. I am going to inquire. Are you in favour of the introduction of the reforms?—I say I am not against them. I say if it is to be given I will not stand in its way.

78. Chairman : If others want it, you do not oppose it?—That is it.

79. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I have no quarrel with the Sikhs; they have put their case very clearly; but there is one little point I wish to mention. I believe you are aware there has been a certain amount of crying (I will not call it agitation) for election for municipalities for some time past?—Yes.

80. The urban population especially understand what election means, and that representatives elected by the people are more useful for their purposes than the present system of nomination?—It is natural [illegible] would think that.

they sho[illegible] comes to the point of election for municipalities (let us confine ourselves to municipalities) you will prefer a joint electorate to separate electorates?—Provided that there is a certain reservation of seats.

82. Nawab Ahmad Nawaz Khan : If there is no reservation of seats, would you prefer separate electorates?—No. So far as I am concerned, I would prefer everywhere a non-communal basis for representation, if it is at all feasible.

83. Joint or separate?—I would prefer joint everywhere.

84. Whether there is reservation or not?—I would prefer that, if it is extended throughout India and not confined to this province alone.

85. It should be for the whole of India?—Yes. If it is extended to this province only it must be taken with No. 3; I would read the two together.

86. Does that mean that if No. 3 is not read with that you do not want it?—Not necessarily, to my mind.

87. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : Do you know of any municipality in this province where the number of nominated non-Muslim members is greater than the number of Muslims? Do you know that in Bannu, for instance, the number of non-Muslims in the municipality by nomination is greater than the number of Muslims?—It may be; I do not know.

88. And do you know that the number of Muslims in the population is greater than the number of non-Muslims?—I do not know. There may be differences of taxation; it may be a question of who pays the most taxation.

89. You do not know how these numbers were fixed, and how long ago, and whether there is any serious agitation for their being revised?—I do not know of any serious agitation for their being revised, and I do not know when they were fixed.

90. Do you know that in this very city for several months past this has been going on, and that notices were posted that they were going to block your and our way to the municipal hall, as we both happened to be municipal commissioners? Has not agitation been going on every Friday for months past?—There was some demonstration by the Khalifatists on the point.

91. Did not the Khalifatists say in their manifesto that their demonstration was simply for election to municipalities?—I have not seen that.

92. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : What part of the total population of Peshawar consists of Khalifatists?—I think about 5 per cent. at the most. My friend here says they are very few in number (not even ½ per cent.).

93. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : I want to know whether in this particular case of elections in municipalities the agitation was confined to Khalifatists only?—That is my idea.

94. I have it here in the resolution that it is from every class of people?—I am only giving you my idea.

95. Rai Bahadur Karam Chand : Here in this Conference there is a discussion going on about the percentage of Hindus and Sikhs being 7 per cent. You want separate representation or combined with the Hindu community?—I want quite separate representation.

96. You have just mentioned in your Memorandum that your community fought in the War. How many Sikhs were serving in the army from this province?—I think Sikhs formed the backbone of the army. The question may be asked how many Hindus from this province are serving in the army.

97. I know the backbone of the army might have been from the Punjab, but I mean from this province?—I do not know. The figures are obtainable from the official statistics.

* * * * * * * * *

100. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : May I inquire how the Sikh community stands in the way of education in relation to the Hindu community and the other communities?—We have three high schools, as I submitted, and the majority community, the Mahomedans, I think have three.

101. What is the proportion of Sikhs so far as education is concerned?—I think we excel every other community.

102. Can you give any proportion?—I think about 91 or 95 per cent., or thereabouts.

103. You are well advanced in education?—Yes.

Deputation from the ADVANCED MUHAMMADAN PARTY (together with certain Khans sharing their views).

The Deputation consisted of :—

1. Khan Bahadur Saaduddin Khan, Judicial Commissioner.
2. Sardar Aurangzeb Khan.
3. Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan, M.B.E.
4. Nawab Saifullah Khan.

126. Chairman : Gentlemen, we are told there is a number of gentlemen here, some of whom are Khans, who rather sympathise with your advanced point of view, and if you have no objection we might ask them (the Khans) to sit down. You will have a word with us first, and afterwards there may be an opportunity for them to say something. I understand that you, Khan Bahadur Saaduddin Khan, are going to address us on behalf of the Advanced Mahomedan deputation that is before us. We appreciate, of course, that you are in addition a judicial commissioner and have a long official record, but, of course, you are speaking here in your character as a private individual?—(Khan Bahadur Saaduddin Khan): Quite. My case is briefly put. We are all for the reforms, and full-fledged reforms, and think we should have in no way less than what prevails in the rest of India. We want to be considered as part of India. We have been part of India, and we want to be treated as such. Our case for reforms is so ably put in the Majority Report of Sir Denys Bray's Committee, and all the arguments for and against have been so clearly set forth and dealt with there, that I need not say anything more, because I cannot hope to improve upon that statement.

127. May we take it that your deputation is here to urge the adoption and the putting into practice of the Majority Report of Sir Denys Bray's Committee?—Quite.

128. We have all studied that carefully.—With this addition, that we think any further reforms which may result from your deliberations should also be extended to us along with the rest of India.

129. Do you mean by that that supposing (I am merely making a hypothesis, of course) in some part or parts of India there was what is sometimes called full Dominion Status, that here in this province, you would desire to move from your present position right to the position of Dominion Status at once, without any intervening step at all?—For that, my answer is very short. If the rest of India gets Dominion Status, necessarily the British Government is not going to keep this tiny province under British control. They will necessarily give up this province and leave it to its fate under the Dominion government granted to India. Otherwise, whatever form of constitutional government is granted to the rest of India we shall be perfectly satisfied with here.

130. Let me put the question rather differently because it may be the phrase I used was a little confusing as between the central and provincial governments. Let us suppose that in some province or other the change took place which some people—though by no means all—urge, of getting rid altogether of diarchy and of establishing an absolutely complete system of ministerial responsibility in all departments, law and order and justice and everything else—Then our prayer will be the same.

131. Is it your representation that here in this province that should be done, too?—I do not see any difficulty or objection to that.

132. Then I may take it you consider the situation of the North-West Frontier Province, or rather of the five administered districts, for all constitutional and practical purposes is indistinguishable from that of any other five districts in any other part of India?—Quite.

133. That is your view. Is it your view or not that the five administered districts should be under a different government from the frontier tribes?—If the Imperial Government thinks it would not be possible to carry on the unadministered area on the same lines as Sir M. Young suggested, there will be no harm done if the tribal area is under a separate Chief Commissioner.

134. But I understood you to say your deputation was in favour of all the views which would be found in the Majority Report of Sir Denys Bray's Committee?—Yes.

135. A very important feature of that report was this; was not it, that the Majority came to the conclusion it was quite impracticable to divide the government of the five administered districts from that of the unadministered tracts?—Yes.

136. Is that your view?—I do not see any difficulty in administering the settled districts on the same lines as those on which the rest of India is administered, and also to administer the frontier tribes or tribal area on the lines on which it is at present administered. There is no clash of interest between the two areas.

137. I want to be entirely clear. Is it your view that it is possible or impossible for purposes of government to separate the authority which governs the districts from the authority which governs the tracts?—In what way?

138. It is a possible suggestion that the districts might be governed by one governmental authority and that the tracts might be governed by another. At present they are governed by the same?—The Governor might be the same and the system of government might be different.

139. I am looking at page 9 of the Majority Report of Sir Denys Bray's Committee, which you approve of, and which says: "The conclusion forced by the sheer process of reasoning . . . is this. In existing conditions it is not merely inexpedient, for all practical purposes it is impossible, to separate the districts and the tracts." I understand you agree with that?—Even at present, so far as the administration is concerned, we have nothing in common.

140. But you are not suggesting, are you, that that proposition of Sir Denys Bray's Committee is not at present being observed in practice? At present the authority which governs the districts and the tracts is the same?—Yes.

141. I want to know what your view is?—The authority will be the same; for instance, the Chief Commissioner will be the same, adminstering both tracts; but the system of government here even now is different from that of the tribal portion. There will be no difficulty in that.

142. No difficulty?—No.

Chairman.—I see. I think I understand your view.

143. Colonel Lane-Fox : On that question of administering the tracts, would you consider that law and order could be administered in the same way if it was handed over to a minister responsible to the council? Would he have the duty of administering the tracts?—In the settled districts?

144. If law and order was transferred as you suggest, do you suggest its administration in the tracts would be carried out by the minister responsible to the council?—No, the minister will have nothing to do with the tribal area.

145. Then it would not be the same authority?—The authority would be the Chief Commissioner, who will be directly in charge of the tribal area.

146. Have you considered the financial side of this?—The question of finance I have never been able to understand. This province, as you all know, was separated for Imperial purposes, and even in the Swaraj Constitution which has been published, the Nehru Report, this province is kept as a separate entity, in spite of the fact that they know this province is a deficit province; they have accepted the situation that this province should remain as a separate entity for their own purposes. If they want to keep this province as a separate province, I do not know why they should grudge us the money necessary to keep the province.

147. I am not asking you about the Nehru Report; I am asking your own view. Are you prepared to see extra taxes put on industry in view of the increased expenditure of ministers and a more expensive administration?—Yes, the increased expenditure which will be necessary will be met by the Government of India from central revenues.

148. But if the Government of India are paying a large portion of their expenditure, will not the Government of India expect to have control?—The Government of India is controlling us all right.

149. Yes, of course, they are, now?—And will be controlling us all right.

150. They are paying a large part of your expenditure now, and they have got the control?—The control of the expenditure now.

151. You are taking away the control from them, and expect them to pay your expenditure. Is that a reasonably proposition?—The question is simple enough. We are serving them as the doorkeepers. Whatever the Government of India give us they give us as wages, and I have never heard a master say that when wages are paid the servant should not have control over his wages.

152. Lord Burnham: Is not it the army that is the doorkeeper?—No, the army is not to be controlled by ministers.

153. But is not the army the doorkeeper?—The doorkeepers are the people here. We are supporting the army. The army alone would not keep the door.

154. Colonel Lane-Fox: But why do you say you are supporting the army?—Whenever there is anything happening the brunt of the whole show falls on our shoulders. The army fights, no doubt, but look at our people who volunteer their services, who come forward, who do everything that is necessary to keep internal peace.

155. Do you think that the rest of India will agree to pay a large share of your expenditure?—But the rest of India has already agreed in the Nehru Report. They knew we were a deficit province. They knew that this province had to be a separate province.

156. Who have accepted it?—The Nehru Report.

157. We are not talking about the Nehru Report?—The rest of India and the Assembly has accepted the report. Take the case of the Assembly. You deliberately pass a resolution in 1926 with all this report before you, that it was a deficit province, and that the Government of India will always have to contribute towards its expenses, and the Assembly unanimously accepted this resolution that notwithstanding all these difficulties the Reforms should be extended to this province, and full-fledged Reforms should be granted. That was in 1926. If you find that it is almost impossible to contribute money to keep up this separate province, then we have got no objection: send us back to the Punjab.

158. Lord Strathcona: If you would like to have a legislative council in this province, how many members would you suggest to serve on that council?—The number of members is, I believe, given in the Nehru Report as 30.

159. Would that satisfy you?—It will be quite enough for us for the present, though we must say that we are for the franchise on a liberalised basis.

160. The 30 members would be sufficient in the legislative council, you think?—Yes, for a small province 30 members would be quite enough.

161. Dr. Suhrawardy: You just now referred to a resolution of the legislative council passed unanimously, you said, in 1926?—Yes, March, 1926.

162. I think you are referring to the motion of the 14th March, 1928, adopted without a division?—It was in 1926. That is the second one.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum: Yes, that was the second one.

163. Dr. Suhrawardy: Was the first one passed unanimously?—Yes, that was without division.

164. Mr. Hartshorn: Was not that the occasion when all the Swarajists walked out?—That is why it was unanimous?—They considered the case was so very strong they could not resist it.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum: The walkout was long before the resolution.

165. Dr. Suhrawardy: In 1928, in March, the legislative council again voted a motion without a division?—Yes.

166. And the Hindu leader of the National Party, Lala Lajpat Rai, spoke in support of it, and appealed to the Hindus of the province for support?—Yes, that is the fact.

167. Chairman: You will excuse me. I think Mr. Hartshorn was quite right, and the correction was a mistake. I have been looking in the book. On the 16th February, 1926, a resolution was moved in the Legislative Assembly recommending that the provisions of the Government of India Act should be extended to the North-West Frontier Province. Then I read: "The actual initiation of the debate coincided with the walk-out of the Swaraj Party with the exception of some of its Muslim members." So I think Mr. Hartshorn was quite right.

Witness: May I submit one thing there, that the Swaraj Party's leader is Pandit Motilal Nehru, and he is responsible for a report in which he has completely accorded us what we ask.

168. Chairman: You cannot tell us what the arrangements in that report about the finance of this province were?—Quite, because probably, sir, you may have read in the papers that Pandit Motilal Nehru tried to give a reply to this question, and he said as they were going to start with a clean slate it would be then time to consider that.

Chairman: A clean slate without any finance. I see.

169. Dr. Suhrawardy: You say the advanced Mahomedans want the same measure of responsible government here as might be granted to the rest of India?—Right.

170. Do you realise that the rest of India at the present moment is in the enjoyment of what is known as a diarchical system of government, whereas you have none?—Quite.

171. And you have not had any experience, either, of an elective system even in local bodies?—Yes.

172. Then in view of this, as a practical statesman, would you still say that you should have the same measure of advance which may be granted to the rest of India, or would the political aspirations of the Advanced Party be satisfied with the first instalment of reforms under the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme?—Most decidedly not. We say that we are educationally, socially, and in every respect just as good as the rest of India. Why should we be left?

173. I know. I have said in view of the fact that you have not had that experience which the rest of India has had for the last ten years?—So far as experience is concerned, across the border in Afghanistan they had not the experience of A, B, C and they are going to start a full-fledged Parliament.

* * * * * * * * * * *

175. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : May I know if literacy in this province extends to 3 or 4 or 5 per cent. of the population ?—I do not know about that, but one thing I know, that our percentage of literacy is not very much less than in the Punjab, and especially in the northern part.

176. It is about 8 per cent. ?—I can tell you that in 1901, when we separated, our percentage of literacy among the males was 2·1, while the percentage of literacy in the Punjab was 2; and in 1906 (of course, we have not been enjoying the Reforms; their ministers have been able to extend education) the percentage of male literacy was. 9·32, in the Punjab, while our percentage was 5. Then I would also say that when you take the case of the whole of the Punjab it is not fair. If you take the case of those districts which are contiguous to us, and I would go so far as to say Jhelum and Rawalpindi, our percentage of literacy is far higher.

177. You said that the council you recommend would be of 30 members ?—Yes.

178. You recommend also that it should be an elected council ?—Yes.

179. What is your idea about giving any separate representation or protection to the minority communities ?—Precisely the same as the Muslim community is enjoying in other provinces.

180. You include the Sikhs also as a separate entity for their representation ?—Yes.

181. You know the present financial condition is that this province is deficit by 83 lakhs or 73 lakhs per annum ?—Yes.

182. And you think that by the introduction of reformed government, having ministers, the expenditure will go up very considerably ?—Yes.

183. And you consider that all this should be met by the Government of India without it having any authority over this province ?—As I have already said, the only workable plan, the plan which I think appealed to the authorities here some time ago (I do not know about now) was that a central revenue might be fixed for the administration of this province, and when that percentage was fixed, then the budget should be left with the council to deal with.

184. Lord Burnham : What is called a free grant ? —Yes.

185. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : It is impossible not to sympathise with your aspirations, especially when the soul of the whole nation is conscious of its destiny, but all your friends naturally would desire you to have a peaceful time when you take the destiny of the province in your own hands ?—Quite.

186. Do you not think that under the circumstances, as you are situated now, when there are sharp conflicts of opinion and divergencies of view and interest, it might sadden the hearts of your friends to see that instead of improving your lot by taking the administration of affairs into your own hands you may perhaps plunge the country into internecine war and fights and quarrels ?—I am surprised to find that such should be the idea. I should be surprised to find that Reforms brought internal disputes. Is it such a bad thing for the rest of India ?

187. Dr. Suhrawardy : That is what the Punjab people are asking.

Witness : Our position is that we want to sink or swim with India. If an integral part of India, we want to be in the same boat. If Reforms is a good thing, as all of them say it is a good thing, then it should be increased. If it had been a bad thing, nobody would have said that further instalments should be due, and if it is a good thing why should we be deprived of it ? I do not know that the conditions in this province are in any way worse than the conditions in the rest of India.

188. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : I am not speaking of intercommunal differences, because your numbers here are such that you can very well see to yourselves. The question is whether among yourselves you may not have such differences of opinion as may lead to conflict rather than peace ?—So far as that is concerned, I should say, what is the number of Mahomedans in Madras or in the Central Provinces ? If the number is standing in the way——

189. I am not talking of that; I am speaking of the conflict of interest ?—Why should there be any conflict of interest ?

190. You cannot shut your eyes to existing conditions. For instance, there is the Khan class and there is the class which you gentlemen represent. I, for example, as an educated man, would see that all classes in a provinces were self-governing and that there should be no conflict, by which the progress of the province would suffer. That is why I ask you if you have thoroughly understood this point when advancing your views with regard to this ?—Up to this time I was aware only of the distrust being expresed by our Hindu brethren. I never knew there was a class opposed to this system, the Khans. I have with me, as a matter of fact, about ten representations in which all these Khans join with us in asking for full-fledged Reforms.

191. A deputation came before us this morning which did not want that ?—Everybody is entitled to change his view at any time, of course, but they should have some solid reasons for changing their views. From 1920 until two or three months ago, on at least ten or twenty occasions these Khans never expressed any dissent. They themselves led our deputations and expressed their desire for full-fledged Reforms. In 1926, when the resolution was before the council, these very Khans who have been to-day giving evidence before you, interviewed the Chief Commissioner here and asked the Chief Commissioner to send a special message by wireless to say that all the Khans unanimously wanted the introduction of full-fledged Reforms.

192. Chairman : Can you give me a document which explains to me what this metaphor means ? "Full-fledged Reforms" does not help me much; I do not know what it means. Did they ever send any message which explained that demand ?—I have here a copy of the proceedings at a meeting of these Khans, and this is the resolution passed on that occasion : "We should be given full-fledged Reforms, like the Reforms that are now in India, at once."

193. "Now in India" ?—Yes.

194. That was saying that by "full-fledged Reforms" they meant diarchy and the reservation of law and order ? Is that what they mean ?—They said that as long as other Reforms were not given for the present, those Reforms should be at once extended. They go on further to explain that when there is a further instalment of Reforms that also should be extended to this province without the least whittling away of it. They proceed : "And when the second instalment of Reforms is extended to India that instalment should also be extended to this province."

195. All I want to do is to see it is put perfectly fairly. I think their position is this : That resolution seems to urge, and I think your deputation now is really urging, not so much that a particular arrangement, in view of the conditions here, is good or bad, but that whatever is done for the rest of India should be done here too ?—Yes. That is what I have been submitting. All these Khans at that time considered themselves as part of India.

196. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : How many were present ? Was there anybody from Dera Ismail Khan ?—This was held in Peshawar.

197. It was the Khans of the Peshawar district only ?—It is only to-day we hear the notes of dissent. Last year a memorandum was presented to Lord Burnham.

Lord Burnham : Yes.

198. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: I have every sympathy with you, but I would see you go along the paths of peace and not of strife. Do you think when you hold the reins of government in your hands the interests of those who concur with you now as to the rate of advance will be safe in the hands of the popular party?—I do not know of any particular interests of theirs which will be unsafe.

199. I do not think it is fair to ignore the interests of others, and when you plead the cause of a people and of a province the best thing is to take into view all the existing conditions?—Yes.

200. You say you are aware of no other interest?—I do not know what particular interest the Khans have above or below that of the population living here, and which has to be particularly safeguarded. Until now they have been asking for the same education for which we are asking; they are asking for the same criminal procedure code and civil procedure code; everything is just the same. I do not know where the difference comes in.

201. While asking this question, I should like to know whether it is your firm conviction that a state of affairs will not arise in your province which would rather be detrimental to your province, that is to say, if you want full constitutional advance which other parts of India enjoy?—May I submit that . . .

202. Because for one thing I would rather help you in your aspirations if you had, for example, a juster estimate of your conditions than if you wanted too much, and so lost our sympathy.—You mean to treat us as quite separate from India, perhaps as outcasts?

203. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I take it from what you have said that you and your friends are fired by emulation that in the race of Reforms, while the rest of India is progressing, you should not be left behind. It is a very laudable desire?—Quite.

204. Every government must develop itself. Yours is a backward province, and consequently you must have more education, possibly a university, more roads, public works, and general development in the nation-building departments; otherwise what is the good of a government, unless that government is a progressive government?—Yes.

205. That means more money?—Yes.

206. You will prepare every year a budget of your requirements?—Yes.

207. And you will expect the Central Government to finance you to the extent of the budget prepared by your council?—Not quite that. I never meant that. That would be a tall order, which is far beyond the most I can ever expect.

208. But would not your expenditure be a progressive expenditure?—It will be a progressive expenditure, and so will the contribution by the Central Government. If the percentage is fixed, that will give elasticity enough.

209. If the percentage is fixed and the revenues of the Government of India suffer, then your percentage will go down?—Just in the same way when revenues go down you have to retrench; when they go up you can expand your operations.

210. Your development will not depend upon the will of the minister and the will of the council, but will be contingent upon the progress of retrogression of an outside agency, the Central Government?—It is the case in every province that a minister cannot be independent of the resources he had at his command.

211. The essence of a ministry of a province is that the minister should impose taxation.—If there is any possibility of imposing taxes, if there is any margin and if such taxes are imposed in the rest of India, there will be no obstacle here.

212. I am not asking of the rest of India. You understand what a responsible government means?—Quite.

213. If we give you the same sort of government as the other provinces will have, then it follows that your ministers will have the right of imposing taxes?—Quite.

214. And all the nation-building departments must be financed out of the taxes raised by yourselves?—Yes, along with the contribution.

215. I am not talking of contributions. I take it, therefore, that so far as the taxes are concerned you do not want to tax the people, and whatever development takes place you expect the Central Government to pay for it?—It will be a case of co-operation.

216. That is the co-operation you want from the Central Government?—Yes. We will have a fixed percentage coming in. We will say, "Well, this is the amount we shall get as a contribution from the Government of India. We want for a certain progressive scheme so much money. Well, the rest of it, can we find it?" Then we will see our conditions and whether there is a margin for imposing fresh taxation. There will be no difficulty if there is any margin.

217. Chairman: You speak about a fixed percentage from the Government of India?—Yes.

218. Do you mean that the Government of India would be called upon to give you a percentage of your own expenditure?—No.

219. A percentage of what?—A percentage of the central revenue.

220. You mean that if the central revenue was Rs. 100,000, you ought to have a certain percentage out of that Rs. 100,000?—Yes. At present we have a certain deficit. Well, we can very well estimate within the next 20 or 30 years, if the thing is to progress reasonably, what will be the amount of the deficit. On that deficit you may strike out the percentage, 1 anna in a rupee or 2 pies in a rupee, that may be given to this province for its support.

221. That seems a rather strange arrangement. I suppose you want from the Central Government enough to make up your own expenditure?—That is exactly what I am asking, sir.

222. If you are going to get from the Central Government a percentage of the Central Government's expenditure, the amount you get will depend on what the Central Government raises?—Quite. That would be the case in every province.

223. Sir Abdul Qaiyum: May I be allowed to put it? I suppose what you really mean is this, that there is this land defence of India, just like the sea defence of India. They spend enormous sums on the navy in order to defend the three corners of India, and one corner of 1,400 miles is to be defended from the borderline?—Quite.

224. So the Government of India might be permitted by the Parliament Act to allot one pie a rupee or two pies a rupee from the revenues of India for the land defence purposes? That whatever share of that allotment is allowed to you for the North-West Frontier Province should always be available to you for expenditure?—Precisely.

225. And as long as you pay the same rates of taxes as the rest of India, in income tax, in land revenue, in customs and in every other matter, it does not concern you what the deficit is if you are going to be utilised as a separate unit for Imperial purposes. Do I understand that this is what you really mean?—Precisely.

226. Chairman: There is just one thing I should like to understand. I follow what you put, Nawab Sahib, except on one point. You spoke of the contribution of the Government of India for defence purposes?—Yes.

227. Let us suppose the contribution is made, is the provincial government here going to spend the money it receives on defence purposes?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum: What I thought he meant was that if the two causes are inseparable, and if the border area and the settled districts are to form one unit, then there will be a classification of expenditure, so much for Imperial purposes, such and such heads will come under Imperial and such and such heads will be left for provincial purposes. The provincial purposes, as I understand from the witness, will not be so expensive, but if we exist for the defence of India, then we shall be entitled to a share of that contribution to the extent for which we are to be utilised in that defence.

228. Chairman : I should like to get it entirely clear; I do not care about leaving things that are not clear. We are arguing, are we not, self-government in a province consisting of these five districts?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Yes.

229. Chairman : It is not suggested, I understand, that the self-government would descend to the five administered areas, only to the five districts?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Yes.

230. Chairman : Is it your idea that the Central Government would make a special contribution to the five districts?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : The expenses of the province are for the defence of India, when the province itself is created for Imperial purposes.

231. Chairman : I am afraid I have not followed it. I am talking of the setting up of a legislature in the province, which I understand is to legislate for the five districts and not for the unorganised area. Do you contemplate that the legislature and the government for the five districts are going to get a contribution from the Government of India?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Yes.

232. Chairman : And then they will dispose of the money?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : Yes.

233. Chairman : Do you suggest the legislature for the five districts is going to spend that money on the defence of India?

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : The province itself forms part of the defence of India. This is because we are not of our own creation; we were created into a separate province to serve a certain purpose, and as long as we serve that purpose we are entitled to this treatment. If we do not serve any particular purpose, then, as my friend has already put it, let us be re-amalgamated with the Punjab, and we will have no objection to it.

Witness : May I say one thing? As I understand the situation, if you find it is absolutely impossible to solve these financial difficulties, will that be a ground for depriving us of our elementary rights? Send us back to the Punjab. There are districts in the Punjab which are not so productive as the rest of the Punjab is. Take the case of Mianwali and Attock; they cannot pay their own way, but the Punjab supports them.

234. Chairman : Do not imagine for one moment that it is necessarily thought by everybody that every district should be necessarily self-supporting. What I was asking about was quite a different point, which has nothing to do with that. I thought there was a possibility of confusion, because it almost seemed to be suggested that if the Government of India were to make a grant to this new self-governing province the grant would be spent on the defence of India, and that is not so; it would be spent on education, roads or whatever it might be.

Witness : What the Nawab said was that the whole province was a unit for the defence of India, including education, roads and, say, hospitals; it is all part of the defence of India.

235. Sir Hari Singh Gour : If the Central Government makes a free grant every year to your province for the defence of India, would not you give the Central Government the power to decide whether you are or are not contributing to the defence of India and how far you are utilising your money for the defence of the land frontiers? Would you give them that right?—The Government of India, for the sake of the defence of India, gives us 10 per cent. of their revenue. When that 10 per cent. is allotted to us, out of that 10 per cent., 2 per cent. or 3 per cent. is fixed for the provincial expenditure, and the rest for purely defence purposes—for militia and levies and so on.

236. I give you Rs. 10 to do a certain job. Have not I the right to see you do that job?—But you are giving me Rs. 10 not for doing a certain job, but as my wages because I am doing that job.

237. Have not I the right to see you do the job properly?—I have never heard a master has any right to see that a servant to whom he pays wages spends them properly.

238. It is not a question of wages.—If we do not serve your purpose do not pay us our wages; send us back.

239. Chairman : I think you must let me try to summarise this. As I follow it, the view taken by this gentleman and by the deputation is this, and up to a certain point I think it would probably appeal to many people: They say it by no means follows that every area, taken by itself, can be self-supporting, and that is quite true. There will be some areas in India, for example, which will do more than pay for themselves, and some, I dare say, will do less.

Witness : This province is being kept for Imperial purposes. In this province you will find that in almost every district and perhaps in every-tahsil you have cantonments. The protection of those cantonments requires huge local police and levies.

Chairman : I was trying to sum it up for you, but we will let it stand like that.

240. Sir Abdul Qaiyum : You have not so far referred to the Imperial City of Delhi, which is formed into a separate province and is a source of great expense?—Quite.

241. You mean that if that little province serves an Imperial purpose at the centre of government, similarly at the gate of the Empire, you require a similar machinery?—Yes.

242. Another thing which Sir Hari Singh Gour and the Chairman put to you was whether money spent on education was really spent for the defence of India. I suppose you mean that Imperial India will not care to keep an uneducated, ignorant gatekeeper, who may open the door to some undesirable person, and that you will like to give your gatekeepers a very good education in order to fit them for their position? Is that what you mean?—Yes. I sum up the whole situation in a few words. I say "Everything connected with this province is part of the defence of India."

243. Whatever little can be spared for transferred subjects will be taken from that contribution from the central revenue, and the rest spent on political purposes, levies and constabularies. Is that what you mean?—That is exactly what I said. If you give us 10 per cent., the Act can lay down that out of that 10 per cent. 8 per cent. is to be spent on purely technical defensive measures and 2 per cent. on provincial matters.

244. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : When you say the money is to be spent on defence, is not the army defending this part of India?—Yes.

245. When you get the money for the army, will not you be interfering with the army?—The army is not going to be transferred.

246. You say that at some places there are cantonments, and you want money for their improvement, and you say "We will spend it on defence." When you are spending it on defence, will not you be interfering with the General's work?—In what way? The army is not to be given over.

247. Lord Burnham : Perhaps he is thinking of tribal levies?—That is also an Imperial purpose. It has nothing to do with the General's work.

248. Nawab Mahomed Akbar Khan : Then if the defence of India is maintained by the army, you need not worry about that?—All right. If the view taken is that the defence of India is to be done by the army, and we are discharging no duties, why keep us separate?

* * * * * * * * * * *

Khan Sahib Sardar Gulhan Khan : I should like to say a word or two, if I may. In the first place, there was some difficulty being mentioned about the tracts and the five settled districts as far as their distinction was concerned. I think when I say that our Chief Commissioner has got a dual post and he is called Chief Commissioner and Agent to the Governor-General that question will be explained by it. For the five settled districts he will be our Chief Commissioner, and for the tracts he will continue to be Agent to the Governor-General. In this case that difficulty, I think, can be passed over. As far as the financial position is concerned, I think if you think parochially and not Imperially, and also intend acting parochially, further discussion on our part would be unnecessary. Our province has got a peculiar position, and for this it is necessary that the honourable Conference should think not parochially but Imperially.

249. Chairman : If you will allow me to say so, I think the best thing to do is to think practically. Practically is the better way to regard it, surely, is it not?

Khan Sahib Sardar Gulhan Khan : I was coming to that, Sir. So in this case, when the financial position is considered, just as Sir Denys Bray said in the Assembly the finance question should not come in, because if that question comes in we can at once ask; "Why have you given reforms to Madras? If Madras was not protected by the navy, where would Madras be?" So as far as the expenditure is concerned, I think, Sir, either we should have reforms without any consideration being paid to the financial position, or, if we cannot have it, as our spokesman said, then we want to be re-amalgamated with the Punjab. There are three positions: either we can have this separate entity, or we can be amalgamated with the Punjab, or there is a third position, that if it is small enough we can take a portion of the Punjab and have it added to this province, for instance, a portion of Multan and a portion of the Rawalpindi divisions; but if that is not suitable, the question is that we have been separated from the Punjab. If we are wanted to be a part of India, in that case we want reforms: and if we are not wanted, if this manly and virile race is not wanted, then we can be told at once, and in that case I would suggest that we may be left alone.

250. Lord Burnham : I understand the point you are making is that the whole of India, you included, is protected at the cost of the British taxpayer by the British Navy, and that therefore, as Great Britain pays for the defence of the whole of India at sea, so you are entitled to a contribution for the support of all India for the land frontier?—Exactly.

251. Some curious arguments follow from it, as of course you see?—If the whole of India is one entity, and we are part and parcel of India, and we are wanted to be in India, in that case reforms must be given.

Sir Abdul Qaiyum : And we have it on the authority of Sir Denys Bray that the peace and tranquillity of India depend to a large extent on the contentment of the North-West Frontier Province.

Khan Sahib Sardar Gulhan Khan : The honourable Conference has been interrogative. May I put one question to the honourable Conference—whether we are wanted or not? If the answer is in the affirmative, of course, I think the financial position can be easily overcome; but if we are not wanted, in that case we will think for ourselves, and we will see, because it is our right that we should determine ourselves for our self-development. Another thing that was asked was whether, when the second instalment comes to the rest of India, we should have that along with it or not. So in that case probably it was thought that because we had no training we could not manage it. I may tell you, Sir, that Pathans are born politically-minded, and when I remind the honourable Conference that before the separation of this province, when our five districts formed part of the Punjab, out of these five districts my district stood first in the whole of the Punjab.

Chairman : I should just like to say a word to you before we leave. I would like to assure you that the whole Conference is very much impressed with the importance and the gravity of what you have been urging. We are bound to put questions to you for the purpose of bringing out your answers to the difficulties, because there are great difficulties, no doubt, for all those who wish to face the questions that arise in this part of the world in a really practical and statesman-like spirit. It is not very difficult, of course, to use metaphors and dispose of the thing in a phrase, but, of course, you are helping us to consider the thing from the point of view of practical statesmanship. If I may speak for myself, I feel a very great deal of sympathy with the view of those who say that if there are practical difficulties in the way, they are not of their own making, and that they are entitled to have very special consideration, because it is really in the interests of India as a whole that these areas are maintained separate to this day. You may be quite sure that we shall bear that consideration very fully in mind. And if I may address the last speaker, although for some purposes the difficulties are very great, that does not mean that we fail to understand the respects in which communities in this part of the world have made great and most valuable progress. At the same time, gentlemen, this is one of the most difficult practical questions connected with the future constitutional arragements of India, and the desire of the Statutory Commission here is to listen most impartially and carefully to all that is said, and we welcome all suggestions that are made, and you may be quite sure that if we are able to reach any recommendations at all, they will be reached as regards this part of the world with the most sincere desire to see that your case has full weight.

Khan Bahadur Saaduddin Khan : We are thankful to you for giving us such a patient hearing, and for the sympathetic words that you have been pleased to say.

Chairman : I understand that the Khans who are here are here to show us that there is a substantial body of opinion among the Khans which is generally sympathetic with this deputation, more sympathetic to that point of view than to the point of view put this morning.

Khan Bahadur Saaduddin Khan : That is exactly it. Thank you very much.

Memoranda submitted on behalf of the ANGLO-INDIAN AND DOMICILED EUROPEAN COMMUNITY OF INDIA.*

NATURE AND EXTENT OF ORGANISATION.

This Memorandum, as will be seen from the statement given in Appendix A,† has been authorised by a conference of representatives of the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community from all parts of India held at Calcutta on the 3rd, 4th, and 5th May, 1928, under the Chairmanship of Col. H. A. J. Gidney, M.L.A., I.M.S. (Retd.), and may be taken to embody the views of the entire Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community in India. It is therefore the only authoritative memorandum on behalf of the community and any other memorandum which may have been submitted separately can only claim to embody the views of less comprehensive bodies on matters of sectional interest. The accompanying map‡ will show that every part of India was fully represented at the Conference.

THE COMMUNITY.

The community is composed both of Anglo-Indians, being persons of mixed parentage and of European descent in the male line and of Europeans born or domiciled in India "and not established there for temporary purposes only." Together they are in common parlance known as the domiciled community.

Despite their economic difficulties, which will be set forth later in the Memorandum, they continue to maintain the religion, modes of living and social habits of their European ancestors. They are decidedly a literate people in a country where but 6 per cent. are literate, and, since their political and economic interests are everywhere identical, they are more markedly homogeneous than any other community in India.

So far as occupations are concerned, the community may be said to be largely urban, with a special aptitude for technical and industrial pursuits, and by their courage, initiative, and reliability have proved themselves eminently suitable for employment in the railways, telegraphs, customs, police, Indian medical department, and other allied services. Anglo-Indian women, too, form the mainstay of the nursing staffs of all hospitals, and are entering public services and mercantile offices in large numbers.

The domiciled community has always been a source of strength to the Government and could be made a very valuable asset to the country, as a reconciling medium between alien races.

HISTORY.

We feel that no account of our present disabilities and expectations would be complete without some reference to the varying fortunes of the community, which go far to explain the position that it occupies today in the eyes of the Government and the people and the curious and conflicting views which prevail as to its quality and calibre.

Time was when the British in India were only too willing to recognise the importance and utility of the Anglo-Indian community, indeed, they made themselves directly responsible for the results of the deliberate policy of bringing into being a mixed population, and it is not apparent how the Government, who are the successors of the East India Company, can repudiate the claims of the Anglo-Indian community to legislation that will effectively guarantee their future in this country. It cannot be too often repeated that in times of emergency they have again and again been called upon, or volunteered for active service. In the early days of the establishment of British power in India, they filled posts of respectability and responsibility, and fought and perished by the side of their British fathers on many a field of battle. Their glorious deeds are written indelibly on the pages of Indian history, but the time came when Anglo-Indians outnumbered the British in India and began to be looked upon as an element of potential danger. The result was the crushing order of the East India Company, in 1791, precluding the appointment of Anglo-Indians to the civil, military, and marine services of the Company. This was the first step in the gradual degradation of the Anglo-Indian and his relegation to a position of permanent inferiority.

Time has its revenges, and perhaps no better instance of the irony of history can be found than the events which followed the report of Lord Valentia to the Company in 1806 on the Anglo-Indian menace. "Their increase in India," he remarks, "is beyond calculation, and though possibly there may be nothing to fear from the sloth of the Hindus and the rapidly declining consequence of Mussulmans, yet it may be justly apprehended that this tribe may hereafter become too powerful to control. . . . . With numbers in their favour . . . . what may not in future time be dreaded from them?" The Sepoy Mutiny of 1857 proved how much was to be "dreaded from them." Brendish saved the Punjab; Hearsay saved Calcutta; Forgett saved Bombay; the Martiniere boys defended the Lucknow Residency; the Madras Fusiliers covered themselves with glory. Indeed, the military annals of the country abound in Anglo-Indian names known to fame. There is abundant proof to establish the claim that during the dark and stormy days of the 1857 Mutiny, when England was beset with enemies, the Anglo-Indian community remained loyal. The military services rendered by the community during this period should alone entitle it to special consideration. Indeed, at the time, the Metropolitan of India, Bishop Cotton, in his sermon in St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, on 28–7–1860, recommended that public thanksgiving "to Almighty God for deliverance from the Sepoy Revolt" should take expression in the formation of schools for the children of the community, "that had stood so nobly by England in her hour of need and had shed their blood for their kinsmen across the seas." Lord Canning joined con amore with him.

Subsequent to the Mutiny, when the attention and energies of the Government were devoted to the stabilisation of the civil administration of India, it was again the Anglo-Indian community that came to its assistance, and continued, as in pre-Mutiny days, to aid British administrators to build up stage by stage the most important revenue-yielding departments of today, to which separate sections are devoted in the following pages. No one will deny that it was the British and Anglo-Indian administrations and the Anglo-Indian workmen who helped to bring the Customs department to its present-day high revenue value. It was also the same community who helped to develop roads, railways, river transport, and the telegraph system. They can also claim to be the pioneers, along with the British, in the development of such departments as Excise, Salt, Opium, Forest, Survey, and Government of India and Local Secretariats from all of which they have been practically eliminated.

After the Mutiny, when the Volunteer Corps were reorganised, members of the domiciled community formed a very considerable part of them. So great was the enthusiasm and so spontaneous the enlistment on the formation of the Indian Defence Force during the Great War that elimination parades had to be held to bring the Force down to manageable dimensions; the community, however, formed the bulk, and this after thousands of Anglo-Indians had already enlisted into the British Army, both Regular and Ancillary Branches, and into the Anglo-Indian Force and Batteries. The community also contributed many hundreds of men to the Indian Army Reserve of Officers, some of whom were subsequently drafted into the standing Army; a considerable number received military decorations, and more were mentioned in despatches; the first zeppelin in the war was brought down by a member of the domiciled community. In addition large numbers of our women were employed as Army Nurses, while others helped to form working clubs at which comforts were prepared for the use of our troops at the Front. Almost 80 per cent. of the manhood of the community was engaged in every theatre of war besides in the I.D. Force—a record of service, we feel sure, is unparalleled in the annals of the British Empire and for which a gracious recognition was conveyed in the message of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to the deputation that waited on him in India in 1923:—

> Gentlemen, you may rest assured that I now understand the conditions under which you live in India and the useful and honoured place which you fill as citizens in the Indian Empire. Your aims and aspirations have my sympathy. Your devotion to the cause of India, the land in which you live, and your desire to maintain an honoured place for her within the Empire do you credit. I shall watch the progress of your community with the closest attention. You may be confident that Great Britain and the Empire will not forget your community, who are so united in their devotion to the King-Emperor and who gave such unmistakable tokens of their attachment to the Empire by their great sacrifices in the War.

Many promises were held out to those who went to the front by Government and their employers, but very few materialised, and although land was given as a reward to various Indians who served during the war, we do not know of a single instance in which an Anglo-Indian has been so rewarded. Meanwhile Government continue to draw upon our loyalty as a source of strength and stability. Repeatedly we have been placed in the unfortunate position of open economic and political antagonism to our Indian brothers. It may, indeed, almost be said that our present insecure position and the manifest hostility with which we are regarded by a section of disaffected Indians, in consequence of our share in the maintenance of law and order is our only reward for our loyalty and we fear it may still further recoil on our descendants.

Such briefly has been our record of service and, in view of the part we have played in the evolution of the India of today, we feel that we have a special claim with the Britisher to statutory protection of our economic interests. Moreover, we are the sons of the soil, who not only have our roots in the country's past, but will live, work, and die here in the pursuit of our avocations.

STATUS.

In accepting our position as statutory natives of India we do not consider we are called upon to abandon our individuality as a community. In this connection we would refer to Earl Winterton's definition of our status in the House of Commons in December 1925, when, in answer to questions, he said:—

> For purposes of employment under Government and inclusion in schemes of Indianisation, members of the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community are statutory natives of India. For purposes of education and internal security, their status, in so far as it admits of definition, approximates to that of European British Subjects.

But there is an unfortunate tendency at present for both European and Indians to reverse the application and disown and disinherit the Anglo-Indian. For example, as members of the Auxiliary Force, we share the task of internal defence with the British Army, but when it comes to a question of admission into the army we are asked to accept the conditions of service of an Indian Sepoy. Again, to all intents and purposes, we are ineligible, for appointments reserved for the European and yet under the scheme of Indianisation, the Indian refuses to recognise or accept us as Statutory Natives of India, as is evidenced by the numerous interpellations by Indians in the various legislatures; e.g., in a debate in February last on the railway demand for grants Mr. K. C. Neogy, M.L.A., remarked that, while they had been crying for Indianisation, Gidneyisation had been proceeding apace; he wanted "pure-blooded Indians, i.e., Indian Indians" for the railways. And at the fourth session of the All-Indian Railwaymen's Convention in 1927, the President complained that "99 per cent. of the superior appointments were held by Anglo-Indians; this was not Indianisation."

If in our allegiance to the British we have succeeded in estranging the Indian element to such an extent that our demands have come to be scrutinised with jealous vigilance, amounting at times to open hostility, we are entitled to expect that our legitimate claim as statutory natives of India to inclusion in any scheme of Indianisation should be placed beyond dispute or challenge.

With the proviso, therefore, that our military, educational, and economic claims are not prejudiced, we unequivocably accept and endorse the status which has been accorded to us of "Statutory Natives of India."

PROTECTION.

Time was when the Anglo-Indian community was liberally employed in all departments of Government and filled posts of responsibility in the Services, but the process of excluding Anglo-Indians may be traced back for many years, and every measure of reforms granted to India has witnessed the process of Indianisation of the services accelerated at the expense of Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans, who have been replaced steadily and insidiously, by Indians. With the policy of Indianisation itself and the legitimate aspirations of Indians, the Anglo-Indian community, themselves statutory natives of India, have never been and can never be inimical. As one of the permanent communities of India, we wish to affirm our loyal acceptance of and support to the reforms and our full sympathy with the progressive realisation of self-government on well-measured lines for India within the Empire. But, as a people who have built up and worked the various departments of Government and who have deserved every consideration at the hands of the Government and of India, we strongly protest against the manner in which the policy of Indianisation has been manipulated to our disadvantage.

This is exemplified in the sudden changes which have been made in the system of recruitment into the provincial and some of the higher services. For some time prior to the 1919 reforms appointments to these services were made by nomination from suitable Anglo-Indian and Indian candidates. The former were required to hold a Senior Cambridge or equivalent secondary school final examination certificate. The latter were required to possess a University degree. The reason for this difference was not, as many have supposed, a preference given to Anglo-Indians, but because for such appointments an Indian who had a secondary education only was not considered to be sufficiently qualified in English, a disability that did not apply to the Anglo-Indian whose mother-tongue is English. Consequently, while Indians qualified by passing through universities, Anglo-Indians stopped short at the limit of secondary education; and when Government suddenly made a University degree a sine qua non for admittance into these Services, Anglo-Indians were taken at a serious disadvantage. This was aggravated by the fact that the educational syllabus imposed by Government on European Schools was not designed to lead up to Indian Universities, but was devised to meet the requirement of Europeans and Anglo-Indians under the old conditions, and it needs adjustment to adapt it to the changed circumstances of the present-day India. If any blame attaches for the existing state of affairs it cannot be placed at the door of the Anglo-Indian community, which has never been consulted in the matter of European education. How this adjustment may be effected is dealt with elsewhere in this Memorandum in the section on Education, and when this has been effected the Anglo-Indian will assuredly take his place with the other peoples of India in fair and open competition. Even now a large number of Anglo-Indians are passing through the Universities and rendering a good account of themselves in open competition with Indians, but in the meantime how is the Anglo-Indian to maintain himself if not adequately protected in the presence of ever-increasing competition from educated and progressive Indians?

The figures given below will show how the community has been replaced by Indians in Government departments, particularly in the higher provincial services.

So far has this displacement proceeded that in the postal department, in the judicial services and in some of the provincial services, very few Anglo-Indians are to be found to-day. In the Government of India and Provincial Secretariats, in the forest department, the salt department, the survey department and the excise, an almost similar state of affairs exists. The cumulative effect of this displacement has been that members of the community have been forced to seek subordinate employment in the railways, the telegraphs, and the customs. But, even here, we feel that, under the stress and the misapplication of Indianisation, we are being gradually pushed out.

The community has been criticised for its unpreparedness, but the critisicm is in a large measure undeserved, for no one could have foreseen the sweeping changes of the 1919 reforms. We cannot be blamed for the false sense of security into which we were lulled, for it cannot be denied Government did nothing to discourage the belief that, as a people, who had played such a large and important part in the development of this country, our just claims would not be ignored. In the circumstances, therefore, our conviction remained unshaken that any changes which might be introduced would be of such a gradual nature as to allow us time to prepare ourselves to run a level race with the Indian, as is demanded of us by Government to-day.

It is obvious that if ever we are to succeed in our struggle against such stupendous odds, we must have every facility for equipping ourselves educationally to meet the situation. The improvement of educational facilities is therefore the first requisite, and the whole question is exhaustively treated in the attached note on Education. But, linked with that question is the necessity for protecting the community from further displacement in the services. For the education of the child is mainly dependent on the economic security of the parent. Provided the Anglo-Indian is given constitutional safeguards for at least 50 years, we have every confidence that he will hold his own with the Indian in fair and open competition. The British Government owes this temporary economic protection to the Anglo-Indian community as a debt of honour to a people for whose presence they are responsible and who have rendered them loyal and invaluable service in the past. The right thinking Indian, also, will not deny the Anglo-Indian this moral claim to protection against revolutionary changes in order that he may bring himself into line with the other peoples of India and so continue to be as valuable an asset in the coming 'National India' as he has been under the old régime, which is now passing. No scheme of self-government can afford to ignore the rights of minorities and where, as in the case of the Anglo-Indians, a blood relationship exists with almost all the peoples of India, the element of sentimental attachment and racial responsibility should help to reinforce the political plea for protection.

It is neither expedient nor proper that there should be a sudden disturbance of economic conditions, and the community must be given the opportunity of adjusting itself to changing circumstances. This principle is, in a measure, supported by the Government of India, for in the recent "railway" debate in the Legislative Assembly, the railway member replying to a violent attack by Indian members on the alleged excessive employment of Anglo-Indians and Europeans on railways, said it was because Anglo-Indians had attained such a position in the railways service that it formed an important factor in the economic organisation of their community, and in any measures which might displace the community "the Government of India ought to proceed very cautiously."

It is noteworthy also that many moderate and enlightened Indians admit the claim of Anglo-Indians to a reasonable share in the emoluments of office in departments which have been built up by them, such as the railways, the customs and the telegraphs. Indeed, when all is said and done, the numbers involved are so infinitesimal as compared with the teeming millions of India that any protection that may be afforded, while it would be the salvation of our community, would hardly be felt by the Indian.

Nevertheless, it is obvious that the Indian's age-long attitude of jealousy and resentment towards the Anglo-Indian cannot be removed in a day. Until time has healed the wounds of acrimony and common sacrifices in the cause of a united India and have created a sense of fellowship, the belief that the Anglo-Indian is an alien will naturally continue to operate as an incitement to differential treatment wherever Indians are placed in power. This is but human and involves no reflection on the character or sense of fairness of the individuals concerned. Indeed, most Indians, if not all, look upon any one who calls himself an Anglo-Indian as an antagonist in all fields of employment and as much as foreigner as a Britisher.

We would here refer to the action taken by some provincial governments, who, in recent circulars, e.g., "Recruitment Rules for Bengal Services for 1928" issued by the Bengal Government, clearly demonstrate that their chief desire is to satisfy the extravagent demands of Hindus and Muslims for certain fixed percentages in all departments; (the allotment for Muslims in the Bengal circular being 45 per cent.) unmindful, except as an unimportant afterthought, of the interests of the domiciled community who helped to build most of these departments. Indeed, the decision of communal percentages seems to be the outcome of pacts between the Government on the one hand and Hindus and Muslims on the other, with little or no consideration for the domiciled community. Again, in all arrangements between Indian political parties, it is always a question of Hindu versus Muslim, the Anglo-Indian being regarded by both as an alien and outside the pale of their consideration. This exclusion is due no doubt to the fact that percentages are calculated on the basis of population. We submit that this is unjust, as it is not the entire Hindu and Muslim population which is in competition with Anglo-Indians for these appointments, but, merely the literate sections who possess a secondary or higher education. It is, therefore, necessary that the system of calculating percentages should be revised. Consideration should also be given to the fact that in India, where every employment tends to develop into a caste, certain communities have grouped themselves for generations into particular services, thereby acquiring a special aptitude in these departments, e.g., Madrasis in finance, Sikhs and Gurkhas in the Army, Bengalis, in offices and law and Anglo-Indians in the railways. It is to the advantage of the State that communities should continue to be employed in those services for which they are best fitted.

We would point out that the Montagu-Chelmsford Report made special reference to the need for our protection in para. 346, and that there is a definite safeguard provided in the "Instrument of Instructions given to the Governor-General and Governors." If we are to remain statutory natives of India without danger to our economic existence, these or any other economic safeguards will need to be rigidly enforced. That paragraph admits that the Anglo-Indian on historic grounds has a strong claim on the consideration of the British Government, and that Government must acknowledge and must be given effective power to discharge the obligation to see that his interests are not prejudicially affected. In 1923, a communal representation was received in deputation by the Secretary of State for India which set forth our grievances, but, it was because we continued to feel that these grievances had not been redressed and that the powers given to the authorities had not been adequately exercised to safeguard our interests that the community in India sent a deputation to England in 1925 which was received by the Secretary of State for India. When it is borne in mind that, notwithstanding all these statutory safeguards, the economic interests of the community have been prejudicially affected by the Reforms already granted, it cannot be denied that we have some justification for viewing the future with grave apprehension. In saying this, we have no desire to oppose the progressive realisation of self-government in India, but, to point out that it is proceeding at a rate which is prejudicial to the vested interests of the Anglo-Indian community which more than any other has a claim to consideration equally on historical, moral and economic grounds.

We would here refer to the speech made by Col. Applin M.P., in the House of Commons on the India Office vote in 1926 and Earl Winterton's reply:

Colonel Applin: "But we have one responsibility in regard to which I hope the noble lord will try to do something later on, that is, the responsibility to those people known as Anglo-Indians. We are personally responsible for their existence. They are neither British nor Indian, but they are in an extraordinary position. Under our laws we have called them statutory natives of India; under another law we call them British subjects. They fall between two stools. Whenever any form of real self-Government comes to India I want to ask the noble lord if Lord Birkenhead has come to any decision as to the status of the Anglo-Indian in India, and whether any hope has been held out to them in regard to the only services, in which they are fit to take part. The Anglo-Indian is only able to take part in certain activities. He is quite unable to do ordinary labour. He has in the past lived as a servant in the Government in some subordinate position. He has aspired to the Indian Medical Service. Except very rarely the Anglo-Indian does not hold a high position but occupies various subordinate positions. These are gradually being taken by Indians. It is up to us who still have all the appointments in our Civil Service, to see that the Anglo-Indian has fair play, is given the same work in India as a British subject, and is given some sort of status there."

Earl Winterton: * * * Then there was a question with regard to the position of Anglo-Indians, and I should like to say that everyone must sympathise with the difficulties and disabilities which that community suffers. The hon. and gallant member who raised this question will agree that those difficulties and disabilities, which may have been aggravated by the Government, are mainly due to quite other causes. Their status and their future, and the question as to what can be done for them by the Government in order to reduce their difficulties, are under consideration at the present time. A number of them came to this country on a deputation a year or so ago, were received by the Secretary of State and had a full opportunity of putting their views before him. Communication has gone on since between the Secretary of State and the Government of India on the subject."

How great a menace displacement from the Services is to the community will be appreciated when it is pointed out that these are its main avenues of livelihood, and, if they are closed, no others are open to it. The community being accustomed to European modes of living, has an economic standard much above that of the Indian, which makes competition with the Indian entirely impossible. The Anglo-Indian cannot take to menial or agrarian occupations. Emigration owing to the colour bar, is possible only for a few. The Army is practically closed to it. Vocational training is advocated for Anglo-Indians with a view to greater employment in industry. Some advantage might be gained from this if European business firms, such as Jute mills, factories, etc., would, instead of importing labour from the United Kingdom, undertake to employ and train the youth of the community, as is to-day being successfully done for the Jewish community by Jewish mills in Bombay; but, while a bright industrial future lies ahead of India, it is questionable, judging from present indications, that the Indian will allow Anglo-Indians any great share in the expansion. We might here quote a paragraph from "India, 1925–26" with advantage:—

"It should be noted at the outset that, with the exception of the Anglo-Indian community, and the educated Indian middle classes whose case has been already discussed, there is broadly speaking no unemployment problem in India. Even to numbers of the educated middle classes, unemployment is not normally the ruinous disaster which it is to their confrères in Western countries for the joint family system, which is one of the outstanding features of Indian social life, guarantees them the means of existence if nothing more. It is a very sorry substitute for employment, but even this source is denied to Anglo-Indians."

It is said the British Parliament gave the present Reforms to India, as an award, in appreciation and gratitude, for her services during the past great War. While the operation of the Reforms has helped to protect the economic interests of Indians it cannot be denied that being placed as we are between East and West, the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community has suffered and will continue to suffer from the effects of these Reforms more than any other community. We are therefore tempted to ask the British Parliament:

Is this to be our only reward for our war services and loyalty extending from the old John Company times to the present day? If this be so, then India's gain will be our loss. Surely the British nation does not intend this? It is to obviate such an eventuality that we have devoted various chapters of this Memorandum detailing our past and present positions in various Government Services and have referred to our record of service to the Empire as our greatest asset and our main claim for protection, if not permanently, at least for a stated period, within which we desire to so equip ourselves as to stand on our own feet.

We would accordingly request that adequate safeguards be provided for a stated period in the Provincial Civil Services, Provincial Judicial Service, Municipal Offices, Government of India and Provincial Government Secretariats, Salt, Forest, Survey, Police and other such services, and that, with regard to Railways, Telegraphs and Customs, in view of the fact that these departments have been practically built up and maintained by us, since their inception the recognition of our claim should be enacted in specific terms in the Statute that will be the outcome of the Simon Commission's Report.

THE SERVICES.

Since our problem is more an economic than a political one, we propose in the following chapters to deal with the more important of the Services in which Indianisation has seriously affected our economic position, owing to the bias from both the Indian and European and as is very well illustrated by the conduct in two different sets of Services; on the one hand, i.e., in the Railways, Telegraphs, Customs, the Police, and the Postal Service aimed at depriving us of our right as statutory natives of India to share in the benefits of Indianisation, and on the other hand, i.e., in the Army and the Indian Medical Department, aimed at depriving us of our just claims as European British subjects.

RAILWAYS.

Position on Railways.—The position of the community on the Railways is one of the most important matters with which this Memorandum deals, because this service affords employment to 14,000 Anglo-Indians and about 3,000 domiciled Europeans, male and female. Of these, about three-fourths are married, and allowing three children per family, one obtains a total of about 68,000 men, women and children, either employed or dependent on the Railways: in other words, nearly one half of the domiciled community.

Past History.—It is an undisputed fact that it was with British capital that the pioneer Britisher and his offspring the early Anglo-Indian and domiciled European laid the first railway sleepers in India about 70 years ago. These pioneer workers are represented on the railways to-day by their third and fourth generations. In early days their salaries were mere pittances, as compared with the present day attractive rates of pay. Famine, small pox, cholera, malaria and other diseases took their daily toll from among these workers, who were scattered over the country, living in the jungles with no social amenities and, at times, far removed from medical aid, which, itself was in a primitive state. They toiled on from day to day and year to year, sustained by their loyalty to the country and the Government. Time was not so long ago when every engine-driver, guard and station official was either a European or Anglo-Indian and many of them rose to the highest positions, some becoming successful agents and general traffic managers, and in some railways about 50 per cent. of officials were promoted subordinates. The risks and privations attaching to railway work were too great and the salaries too small to attract the Indian. It was the Anglo-Indian who helped to build up and develop the railway systems in India, while the Indian was content to let us do the spade work. In 1920 there were not many Indian employed on the railways except as menials or lower subordinates. The railways in time became a source of steady revenue to the Government of India, and the Anglo-Indian community is entitled to claim that their share in the development of the trade and commerce of the country, in this sphere at least, is one which it would be impossible to value adequately in terms merely of rupees, annas and pies.

That in the past we have enjoyed a high percentage of appointments and even to-day hold a fair number of posts, especially in the upper subordinate grades, is due, in the first place, to the fact that, until quite recently, there was no competition; secondly, to our past continuous service and greater trustworthiness and loyalty to our employers; and thirdly, to the fact that labour and living were cheaper than they are to-day. As a result of continuous and more or less hereditary employment the Anglo-Indian community became an integral part of Indian Railways and our economic weltare was intimately linked with the prosperity of the railways. While so employed we served with the old Volunteer Force and the I.D.F., and in course of time compulsory enlistment into the Indian Auxiliary Force became a rigid condition of Anglo-Indian and domiciled European employment on all Railways. To-day the Railway Battalions form the backbone of the Force, and are frequently called upon to protect railway property and quell strikes, thus playing an important part in the internal defence of India. The various railway mechanical and carriage and wagon workshops were also almost entirely manned by the community, and, as the need for importing covenanted employees, such as drivers, guards, firemen and others in large numbers from England gradually decreased, their places were filled by Anglo-Indians.

It was in this atmosphere of economic contentment and apparent security of employment that the Reforms commenced to operate in 1920. Neither official nor subordinate received any hint from the Government as to the far-reaching changes that were to follow. Under the stress of the clamorous demands made by Indian members, who early showed a marked hostility to the position occupied by the community on the railways and demanded such a speedy rate of Indianisation that, if granted, could only result in inefficiency and the throwing out of employment large numbers of our community, the Government of India showed unmistakable signs of yielding. That they were influenced by the clamour of the Indian is clear from the fact that, in their desire to help the community they tried to conceal from the Indian members the exact number of Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans employed on the railways, and so we find in the Railway Board Administration Report for 1924–25 Anglo-Indians are not shown as such, but as a separate class, and are classified as such nondescripts as "other classes." It is this vacillating and hesitating policy on the part of Government that is causing us such grave apprehension. If Government are in favour of the retention of a large proportion of Anglo-Indians in consideration of their past services, their loyalty, and devotion to duty, their fidelity and their superior worth, it would be to the interest of all concerned if they openly admitted it, but it seems as if Government are doing their best to evade answering the many questions on Anglo-Indian Railway employment that are being asked daily in the Legislative Assembly and though they realise that our community furnish more reliable, if slightly more expensive, railway workers, they do not seem to have the courage to say so to the Indian M.L.A. questioner. In their anxiety to conciliate these questions, they overlook the fact that, for employment purposes, Anglo-Indians are statutory natives of India and that a service manned by Statutory Indians cannot possibly be more Indianised; and thereby expose themselves to the charge of perpetuating a difference between Anglo-Indians and Indians. Their answers seem to convey the impression that the community is being retained on the railways, not for its intrinsic worth, which has been abundantly proved, but, by favour of the European official who himself is being pressed by Government to put into effect the policy of Indianisation. Although agents state they cannot run the railway efficiently without their Anglo-Indian and domiciled European workers, Government insist, not only on the appointment of a larger number of Indians, but, on their rapid promotion to the upper subordinate grades, apparently to show in each year's Railway Budget a marked increase in Indianisation, possibly with a view to winning over the Indian opposition to their demands for grants. There are numerous instances in the Legislative Assembly where Indian members have moved large cuts on the plea that Indianisation of the Services is not being given effect to, the attacks being directed at Anglo-Indians.

Assurances of protection have, it is true, from time to time been given to the community by various Commerce Members and even by the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India; and the Government of India have, we sincerely believe, made a genuine endeavour to carry them out, but their resistance seems to have proved unequal to the yearly increasing pressure for Indianisation. To-day, although we still enjoy a favourable percentage of appointments on the railways, our future position s anything but assured. Indeed we consider it is in jeopardy and, unless protection is afforded us in the shape of a definite enactment, it will not be long before we meet the same fate in the Railways as we have met in other Government Departments. This would be a poor reward to a community on whom Government relies whenever Indians go on strike, as evidenced by the 1923 East Indian Railway strike, when even Anglo-Indian school children cleaned the railway carriages and our lads left their schools to work this railway to enable H.R.H. the Prince of Wales to travel in comfort and safety when he visited India. Again, in 1927, it was our loyalty that kept the Bengal Nagpur Railway open to traffic and prevented the strike from spreading to other railways, and in the present East Indian railway strike we are again witnessing the part ever played by our men who are performing even menial work in their efforts to keep the Howrah Railway Station open to goods and passenger traffic and to prevent the present strike from spreading.

That the Government are appreciative of our services and are fully alive to their responsibilities on our behalf has been clearly enunciated more than once by the official spokesman in the Legislative Assembly. Only last March the Honourable Sir George Rainy, Commerce Member, in the course of the Railway Budget debate, remarked: "The point I want to make plain, if I can, is this. There are certain things that we cannot do. For one thing, we could not—I think my friend, Sir Charles Innes said so before—oust Anglo-Indians from the appointments the individuals actually hold in order to replace them by Indians. There is also another aspect of the case to which I think it is necessary to refer here. When, as a matter of history, members of a particular community have held a very large number of appointments of a particular class, inevitably the whole economic organisation of the community becomes involved with that fact. That is a point that the Government of India cannot possibly ignore and to take measures which would summarily involve a sudden violent dislocation of the economic existence of an important community would clearly be a matter in which the Government of India ought to proceed very cautiously. I want to give that warning."

This was supported by the Honourable Mr. A. A. L. Parsons, Financial Commissioner, Railway Board, in the speech he delivered in the Legislative Assembly when he said: "I must now turn to a wider and I think a more difficult subject which was briefly touched upon at the beginning of Pandit Kunzru's speech. There is a community whose interests are most ably represented in this House by Colonel Gidney, who by their energies did obtain a very considerable proportion of appointments with which we are now dealing. There is a community whose energies were given to the great benefit of railways at a time, I think I am right in saying, when railway work of that character did not make the appeal to, at any rate, some other classes of the inhabitants of this country which it now does. We are not dealing here with any question of providing in accordance with the policy of the Government, for the representation of a minority community in certain services. Those orders are well known and I do not think affect the present case, for it is certain that the Anglo-Indian community have at least their share of these appointments. On the other hand, times have changed. The Railway Board recognise that there are now members of other communities who would like to come into these appointments and I am sure my honourable friend himself has no objection to these appointments being thrown open to them and has no fear that his own community will in the long run suffer by a severer competition in a wider field. I am attempting to make an appeal to this House to deal in a spirit of no heat with an important question. The position actually is, therefore, that the Railway Board have informed agents that they consider that Indians should be given the same opportunities of showing their aptitude and capacity for these posts as Anglo-Indians, with the result that they are obtaining an increasing number of these posts. The latest figures I have got show for example, that in 1927, among the subordinates drawing Rs. 250/- per mensem and over, there was a reduction of 50 Europeans, a reduction of 44 Anglo-Indians, an increase of 121 Hindus, an increase of 38 Muslims and an increase of 50 of "other classes." I think that is all that it is right I should say on that question. I hope I have made it clear that the Railway Board do not consider Indians of any community unfitted for these particular appointments and I have made it clear that where there are vestiges of racial discrimination left, if they are brought to our notice, we are prepared to examine them, and, if we can, remove them. We do not want to have different grades of pay or different terms of service for any particular community in this country, and, while hoping that we shall still retain the services of that community which has served us so well in the past, we do hope to see a larger number of young Indian boys coming into these subordinate services."

While we are grateful for these individual assurances which afford protection to the present employees they carry no permanent protection or safeguard even for a stated period; on the contrary they not only imply that more Indians will be employed in the future, a claim we do not and cannot dispute, but, also, that in the policy of Indianisation of Railways the community apparently occupies the position of a separate class, apart from all other Indian communities. But how can Anglo-Indians, who are statutory natives of India, be replaced by other natives of India, i.e., Indian Indians? Surely Indianisation does not imply ex-Anglo-Indianisation.

Indianisation, however, has been proceeding apace, and during the year 1924 many of our men were discharged from the railways, in some instances to make room for Indians on a cheaper rate of pay; while the years 1925–26 and 1926–27 witnessed a phenomenal increase in the employment of Indians.

Despite the fact that we are admitted on Railways as Statutory Natives of India, and though Government stresses it in the Legislative Assembly as entitling us to equal rights with all other communities, the Indian refuses to accept it. It would be idle to deny the right of the Indian to employment on Railways, but we, who built the Railways, strongly protest against any definition of Indianisation which would spell usurpation of Anglo-Indian employment on the Railways. We regret to state that to-day to almost every Indian, whatever be his political creed, the Anglo-Indian is for occupational purposes as much an alien as the purest-blooded Britisher. The Indian wants the Anglo-Indian to declare himself an out-and-out Indian before he will recognise his equal claims. This will be evident from a perusal of the Legislative Assembly debates in which occur hundreds of interpellations from the Indian showing resentment at the position we have earned on the Railways and further desire to deprive the Anglo-Indian of his right, as a Statutory Native of India, for continued employment. Indeed, the Honourable Member representing the community on the Legislative Assembly, Colonel Gidney, has frequently been accused of sailing under false colours. Mr. Rangachariar, a former Deputy President of the Legislative Assembly, who was very emphatic about the terms on which the Indian would accept the Anglo-Indian and include him in his proportions of employment, in a memorable speech in 1923 remarked that "not until the Anglo-Indian thought as an Indian, did as an Indian," in other words, not until he threw aside his statutory position and British heritage, would the Indian accept him. Mr. K. C. Neogy, M.L.A., in a speech delivered on the 24th February, 1928, in the Legislative Assembly went further and said, during the discussion of the Railway Demands for Grants, that he spoke for the "pure-blooded Indians"—"the Indian Indians"—and not for those who claim an admixture of other blood. All this goes to prove that the Indian resents the present employment of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans on the Railways and that, while avowing that he does not wish to oust him, he is anxious to get rid of him as soon as he can and that by Indianisation he practically means ex-Anglo-Indianisation. There is also, we regret to add, evidence that the policy of Government is one of appeasing the Indian and that each year they are weakening in their resistance to Indian clamour. Under such conditions it is surely not surprising that the community, which has rendered time honoured service to the Railways in India, and which, by such employment, is consequently so closely welded to Indian Railways, is apprehensive of its future and resents this endeavour on the part of the Indians to displace them.

The table of statistics, as given below, extracted from the Government of India Report by the Railway Board on Indian Railways for 1925–26 and 1926–27, Volume II, giving the grand totals of the various communities employed on all Indian Railways for all grades of employees from the menial to the official, will show that in 1926–27, out of a total of 7,62,553, there were 4,998 Europeans, 14,007 Anglo-Indians and 7,43,548, Indians and "other classes" which works out to a communal percentage of—

Anglo-Indians 1·88, Europeans 0·69 per every hundred Indians.

It might be said that, as this total of Indians includes all types of menials it is not a fair method of working out communal proportions. Even if we accept this, it must be remembered that a large number of Anglo-Indians are to-day employed as booking clerks and on the Crew system on Indian wage rates. Many Anglo-Indian youths are to-day being employed as English-speaking agwallahs (i.e., firemen) on Indian wages; indeed, the tendency on most railways to-day, especially on new extensions, is to reduce all salaries to the present Indian rates. This is detailed to show that there are many Anglo-Indians who, rather than face the ghastly privations of unemployment are working to-day on Indian wages, though their standard of living is much higher.

A more accurate estimate can be obtained by ascertaining the actual number of Anglo-Indians employed as lower subordinates; take our total employment on Railways; i.e., 14,007 in 1926–27; deduct from it 3,765, which represents our total upper subordinates and 168, which represents our total officials; the balance of 10,073 represents the number of Anglo-Indians working as lower subordinates, drawing salaries from about Rs. 35 to under Rs. 250 p.m.

Upper Subordinates.—Whereas, about a decade ago there were very few Indians as upper subordinates, a reference to the statistics as given below, extracted from the Reports by the Railway Board on Indian Railways for 1925–26 and 1926–27 Volume I, will show that in 1925–26 there were 1,572 and 1,693 in 1926–27, replacing nearly 800 Europeans and in 1927–28 replacing 44 Anglo-Indians—a fact which supports the belief that, in response to the clamour of Indians, Indian subordinates and office clerks are being promoted to appointments as upper subordinates at a phenomenal rate, promotions for which our men have had to serve 20 to 25 years and for which hundreds of them are to-day still patiently waiting to obtain. Although we hold more upper subordinate appointments than Indians to-day, the totals for the year 1926–27 work out at Europeans 2,076, Anglo-Indians 3,765, and Indians and other classes 2,454, demonstrating that, whereas but a few years ago Europeans and Anglo-Indians were almost exclusively employed as upper subordinates, in 1926–27 Europeans held·25 per cent., Anglo-Indians 44·4 per cent., and Indians and other classes 29·6 per cent. These statistics also show that within the year 1926–27 the number of European upper subordinates had decreased by 50 and Anglo-Indians by 44, while the number of Indians including " other classes " had increased by 216. If this rate is continued it will not be long before there will be no European or Anglo-Indian upper subordinates on the Railways.

A reference to the speech made by the Honourable the Railway Member in opening the 1928 Railway Budget Debate increases the apprehension of the community with regard to its future as far as official appointments are concerned. Speaking in the Legislative Assembly when presenting the Railway Budget, with reference to Indianisation of the Superior Railway Services, Sir George Rainy said : " I have some general remarks to make as regards the financial position of the Railways, but, before I come to them, there is one other matter to which I should like briefly to refer, I mean the progress made in recruiting Indians for the superior services on the Railways. Members will find a very full account of what has been done in the past two years on pages 66 to 72 of the Railway Board's report on Indian Railways for 1926–27; but, I am in a position to supplement the information there by some further and later figures. 32 per cent. of the permanent gazetted appointments created in 1925, and of the vacancies which occurred during that year in such appointments on State-managed Railways were filled by Indians. In 1926–27 the percentage practically doubled; it was over 62 per cent. This year, on the latest available figures; it seems probable that 42 Indians will be appointed to Superior Railway Services, including the 13 candidates who, as announced last week, were successful in the examinations for the Indian Railway Services of Engineers and the Transportation and Commercial Departments of the State-managed Railways. We are only expecting 18 European recruits this year for the State-managed Railways, so Indians are likely to obtain 70 per cent. of the appointments. We are rapidly reaching the percentage recommended as our aim by the Lee Commission. So far I have only been referring to permanent appointments. But we have also succeeded recently in obtaining a much larger proportion of suitable Indian recruits for the temporary Engineers posts on the State-managed Railways which our large construction programme requires. When, in 1925, we began to recruit temporary Engineers in large numbers, we first of all advertised in this country for them; but the immediate response was not as good as we could have wished, and we only succeeded in obtaining 28 sufficiently well-qualified men of whom seven were Europeans. In order not to hold up the programme of development we had therefore to obtain recruits from England through the High Commissioner and we got from him in all 43 temporary officers on three year agreements, of whom 9 were Indians and the rest Europeans. Subsequently, in January, 1927, we advertised again for recruits in India and obtained a much more satisfactory response; we have consequently stopped the recruitment of temporary engineers in England altogether. Since January, 1927, we have obtained 20 temporary engineers in India of whom 18 are Indians, and we have now got arrangements for maintaining a register of approved candidates for employment, to whom appointments are offered as they fall vacant. I am conscious that this reference to Indianisation breaks the sequence of my speech, but, I thought the House would be glad to have these figures before the general discussion on the budget takes place."

Thus it will be seen that the Government of India have Indianised 70 per cent. of Superior Railway appointments created within a few years, though, the Lee Commission recommended 75 per cent. in about 25 years or more If. this 70 per cent. included a fair proportion of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans there would be no need for apprehension, but, as far as is known, 95 per cent. of these recent 70 per cent. Indian appointments have been given to Indians—very few to Anglo-Indians. The reason for this is not far to seek. In 1925 the Railway Board issued regulations governing the entrance into most superior railway services which insisted on a degree qualification through a severe competitive examination. The Government of India was well aware that there were very few Anglo-Indian graduates and that by this sudden alteration the door was being practically closed to us, who, up till then, in return for our work and worthiness, had been able to enter the Superior Services by promotion from the subordinate grades, on some Railways to the extent of about 50 per cent. To make matters worse, and almost synchronising with this, the Railway Board passed orders that only 15 per cent. of subordinates were to be promoted to the official grades. Thus again the opening was considerably narrowed, and it will be seen that the Government of India have not only practically closed the door to us, but have opened it wide to the Indian. In other words the community that helped to build up the Railways, and who, but a few years ago supplied a high percentage of their officials has, in less than a decade, been denied adequate consideration by the Government in its desire to satisfy the clamour for Indianisation. To add to our difficulties the Anglo-Indian upper subordinate, however efficient, finds it very difficult to enter the official grade to-day because the majority of the 15 per cent. promoted subordinates are selected either from covenanted Europeans or Domiciled Europeans.

A further prejudicial factor is disclosed by a reference to these statistics, in which the total for Anglo-Indian officials in 1927 is shown as 169. As there was a suspicion that this total included a large percentage of acting official appointments, enquiries were made from Railway Agents and from official replies so far received it appears that about 40 per cent of these 169 Anglo-Indian official appointments are of a temporary or officiating character, and, which, unless confirmed, are of little value to the community, whose employment as officiating officials means to the Government the extraction of first class labour at a minimum wage on a temporary basis until such time as a permanent imported European or degreed Indian is available. We would point out that these appointments are of particular importance to the Community as it is from these grades that Selection Committees are formed to recruit subordinates.

At this rate of Indianisation of the Superior Railway Services 70 to 80 per cent. of officials will be Indians within the next 10 to 15 years. Prejudicial and unfair as this is to those of us who aspire to become officials, it will react with even greater intensity on the Anglo-Indian lower-subordinates, i.e., the firemen, ticket collectors, etc., who eventually become the upper subordinates, because they are appointed weekly by Selection Committees consisting of Railway officials. Anglo-Indians are seldom on these Selection Committees, because we have so few permanent officials in the community. If in time 70 per cent. of Railway Officials are Indians, then, these Selection Committees must necessarily be composed of a larger number of Indian Officials and it is only natural to expect that they will appoint Indian applicants as subordinates in preference to Anglo-Indians. That this apprehension is not imaginary has lately been proved when an Indian Railway Official, delegated to select men for a new Railway system, exhibited marked communal preference. "Indianisation of the service is, of course, a political as well as an administrative problem, and it is quite reasonable to argue that as far as some of the Indian services are concerned political arguments may safely be allowed to prevail. But it will be acknowledged that the Railway is not one of these services."

In making these criticisms, we have no desire to appear ungrateful for the employment Government has hitherto given us in our struggle against great odds, though it is a generally-accepted fact that Anglo-Indians have proved themselves worthy of such treatment; nor are we dissatisfied with the present number of Anglo-Indians employed as lower and upper subordinates. It is not the present that we fear, but the future, and it is to safeguard ourselves against possible developments in the future that the following demands are suggested for the consideration of the members of the Indian Statutory Commission.

Protection.—1. That the present number of Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European lower and upper subordinates be not reduced for a further period of 50 years.

2. That owing to the manifest injustice consequent on the sudden change of policy in the matter of recruitment to the Superior Railway Services, which now demand a degree qualification, the I. A. or I.Sc. be accepted as a qualifying examination for another 30 years.

3. That 15 per cent. of Superior Railway competitive appointments be reserved for nomination by the Government of India.

4. That for the next 30 years 50 per cent. of the 75 per cent. appointments in the Superior Services reserved for Indianisation be obtained by the promotion of approved Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European upper subordinates. This will enable a fair number of Anglo-Indians to enter the Superior Services till such time as they are able to equip themselves to compete on equal terms with Indians.

5. That only those, who, have admitted themselves Statutory Natives of India receive the benefits of the above demand, to attain which

(a) all Railways should take necessary steps to ascertain this information;

(b) the question "Are you a Statutory Native of India?" should be embodied in the agreement form enlisting an employee, as is done for all Provincial Civil Services.

6. That the promotion of covenanted European subordinates be not included in the above, but, their appointments be confined to the 25 per cent. reserved for European Officials.

7. That irrespective of any other suggestion, and in view of the large numbers of Anglo-Indians in the subordinate service whose interests are at stake, a certain number of Anglo-Indian officials or non-officials be appointed to every Selection Committee when subordinates are being selected.

8. That any measure of protection afforded us be specifically included in any enactment that may be the outcome of the Indian Statutory Commission's Report.

Reasons for Demand.—The demand for special protective measures, for a limited period is based on the following facts and considerations. Any attempt to displace us too rapidly from our present position of economic security must inevitably result in crippling the education of our children, by which alone we can hope to compete with the Indian.

2. The loyal and meritorious services we have rendered to the Railways from their very inception, and to India, and the great part we have consequently played in the opening up of the trade, commerce and industries of India.

3. The accumulated revenues Anglo-Indian employees have helped to bring to the Government of India during the past 70 odd years of Railway administration in India.

4. The fact that about 14,007 of its Anglo-Indian members and about 3,000 Domiciled Europeans are enlisted in the Indian Auxiliary Force and thus constitute a valuable asset to the internal defence of India. This compulsory enlistment of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, as a term of employment, is not exacted from Indians. The Community is very proud of the honoured place it occupies in the Auxiliary Force and would be the last to suggest any alteration, but it submits that such employment, in a measure, augments its claims for special protection in a Department it has not only built up, but, protects, and because the Community can always be depended on during strikes or other crises.

INDIAN TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

The Indian Telegraph Department is yet another instance of an utility service in which the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community has, in the role of pioneer workers, done the spade work, faced the dangers of isolated existence spent in the jungles, exposed to various diseases, and after continuous labour of over half a century, developed it, stage by stage to such a condition of utility and perfection, that with the improved status and enhanced salary of its employees, it began to attract the Indian. With the rapid progress of Indianisation taking place in all the services it seems certain that in a very short time the Anglo-Indian Community will be displaced by the Indian in this service also.

Past History.—It is an irrefutable fact that the foundations of the Indian Telegraph Department were laid and the traditions built up exclusively by the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community. We have but to take our memories back to the 1857 Indian Mutiny to appreciate the great part played by the Department, for, had it not been for the Indian Telegraph Department, it is quite likely that the history of India would have been a different one. Apart from the services rendered to Government by this Department as a whole, the annals of the Indian Mutiny afford ample evidence of the heroic conduct of many Anglo-Indian Telegraphists, among whom the name of Brendish, to whose memory the late Lord Curzon, when Viceroy of India, unveiled a monument in the Imperial City of Delhi, will live for ever as one, who, despite the massacre of his comrades whilst on duty, displayed the greatest presence of mind and courage by standing at his post and sending that memorable message across the telegraph wires, which not only arrested the advance of the Mutineers, but enabled the British troops to take prompt and effective action and so saved for England the whole of the Punjab or, as Sir Robert Montgomery put it, "the Electric Telegraphs saved India." These words were repeated by Lord Curzon at the unveiling ceremony. It might well be contended that for this act alone the Anglo-Indian community has a special claim for protection in the Telegraph Department. From the Mutiny to the recent Great War, the Indian Telegraph Department has played a great part in all campaigns in India and Burma, as also in Mesopotamia, and not only has it nobly responded to the stress of its daily work on such occasions, but Anglo-Indian members have freely volunteered for active service, many of whom were mentioned in despatches and received honours. Moreover, the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European members of this Department have supplied and still supply a large contingent to the old Volunteer Corps, the I.D.F. and to-day, as members of the Indian Auxiliary Force, form an effective defence, protecting in times of need telegraph offices and their lines of communication. It is also well known that Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans of the Telegraph Department were almost exclusively employed in the various North-West Frontier Expeditions, Chen Lushai and Chen Hills Expeditions, and in the Burma War of 1886.

Effects of Indianisation.—Till the year 1878 every Branch of the Department was manned entirely by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, and, although, in subsequent years, Indians were gradually admitted into it, the Government of India found it necessary, as recently as 1902–3, to make a definite pronouncement that the percentage of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans employed in the Department should not fall below 66⅔ per cent. This percentage was steadily maintained till about 1916, after which year, notwithstanding the orders of the Government of India, more Indians entered and the percentage of Anglo-Indians dropped to about 50 per cent. in 1920. It was mainly during this period, 1916–20, on forceful representations being made by the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European employees of this Department, that Government realised its obligations towards them and raised their salaries status, and prospects. It was in this much improved and attractive condition that the Reforms began to operate on this Department, but, since the year 1920, and notwithstanding the fact that Anglo-Indians are Statutory Natives of India, their percentage has gradually but steadily decreased till to-day it has fallen to about 40 per cent. We are naturally apprehensive of a still further decrease and unless early and adequate protection is given the same fate awaits the community in this service as has overtaken it in almost every other Government Department.

Statistics.—In support of this statement we desire to quote figures of Anglo-Indian and Indian employees from one of the largest Presidency Telegraph Offices in India—Calcutta :—

	1913–1918.
Anglo-Indians	329
Indians	99
	1918–1923.
Anglo-Indians	252	(decrease 77)
Indians	178	(increase 75)
	1923–1928.
Anglo-Indians	166	(decrease 163)
Indians	242	(increase 143)

These figures show a decrease of 50 per cent. within a short space of 15 years and may be taken as applying to the Department generally—a poor return for a community that has rendered such great and meritorious services to the Empire. It is true that to-day members of the community enjoy a large share of the Superior appointments reserved for subordinates of the Service as also the Superior Traffic Service appointments and the upper subordinate grades, this condition is not only departmentally justifiable, but, naturally right as being the just reward to subordinates, who, after long and continuous years of service by sheer merit and ability have advanced step by step to some of the highest posts. In the lower subordinate grades, however, there is a steady increase of Indians who will, in time, occupy the upper and superior appointments which are held to-day and which will be held for a few more years to come by the present generation of Anglo-Indians. We also understand that, as a result of a reduction of 25 per cent. in Home recruitment into the Superior Telegraph Services, these appointments will be recruited by open competitive examination in India, in which an University degree will be demanded and which, in itself, owing to our paucity of graduates, will practically close this door of recruitment to members of the community.

The Right Honourable Lord Birkenhead, Secretary of State for India, when he received the 1925 Anglo-Indian Deputation, acknowledged the great services rendered by the community to the Empire in the Telegraph and Railway Departments. If any further recent evidence is required it can be obtained from the Annual Reports submitted by one of the ablest Directors-General, Posts and Telegraphs, Sir Geoffrey Clarke, I.C.S., an administrator who frequently stated in public that, but for the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European employees, the Telegraph Department in India could not be administered as efficiently as it was done during his Directorship.

We have no desire, indeed, we would not refute the right of other Indian communities to seek and be given employment in the Telegraph Department, but, we feel we have more than an ethical claim on the Government to protect the position of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European community in this Department, for it is our perogative, as Statutory Natives of India, to share in the full benefits of Indianisation and an adequate percentage of appointments in those departments in which we have for generations shown particular aptitudinal ability and in which our economic interests are so intimately welded. Displacement of our labour at the rate that is being witnessed to-day is bound to react on and seriously disturb the domestic economy of a large section of the community, for it must be remembered that there are to-day about 2,000 Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European employees in this Department who, with their wives and children, constitute a total of about 8,000 of the Domiciled Community employed or dependent on the Telegraph Department.

Demands.—(1) We therefore respectfully desire that the percentage of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans employed in certain sections of this Department be raised to the level of 66⅔ per cent. for a period of 25 years, and that for the succeeding 25 years it should not be allowed to go below 50 per cent. in those branches of the Service.

(2) In those Superior Service appointments, to be recruited by open competitive examination, 33⅓ per cent. be reserved for suitable members of the community by promotion from the subordinate ranks.

Reasons for Demands.—We make these demands in return for the services the community in this Department has rendered in the development and administration of India from the pre-Mutiny period to the present day, and for the special aptitude it has shown for this employment, which may be characterised as hereditary.

The principle of employing particular communities for particular services of the Government is clearly demonstrated and practised in the Indian Army, into which recruitment from none but the martial races is allowed, such as the Sikhs, Pathans, Dogras, Ghurkhas, Punjab Muslims, etc. This recruitment from particular communities is rigidly maintained on the policy that those races have an aptitude for such employment which entitles them to be classed as martial races. In a lesser degree the same principle of aptitudinal employment is being practised by recruiting Madrasis into the Finance Department of the Government of India. We request that Government apply the same principle of reservation to the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Community for special employment in the Telegraph Department.

CUSTOMS.

The present insecure position of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans in the various Customs Departments in India is the cause of grave anxiety to us. There are very few Departments of Government in which the displacement of members of the Community, under the process of Indianisation, has been so marked as in this Department.

The Preventive Branch of the Service in Calcutta, for instance, since its inception in 1852, till the introduction of the Reforms in 1920, was entirely staffed by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans. To-day they fill less than 80 per cent. of these appointments. In the short space of eight years one-fifth of the Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans employed in this Branch have been displaced. At this rate, within a few years the pressure of Indianisation will have squeezed the Community entirely out of the Preventive Department.

The exclusive employment of Anglo-Indians in the Preventive Branch in pre-Reform days was undoubtedly due to their peculiar suitability for the work. Apart from the responsibility of preventing contraband articles from entering or leaving the country, there was the very important duty of preventing the smuggling of arms and ammunition into India, and the realisation of the Community's inherent loyalty to the Government was indisputably the factor which influenced Government to staff this important branch of the service completely with members of the Domiciled Community. For close on 70 years these conditions prevailed. What the loyal and the devoted work of the Community during this long period has meant to the Government and to India, if only by way of preventing the smuggling of arms and ammunition into the country, cannot now be known. Nor can the value of this service, in the dark days of the Mutiny and during the many subsequent periods when India was in the throes of civil disturbances, be adequately assessed. For these services alone it was reasonable to expect that the economic position of the Community under the Reforms would receive adequate protection.

These remarks apply mutatis mutandis to the other important Appraisers' Branch of the Calcutta Customs Service. Till 1909 Europeans and Anglo-Indians entirely staffed this department. During the ten years that followed eight Indians were admitted. Since the Reforms, however, the progress of Indianisation has been accelerated, and between the years 1920 and 1927 14 more Indians were employed, bringing their total strength to 22 in a small department of 38 men. It will be seen from this that, although, up to 1909, the department had been entirely staffed by Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans, in 1919 it entertained 26 per cent. Indians, and in 1927 the percentage of Indians had risen to 60. If Indianisation of this department proceeds at this rate, within 20 years Europeans and Anglo-Indians will be entirely supplanted by Indians. The statements of the Preventive and Appraisers' Departments, of the Calcutta Customs Service given below will bear out these facts.

In the section of Protection we have already dealt with the evils which will result to the Community if the present rate of displacement is allowed to proceed unchecked. We would point out here that in the Preventive and Appraisers' Departments of the Customs Service the best way of ensuring temporary security would be to guarantee to Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans a fixed percentage of appointments for a period of fifty years, viz. in the Preventive Branch 75 per cent., and in the Appraisers' Branch 50 per cent.

It cannot be denied that the many hundreds of crores of rupees that have accrued to Government from this major revenue-earning service is in a large measure due to the honest and faithful work of the Anglo-Indian Community. The claim for this temporary protection cannot, therefore, be regarded at all extravagant, particularly as the number of individuals involved is so small as to be of negligible economic importance to the Indians, whereas it means the uplift and salvation of many members of our community. The total amount of revenue which has been earned by the Customs Department from the Port of Calcutta alone, from 1894 when the General Tariffs were introduced to 1920 when the Reforms came into force and Indians were admitted into the Customs Department, is Rs. 10,592·73 lakhs.

POSTAL SERVICE.

Indianisation has practically shut out the community from the Superior and Upper Subordinate Grades of this Service (excluding Telegraphs), in both of which, at one time, it held many appointments. This exclusion has been the development of many years. A reference to the statistics given will support this statement. We make no complaint against the lower subordinate appointments, especially in the mofussil, because the standard of living and the customs and habits of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are such as to preclude them from living on such small wages and in Indian villages.

In the Probationary Superintendent's Department it will be noticed that not a single member of the Community has been appointed since 1924, and it must be remembered that it is these officers who are appointed Reserve Superintendents and eventually rise to the grade of Postmaster-General. Unless this rate of Indianisation is checked and members of the Community are appointed, we shall disappear from this Department. At present there appears to be some unwritten law that is excluding Anglo-Indians from entering the Department as Probationary Superintendents. A reference to the Postmaster grades of Rs. 700–800 and Rs. 350–650 shows that a fair number of Anglo-Indians are employed, but these are men who started as subordinates and are to-day reaping the benefits of their earlier labours. In the Rs. 250–350 grade Indians are in the majority. We desire that one-third of these appointments should be held by Anglo-Indians. It is, however, in the lower grade of Postmasters from Rs. 160–250 that the effects of Indianisation are very pronounced, for here there are 123 Indians and only five Anglo-Indians. Again, in the Grade of Inspectors of Post Offices, Rs. 160–250, in the Provinces of Bengal and Assam all the appointments, 89 in number, are held by Indians, a condition which we believe obtains in other Provinces. As regards the mofussil officials there are 1,851 Indians employed and not a single Anglo-Indian. Items 10 and 11 of the statistics given add further testimony to the fact that the Community is all but excluded from these grades, there being 1,186 Indians as against 10 Anglo-Indians. It seems that in this Service there is no room for further Indianisation.

POLICE.

That Indianisation has effected us prejudicially in the Police Service is instanced in the case of the Calcutta Police. Taking one department of this Force, the Thanas (Police Stations), we find that before Indianisation set in practically every Thana in Calcutta had a European or Anglo-Indian in charge. Indeed, 30 of these appointments were held by Anglo-Indians. To-day only four are held by them. The remaining 26, which include all the principal stations, are held by Indians. Besides this, a system of Police Outposts has been introduced to deal with work of an inferior nature, to which Anglo-Indians are preferably posted, with the result that they receive no training in investigation and are rarely appointed to Thanas. By this means the Anglo-Indian element has been almost entirely eliminated, and Indianisation is proceeding apace despite the great need for neutral officers in this Service, as was demonstrated in the recent Hindu-Moslem riots.

The same state of affairs exists in the superior grade of the Calcutta Police. Statistics show that in 1915, out of a total cadre of 12 Assistant Commissioners of Police, there were only four Bengalis, while to-day the position is completely reversed and there are eight Bengalis holding such appointments as against two held by Anglo-Indians.

THE INDIAN MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

(MILITARY BRANCH.)

The Indian Medical Department, which is the Junior Medical Service doing duty with British troops under the orders of the R.A.M.C., has been in existence for nearly a hundred years. It is recruited entirely from the Domiciled Community and is employed for duty only with British Troops, though a certain percentage is employed in the various Provincial Civil Medical Services, as also in Jails and Asylums. Its members to-day receive a course of five years' professional training in the Medical Colleges of Calcutta and Madras under eminent I.M.S. Professors and have hitherto received a Diploma which is of purely departmental significance, but of inferior market value to the Indian qualification. There is no need to enlarge on the past record of service of the Department. Suffice to say that, in whatever sphere of duty it has been employed, in peace or war time, in India, or out of it, members of the I.M.D. have not only proved themselves a credit to their department and to their community, but have added lustre to the annals of the Army and the profession to which they belong. Many of them have, by open competition, entered the I.M.S. and risen to the highest ranks, such as Sir Patrick Hehir, K.C.I.E., K.C.B., late D.M.S., Mesopotamia and Northern Command, India; Col. J. Sykes, Col. O'Gorman and many others.

The Army Department has always insisted on British origin as a condition precedent to recruitment into this department. In former days recruits were selected by officers commanding British regiments, generally from the sons of soldiers, who had the option of receiving their pay either in sterling or in rupees and to retire in England, if they so wished. Recruitment is still a jealous preserve and is even to-day confined entirely to the Domiciled Community —men of British origin with British traditions, culture, customs and manners.

Since the Great War, the differential treatment meted out to this Department, as compared with other departments in the I.U.L., (the Indian Unattached List) and the I.M.L. (the Indian Miscellaneous List), is a typical instance of the disabilities and injustices which attend the dual status given to us and its practical application in a Department where Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans are enlisted and enrolled, not as European British subjects, but as British Warrant Officers, is so markedly unjust that it has frequently been referred to the Army Department, but so far without result. The Indian Unattached List consists of such departments as the Indian Army Service Corps, Indian Army Ordnance Corps, Military Works Corps, etc.

The Army Member stated in the Legislative Assembly, in reply to a question asked him, that this differential treatment was due to the fact that the I.M.D. (1) is recruited entirely from the Domiciled Community, and (2) is not a part of the British Army, but an integral part of the Indian Army.

We desire to draw the attention of the Commission to these two points, as they demonstrate the post-Reform attitude of Government towards the Community.

(1) It is admitted that the Department is recruited entirely from Europeans, Domiciled Europeans, and Anglo-Indians in India, but a similar recruitment obtains to-day in the I.U.L., and, though Anglo-Indians do not figure so largely in it, we know of many Anglo-Indians serving in the I.U.L. Indeed, it is not an uncommon occurrence to find an Anglo-Indian father serving in the I.M.D. while his son is enlisted in the I.U.L., or two brothers serving in different departments one in the I.M.D., and the other in the I.U.L. Moreover, all the departments in the I.U.L. and the I.M.L. are now Indian Corps formed and recruited in India. True, the bulk of recruitment into the I.U.L. and I.M.L. is from seconded men of the British Army, but, by their recruitment in India and their employment in an admittedly Indian Corps these men, ipso facto, accept an Indian or Asiatic domicile for employment purposes, a fact which places them on the same footing with the I.M.D. The place of recruitment is the pivotal point in regard to the determination of domicile in all other departments of the Government of India to-day.

(2) This statement is obviously incorrect. The I.M.D. is as much an Ancillary branch of His Majesty's Land Forces in India as is any department in the I.U.L. Moreover, whereas the I.U.L. are largely used with Indian troops, the I.M.D. can be attached only to British Army units (vide para. 43 a and b, "Regulations for the Medical Services of the Army in India"). This para. together with para. 132 of the "Order of Precedence (British Ranks) Regulations for the Army in India," establishes beyond dispute that members of the I.M.D. are "British King's Commissioned Officers" or "British Warrant Officers in the Regular Land Forces of His Majesty's Army in India." Again, Warrant Officers of the I.M.D., are, by Regulations, given precedence over every other British Warrant Officer. For purposes of discipline, the I.M.D. come directly under Army orders and not under the Indian Army Act. Moreover, a member of the I.M.D. is sworn in and attested on joining the Service the same as is a British soldier under the Articles of War and the Army Act. He is, therefore, as much a British Warrant Officer as any member of the I.U.L. and neither the place of recruitment nor considerations of colour can deprive him of his claim.

A survey of the past history of the Department shows that in earlier days members of the I.M.D. were attached for duty permanently to particular British regiments, under the disciplinary control of the officer commanding. When on active service, they formed part of that particular regiment in exactly the same way as the I.M.S. and the R.A.M.C. formed part of the regiments they served, before the introduction of the Station Hospital System. There is not a single regulation, order, or instance on record to prove that a member of the I.M.D. has ever been attached to an Indian regiment, except temporarily On the other hand, one has only to recall the campaigns in which British troops from India have participated to realise the extent to which the I.M.D. has been requisitioned for service with British regiments and formed part of the medical personnel. Both regimental and departmental records furnish conclusive evidence of this. One could quote authorities ad infinitum in support of the contention that the I.M.D. although recruited in India, is more an integral part of the British Army than any other Department either in the I.U.L. or the I.M.L. In view of this, the finding of the Army Member, to which we have referred above, cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged.

Before the Great War, all these sister Departments were treated more or less as equals. No one thought of such an entity as the "Domiciled" or the "Anglo-Indian" community as distinct or different from any other community from which the Ancillary branches of the Army were recruited. Such a differentiation is essentially a post-war phase of thought. Unfortunately, it has not only operated to the detriment of the I.M.D. but, incidentally, has caused much unnecessary bitterness by creating a cleavage between the members of these Services, with no possible object, that we can see, except to safeguard the future of the British soldier against the inroads of Indianisation. The recent liberal enhancement of pay and pensions to the I.U.L., which is nothing more nor less than a miniature Lee concession has materialised largely, as a result of the influence and pressure that members of the Department have brought to bear on the Army Authorities, through Heads of Military Departments at Army Headquarters. Incidentally, there is not a member of the I.M.D. employed in the offices of the Army Department.
